which might come to his knowledge immediately to visit the house where the disease had broken out, and at the earliest possible moment to take such measures as might be necessary to secure as far as practicable the isolation of the patient, the vaccination of any persons who might have been exposed to infection, and the disinfection of the premises, and any further action which the circumstances admitted of for the purpose of checking the extension of the disease. I am informed that the Medical Officer of Health reported to the vaccination officer the outbreak of smallpox in the two houses referred to, and that the vaccination officer immediately visited the inmates and urged them to obtain vaccination and re-vaccination. Unfortunately his warning appears to have been disregarded. I learn that an arrangement has been made for vaccination daily of urgent cases by one of the public vaccinators of the parish. With respect to re-vaccination, there is no law under which this can be enforced. As regards vaccination, I am strongly impressed with the responsibility of parents who neglect to have their children vaccinated, and of the Local Authorities who fail to put in operation the law as to the enforcement of vaccination, especially where an outbreak of smallpox has actually occurred.

CANADIAN TRADE.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what answer has been returned by the Imperial Government to the Address to the Crown, in September last, of the Senate and House of Commons of the Dominion of Canada, praying Her Majesty, in view of the earnest desire of the Canadian Legislature to foster and extend the trade of the Dominion with the Empire, as affording, from its diversity of climate and production, the widest prospect of rapid and practically limitless increase, to denounce and terminate provisions in certain Treaties with Foreign Powers incompatible with the rights and powers conferred upon the Parliament of Canada for the regulation of trade and commerce, and tending to produce complications and embarrassments within the Empire; and if the same has been communicated to the representatives of Her Majesty's subjects in British North America now in Parliament assembled?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The reply is on its way to Canada, but as it is an answer to an Address to Her Majesty from the Canadian Parliament, it would hardly be proper to make it known until it has been communicated in due course to the Parliament of Canada.

SOLDIERS AT POLITICAL MEETINGS.

MR. T. FRY (Darlington): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if it is a fact that soldiers are not allowed to go to political meetings in uniform, and are not allowed to go out of their barracks without their uniforms; and, if so, if he will take steps to give soldiers a privilege possessed by all other voters?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Regulation upon the subject of political meetings is contained in paragraph 11 of Section VI. of the Queen's Regulations, and is as follows:—

"Officers, warrant officers, non-commissioned officers, and private soldiers are forbidden to institute, or take part in, any meetings, demonstrations, or processions for party or political purposes, in barracks, quarters, or camps, or their vicinity. Under no circumstances whatever will they attend any such meeting, wherever held, in uniform."

This appears to the Secretary of State to be a most proper rule, and he is not prepared to take any steps which shall tend to weaken it.

MR. T. FRY: Do I understand that soldiers are not allowed to attend meetings in public halls without uniforms? I suppose since this rule was framed the law has been altered as to the registration of voters. Is the soldier not allowed to hear the address of a Parliamentary candidate?

MR. BRODRICK: The law has not been altered. It is impossible to allow soldiers to dispense with uniforms, and it is equally impossible to allow them to attend political meetings, wherever held, in uniform.

THE CONVICT LUNATIC HEHIR.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a prisoner named Hehir, now confined in Dundrum, became a lunatic whilst he was detained at Mountjoy Prison; whether the prison authorities were fully warned as to the man's condition while he was undergoing probationary punishment; whether he is aware that the Deputy Governor acknowledged to a prisoner that Hehir was losing his senses, and that the Rev. Dr. O'Donnell drew the attention of the Governor and the prison doctor to his condition; whether he was all the time kept in solitary confinement, and after his probation was ended was he put to weaving work alone; is it usual to put prisoners suffering from dementia to work in association, and was the custom departed from in the case of Hehir; and, if so, why; and, if Hehir is a lunatic, will he, under the circumstances, be released at an early date?

*MR. JACKSON: The General Prisons Board report that it is the case that the convict Hehir referred to, now confined in Dundrum Asylum, developed symptoms of insanity while confined in Mountjoy Prison. His case was carefully watched by the medical officer, who ordered him extra open air exercise and extra diet, both of which he received. After probation he worked at weaving in association, and was subsequently employed in the open air. The usual custom was followed in this convict's case.

EVICTIONS ON CLARE ISLAND.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the 19 families about to be evicted on Clare Island were last year saved from starvation by public relief, and that the land agent who is responsible for carrying out the evictions is the same person who, as Sub-Sheriff of the county, will have the right of requisitioning the forces of the Crown to assist at the evictions; and will the Government continue this gentleman in his office as principal executive officer of the law in the county?

*MR. JACKSON: I am not aware of the circumstances of the tenants referred to against whom ejection processes have been issued. I believe the agent also holds the office of Sub-Sheriff. The appointment is made not, as the hon. Member seems to suppose, by the Government, but by the High Sheriff.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, is it not a fact that the Sub-Sheriff is the nominee of the Sheriff, and has not a Sheriff again and again been removed by the Government, for example in the case of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Dublin (Sir T. Esmonde.)

*MR. JACKSON: I believe the Sub-Sheriff is appointed by the High Sheriff, but I am not aware that the Government have any power in the matter, certainly they have no voice in the appointment.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: But I have referred the right hon. Gentleman to the case of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Dublin, who was High Sheriff for Waterford.

*MR. JACKSON: Yes; High Sheriff, not Sub-Sheriff.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: The Sub-Sheriff is the nominee of the High Sheriff.

*MR. JACKSON: He is appointed by the High Sheriff.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: To save the time of the House, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman this? Is he able to give an undertaking that in reference to all these undertakings he will deal with the agent—the landlord's agent in this case—in the same manner in which his predecessor, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol (Sir Michael Hicks Beach), dealt with the agent of Lord Clanricarde?

*MR. JACKSON: I have no knowledge of the circumstances to which the hon. Member refers. I can only deal with cases as they arise. I have said I have no knowledge of the circumstances of the tenants against whom processes are issued, but I am willing to act to the best of my ability when circumstances arise requiring decision.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware, is it not notorious, that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Bristol acting, as he stated, within the law, felt it his duty to remonstrate with the agent of Lord Clanricarde, and to intimate to him that unless he showed a more reasonable spirit the forces of the Crown would be withheld from his assistance?

MR. SEXTON : It will be very convenient to the House if the right hon. Gentleman will endeavour to give a more satisfactory answer. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the power to supersede the High Sheriff is not vested in the Lord Lieutenant, who is a Member of the Government ; whether he will consent to bring to the notice of the Lord Lieutenant the fact that the Sub-Sheriff appointed by the High Sheriff of Mayo is at the same time the agent for the landlord, thus acting in a double function—procuring decrees against the tenant as agent and as Sub-Sheriff executing those decrees ? I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will bring these facts to the knowledge of the Lord Lieutenant, with a view to the Lord Lieutenant compelling the Sheriff, under pain of supersession, to select a Sub-Sheriff who does not unite these double functions ?

*MR. JACKSON : No circumstances have been brought to my knowledge to show that any unreasonable action has been taken, any action to which objection can be taken. I should be acting beyond my powers, with the information before me, if I were to give an undertaking that I would ask the Lord Lieutenant to compel the High Sheriff, on pain of supersession, to dismiss a man against whom, so far as I know, no well-founded complaint has been made that he has acted otherwise than that of simply carrying out the law in the cases referred to. If any circumstances are brought to my knowledge that seem to demand that action should be taken action shall be taken, but it is quite obvious that I cannot in the entire absence of all information give an undertaking of the kind. I have no particulars upon which I can form an opinion or come to a conclusion that the slightest blame attaches to that officer.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.) : I ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is reasonable that the agent should make fees in a double capacity—first, the money he will get for carrying out the evictions as agent, and then the fees he will get for carrying out the evictions as Sheriff? Is it reasonable that the agent as Sheriff should be able to enforce the process of the law and make money out of the transaction in both capacities, thereby, as agent, having a premium for carrying out the evictions as Sheriff? I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the uniting of these functions is not so objectionable that he will say to the Lord Lieutenant that he will allow no agent as Sheriff to carry out his own evictions?

MR. M. J. KENNY (Tyrone, Mid) : Is there not a process open to the landlord in this case by which he need not take proceedings by his agent, but could proceed by special bailiff?

*MR. JACKSON : It would not be well for me to answer questions of that kind offhand ; but if any hon. Member will supply any information he desires to lay before me I shall fully consider it ; but I cannot, without notice and without information being supplied to me in a form in which I can have time to consider it, give the undertaking asked for.

MR. SHEEHY (Galway, S.) : May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not the law that the High Sheriff is not to execute any decree which he has obtained himself as Sheriff, and whether this is not a case of a Sub-Sheriff executing a decree which he has obtained himself as Sub-Sheriff?

MR. W. O'BRIEN : I shall hope to be able to press on the right hon. Gentleman the information on the strength of which we think the intervention of the Government is necessary.

PAYMENT OF INLAND REVENUE OFFICERS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is a fact that Inspectors of Inland Revenue when acting as collectors away from home are paid an extra allowance of from 12s. to 21s. per day ; whether expectant supervisors of Inland Revenue when acting as supervisors away from home are granted an extra allowance of only from about 2s. 4d. to 6s. 1d. per day, and out of which they have to bear travelling expenses ; whether it is true that in the summer of 1891 a Petition was presented to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue by the expectant supervisors, pointing out their inadequate allowances as compared with the Inspectors and other public officials, and among other matters proving that they were generally performing public duties at a loss to themselves; and whether he will direct the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to consider the case of the officers of that rank, with a view towards granting them sufficient allowances?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer this question. The Board of Inland Revenue have recently brought this matter before the Treasury, and it is now under consideration.

THE IRISH SCHOOL GRANT.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what amount (approximately) out of the school grant for the current year would be applicable to each of the seven objects defined in the Schedule to the Irish Education Bill—namely, augmentation of class salaries of teachers; augmentation of salaries of assistant teachers; capitation grants to schools not having teachers paid by class salaries; bonus to each male assistant teacher of a certain standing and class; corresponding bonus to female assistant teachers; third class salaries to teachers of small schools; and capitation grant in respect of schools the teachers of which receive salaries or other money payments from the Commissioners of Education?

MR. JACKSON: The proposed allocation of the school grant for the current year among the objects defined in the Schedule to the Irish Education Bill is approximately as follows: In augmentation of class salaries, about £79,000, of which about £61,000 goes to principals and £18,000 to assistants; in capitation grants to schools not having teachers paid by class salaries, about £10,000; in bonuses to assistants of seven years' standing and classed higher than third class, about £5,000 (males about £1,200, and females about £3,800); in third class salaries to teachers of schools having attendances of from 20 to 30 pupils, about £2,600; and the residue to be disposed of as capitation grants to schools the teachers of which receive salaries or other money payment from the Commissioners of Education, about £112,000.

MARRIED WOMEN AS POOR LAW GUARDIANS.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.), on behalf of Mr. McLAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is the fact that the Local Government Board decided some years ago, in the case of Mrs. M'Ilquham, that a married woman having the necessary rating qualification was entitled to be nominated for election as a Poor Law Guardian; and whether, in view of that decision, any official is entitled to refuse to receive the nomination of a married woman who is legally qualified?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes), who replied, said: The case to which the hon. Member refers appears to be one in which it devolved on the Local Government Board in 1881 to determine an appeal against the election of Mrs. M'Ilquham as a Poor Law Guardian. The objection which the Board were called on to decide was whether Mr. M'Ilquham, by whom Mrs. M'Ilquham was nominated, was entitled as a ratepayer to nominate a candidate. The decision was adverse to the validity of her election on the ground that there was no valid nomination. The Board did not decide in that case that Mrs. M'Ilquham was as a married woman qualified for election. The practice of the Board has been where the question has been raised as to the right of married women to be elected as Guardians practically to decline to interfere with the decision of the Returning Officer. The question is one of so great importance that if there is to be any decision on the point the Board consider that it should be a decision of the High Court. It is, at the same time, to be remembered that there are cases where the Board have nominated as Guardians married women. We think that the question is not free from doubt, although we have not gone so far as distinctly to say so.

CONDITION OF SCARIFF DOCKS.

MR. COX : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the ruinous condition of the Scariff (County Clare) Docks and the roadway leading thereto has been brought under the notice of the Irish Board of Works, in whom the control of the docks and the Scariff River navigation is vested ; whether it is a fact that there is neither a crane nor a weighing machine on the pier, although there is a regular service of twelve steamers plying to and from the dock weekly ; and whether, in view of the great importance of this quay to the trade of the surrounding neighbourhood, he will give instructions to the Board of Works to have the necessary improvements immediately carried out ?

SIR J. GORST : I must ask the hon. Member to postpone this question, as I have not had the opportunity of getting the information from Ireland.

PENSIONS TO THE WIDOWS OF COASTGUARD OFFICERS.

MR. P. O'BRIEN : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will explain why pensions are allowed to the widows of Coastguard officers who previously served in the Royal Navy, but the widows of officers who were recruited from other branches of the Public Service are not allowed pensions ; and whether he will see that the widows of all officers are treated alike ?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing) : There are certain officers of the Coastguard who joined the Service when it was under the control of the Board of Customs. These men entered under the Civil Service Regulations, and have retained the right to be pensioned as civilians under the Superannuation Acts. They possess the privilege of remaining in the Service five years longer than the men who joined the Service from the Navy, and their pensions are higher than the naval pensions. On the other hand, by a rule which applies to all Civil servants without exception, their widows are not entitled to pensions from the State, unless the husband's death was directly caused by the Service. In this particular only are the civilian Coastguard officers at any disadvantage as compared with their naval colleagues, and in all other respects their position is superior.

THE CASE OF THE GIRL M'HUGH.

MR. M. J. KENNY : I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if his attention has been called to the case heard at the Petty Sessions held at Trillick, County Tyrone, on the 15th inst., in which the Magistrates refused informations against a person charged with indecent assault on a young girl under 16 years of age named M'Hugh ; whether he is aware that the information of the girl in question set out a complete prima facie case, and that no evidence was called to contradict her ; and if, under the circumstances, inquiry will be made as to why the accused was not returned for trial ?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University) : I have just received the Report concerning this case, and in consequence of that Report I have sent for further information.

TELEGRAPH OFFICE AT MALTBY.

MR. A. ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a telegraph office can be provided at Maltby without the exaction of the full guarantee of £37 a year for five years, in consideration of the special needs of visitors and residents, and the difficulty of raising the required sum ?

SIR J. FERGUSSON : The last application for a telegraph office at Maltby was made in February, 1891. If the residents were now to renew their application, they would get the benefit of the concessions authorised by Her Majesty's Government last August, under which the guarantee would be fixed at £24 a year for seven years, instead of £37 for seven years, as stated in February, 1891. Not only so, but, under the 8th section of the Post Office Act, 1891 (54 & 55 Vic. Ch. 46), the Rural Sanitary Authority of the district might enter into the guarantee, and so relieve private persons from the necessity of taking the burden on themselves.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle): I think it would be for the convenience of the House if the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House would give us some information with regard to the commencement and termination of the Easter Recess?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am well aware that it would be a great convenience to all of us if we could settle as soon as possible the date of separation and re-assembly for the Easter holidays. The hon. Baronet must admit that the Government have some cause to complain of the small amount of time which has been actually at their disposal during the days nominally given to them for the conduct of the Public Business of which they are in charge, and I cannot at the present moment give any definite answer to the hon. Baronet. Before I can do so, I must wait and see what progress is made this afternoon, and I will take the earliest opportunity of giving the information he asks for.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): What is the business to be taken on Monday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In the first place, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will introduce his Budget, and after that we shall go on with the Small Holdings Bill Committee.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to give notice that I shall, on Monday, ask the First Lord of the Treasury the following question—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is not in Order. The question should be put down on the Paper.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Is it intended between now and Easter to proceed with any other Government Bills besides the Small Holdings Bill?

MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask, with reference to a promise of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, made three weeks ago, that he would almost immediately introduce a Bill to enable County Councils to make grants for inquiries into parochial charities, what meaning is to be placed on the words "almost immediately?"

MR. GOSCHEN: I shall, to-day, give notice to introduce it on Monday.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): Will the right hon. Gentleman be able, at the end of the Sitting, to give us the information as to the Easter Recess, or shall we have to wait till Monday for it?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope to be able to make a statement at the end of the Sitting, but I do not like to enter into any positive engagement on the subject. With regard to the question of the hon. Gentleman opposite, it is not proposed to proceed with any first class Government measures other than the Small Holdings Bill before Easter. I do not wish to exclude the smaller and less contentious measures, which we might have a chance of advancing a stage.

MR. BUCHANAN: Is the Private Bill Procedure Bill one of the first class measures?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall not take that.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is the Evidence in Criminal Cases Bill amongst the less contentious business? This Bill proposes to alter the law of England as it has existed for a thousand years—that a man shall not be compelled to give evidence which would criminate himself. I hope, in accordance with the promise of the Attorney General, that we shall not be asked to go into Committee on this Bill without ample notice.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It will be impossible to proceed with any first class Bills other than the Small Holdings Bill, and the Private Bill Procedure Bill will not be taken before Easter.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman take the Second Reading Debate on the Irish Education Bill before Easter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; that will not be taken before Easter.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): Will the Clergy Discipline Bill be taken before Easter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): Will the right hon. Gentleman try to take the Bill for the amendment of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act before Easter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no doubt that is a very important measure, and I hope it may pass after 12 o'clock. I do not think it is in the slightest degree controversial; and, so far as I know, it is approved by all quarters of the House, and no obstacles will be placed in its way.

MR. D. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): When will the right hon. Gentleman move the appointment of the Committee on Financial Relations?

MR. GOSCHEN: I hope, immediately after Easter, to come to some arrangement with the Leader of the House whereby the Motion for the appointment of that Committee may be disposed of after a short debate.

MR. COX: May I ask the Chief Secretary whether he is likely to introduce the Irish Drainage Bill before Easter?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Gentleman refers to the Bill included in the Bills of last Session I think it is ready, and I hope to introduce it almost immediately.

THE EVIDENCE BEFORE THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON LABOUR.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR (Leeds, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode are bound to print the evidence taken before the Royal Commission on Labour weekly, under a Treasury Minute; whether they are paid a special rate for so doing; whether they have at all times complied with the terms of the Treasury Minute; and whether they are complying with those terms now; and, if not, what steps he proposes to take in the matter?

SIR J. GORST: I am not aware of any Treasury Minute to the effect stated in the question. Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode are not paid a special rate for this work. The direction that each day's evidence should be ready on the following day week was given to the printers by the Stationery Office, and until recently no complaint has reached that Department of failure to comply with the direction given. During the last month, however, the work has been allowed to fall in arrear, and it is proposed to call the attention of Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode to the matter with a view to expediting the work.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Papers promised, relating to the 65th Rule, will be given?

MOTION.

THE EVICTIONS ON CLARE ISLAND.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

(4.49.) MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork, N.E.) rose in his place and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely:—

“The harsh and unconstitutional employment of the forces of the Crown in effecting Evictions and Seizures for arrears of rent on Clare Island, whose population was, last year, saved by public relief from a condition of famine; and the danger of widespread destitution and disorder if the impending evictions on the Island are carried out;”

but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, MR. SPEAKER called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen:—

(4.50.) MR. W. O'BRIEN: I regret very much that I am compelled to interrupt the Business of the House, but this is a matter of life and death to an industrious and inoffensive community; and unless the House is asked to devote a short time to save these people from eviction, you will be asked by-and-bye to vote more money to save them from starvation. I was anxious, if possible, to avoid moving the Adjournment of the House, but the reply of the Chief Secretary is so absolutely unsatisfactory that I can do nothing else. He has given us no guarantee that the Sub-Sheriff, the police and the Removable Magistrates will not evict the people in this island for no other crime except that they have made no offer to the landlord of the charitable relief which the British taxpayers were asked for last year, during a time described by the First Lord of the Treasury as a period of exceptional famine. The evictions on this island have already commenced; 19 other processes have been granted within the last few days at the Castlebar Quarter Sessions, and a number of others are pending. Practically speaking, most of these people are already evicted, and have become caretakers, and if they recover their status it will be by stripping themselves of everything they have in the world. We have no hope, I am sorry to say, from the Government; we have no hope from the landlord; we have still less from the Sub-Sheriff; and the only hope left to us is to make a special appeal to the public opinion of this House. Last year the whole population of Clare Island, with the exception of the bailiff and perhaps one or two others, was saved from starvation only by charitable relief. They were enabled to sow their crops only by public charity, and whatever little means they possessed after the harvest they acquired solely by means of charitable relief. The Sub-Sheriff, who is the principal officer of the law in the county, is also the agent for the landlord, and that landlord has for the last five or six months been engaged in a series of attempts to strip these poor people of the funds which they received from charity; and I am sorry to say that the Government by their Sub-Sheriff, their Police, and Resident Magistrates have aided this landlord in stripping these poor islanders of the means of subsistence which this Government felt bound last year in common humanity to give them. The place was formerly owned by an Irish family, who got into difficulties, and the property was purchased as an encumbered estate after a famine time by a landlord of a notoriously grasping character, who was at the time Sub-Sheriff for County Mayo. He went through the usual rent-raising process upon his purchase, and it was to recover arrears that began to accumulate that these evictions were entered upon. Another main fact in this case that we shall have to press upon the notice of the House reveals a scandalous state of things. You have the same gentleman acting in the double capacity of principal officer of the law and official of the landlord. He is earning double fees by carrying out these evictions, representing at one moment the impartiality of the law, and later on in the same day the greed of the landlord. You will find this gentleman as Sheriff requisitioning the forces of the Crown to protect himself as agent of the landlord in plundering these poor tenants of the relief which the British taxpayer provided for them. I do not know whether the Chief Secretary will defend this arrangement, but I submit that this dual rôle introduces a most undesirable state of things, and I shall have to press the right hon. Gentleman to say whether the Government will allow this state of things to continue and will allow this gentleman to order about the Forces of the Crown for any miserable purpose he pleases. Even the right hon. Gentleman's inexperience in Ireland would be no excuse for permitting this state of things to continue. There can be no controversy about the facts of this case up to this point. The whole population except the priest and the bailiff were dependent for their lives upon public relief, and were employed on the reliefs which were kept going for five or six months, and I must acknowledge that a considerable amount of relief was dispensed and much sympathy expressed with those poor islanders by two distinguished ladies who visited the island as representatives of the fund that was started by the First Lord of the Treasury and by Lord Zetland. This was the state of things when this Sub-Sheriff and landlords' agent made his first raid upon the island. He arrived in his yacht, and on his requisition a force of 20 riflemen arrived at the same time. There were only about 100 able-bodied men on the whole island, and various attempts were made to terrorise the people into giving up to the landlord the wages they had received to enable them to keep their families alive. I shall be curious to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will deny this, or will attempt to justify a crime which I regard as about as despicable as robbing a poor box. Apparently, a hint was given to this gentleman that the seizure of the little stock of these poor people at that moment would be a little too glaring, and would revolt those charitable people in England to whom the First Lord of the Treasury was appealing for subscriptions. Accordingly, after a few days, during which time most pressing efforts were made to get these poor islanders to pay blackmail to the landlord, the Sheriff and his expedition took their departure and abandoned their efforts for a time. But only for a time. When the harvest sown by public charity was gathered, the Sheriff despatched to the island a common emergency bailiff to represent himself—and we raise even greater objection than before, because he delegated his dual functions to this man. Another force of police was despatched, and preparations of the most odious character were set on foot to secure what plunder was left for the landlord. And here I charge the Government not only with their responsibility for the action of the Sub-Sheriff, but also with responsibility for the action of the police. We will undertake to prove that the landlord's bailiff was aided in his operations by the very police who, during the summer, had been engaged in distributing relief to these poor people. These policemen had been able, in distributing relief, to obtain confidential knowledge of the poor people's circumstances, and we can prove, by witness after witness, that these policemen went round night by night with the emergency men and pointed out the cabins in which there might be a mountain cow or a mountain pony which might be seized. This occurred to such an extent that these unfortunate people were obliged, for the first time in their lives, to construct some rude sort of window blinds to protect their families from the espionage of these men. Having thus marked out his prey, the emergency bailiff, accompanied by his armed policemen, made a descent on these cabins. The natural result was that these people came out to see where these riflemen were bound, and to find out whose turn it would be next. It is not proved—I do not know that it is suggested—that any of these people threw a stone, or made use of any weapon. It is not pretended that any one of those riflemen sustained the smallest possible injury; on the contrary the only violence used was towards a poor young man who was simply standing by and was knocked down and clubbed by one of these riflemen.

Mr. W. O'Brien

MR. JACKSON: Will you give me the name of the young man and the date of the occurrence?

MR. W. O'BRIEN: The date is the 23rd November, and the name of the young man is Malley. His Christian name I forget. A much more important name, that of the policeman who clubbed this poor young man, has been refused to us, and I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should be as generous in his information as we have been on our side. The only crime these people committed was that they were anxious to know who was to be the next victim and looked on; and for this crime, practically speaking, the whole adult population were prosecuted under the Coercion Act for unlawful assembly, and for obstructing and overawing the officers of the Crown. The idea of these wretched, famine-stricken people, utterly unarmed, overawing a body of well-fed and well-armed riflemen is too absurd, but 80 prosecutions were instituted. But even after this the treatment of these poor people was most cruel. This trumpery, miserable case was adjourned and adjourned for over three months, and five times these people were dragged to the mainland, who, in the ordinary course of events, only visited the mainland once a year. One of these adjournments, I admit, was because of a terrible outbreak of scarlet fever on the island, and another because storms rendered the sea impassable. But two of these adjournments were caused solely and undeniably by the fault of the Crown officials themselves in failing to secure the attendance of two Removable Magistrates. The first occurred on the 7th December, when only one Resident Magistrate (Colonel Stewart) was in attendance; and by no default of the people, but purely of the Crown, the case had to be put off till the 16th. The right hon. Gentleman, in reply to a question, informed me that the Magistrate had been called away to Sligo on Assize business; but the right hon. Gentleman does not depend upon two Resident Magistrates in Ireland. He has many legions. There are 70 Resident Magistrates at his command, and they are not overburdened with work, but he allowed this miscarriage of justice to take place. On the 16th, the day to which the case was adjourned, the poor islanders turned up, and not even one Removable Magistrate was present. The poor, starving islanders were in attendance; the well-fed and well-paid Removable Magistrates were not; and again the case had to be adjourned through, I say, the direct culpability of the Crown officials in Ireland. Having raised—it almost took a sort of national subscription in that place to raise it—£10 as the fee of their solicitor, their solicitor was in attendance, and they lost their £10 fee, and lost their last chance of having any solicitor to defend them in this matter. I questioned the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary as to this fact, and asked him who was responsible for the non-attendance of these two Removable Magistrates upon that day, and the right hon. Gentleman failed to answer me. Well, I have to press him to answer now, and tell us how it is that the Government, who have always plenty of policemen and Resident Magistrates at hand whenever evictions are to be carried out, were not able to secure the attendance of two Magistrates upon this occasion, and caused these poor people all this inconvenience and heavy fine—a fine which I hold should be refunded to these poor people, and out of the salaries of £700 or £800 a year of these Removable Magistrates. I pass from that. After nearly three months' delay we come to the fifth Court day—there was a fourth adjournment owing to the outbreak of scarlet fever on the island. Fresh summonses were issued after the breakdown on the 16th, and one of them was served on a young man who was lying on his death-bed with scarlet fever, and who died within a day or two after. The fifth Court day came; two Magistrates were in attendance at last; the islanders were in attendance; and then it might have been supposed that this, at all events, might have been the end of this miserable trumpety prosecution. Nothing of the sort. The Magistrates deliberately adjourned the hearing of the case from Louisburgh, where these people live, to Westport, a place 13 miles away, for no purpose under Heaven except for the personal comfort and convenience of these Magistrates. All these poor people, cold and hungry, were obliged to march through the snow in the depth of winter on the journey to Westport, and the following morning the Magistrates actually threatened to issue warrants for two old men who lagged upon the way. What does the right hon. Gentleman say in defence of the conduct of the Magistrates on that occasion? The first allegation, and really I was surprised at him, was that the snow was not actually falling. I do not know really—

MR. JACKSON: I did not say so. The statement was that they were driven out in a blinding snow-storm. I said I was informed that it was not snowing.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that the snow was there: does he deny that the 13 miles of road were there; does he deny that a storm was blowing as it blows for months in the year in that neighbourhood? And if that is so, what is the meaning of this miserable pettifogging? It is much more worthy of the conduct of his Removable Magistrates in general than it is of men like the right hon. Gentleman, to whom we are accustomed to look for something a little better and for something more magnanimous. The second allegation was more important no doubt. He stated that the reason for the adjournment from Louisburgh to Westport was that there was no Court room in Louisburgh. And when I said I happened to know Louisburgh, and contradicted the right hon. Gentleman, he adopted a very majestic tone. Not only did they get the defendants into the Court room at Louisburgh, but the Magistrates continued the hearing of the case the whole day long, and it was only at 5 o'clock in the evening that they adjourned the case to Westport the following morning; so that the excuse they put into the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman—because I quite acquit him of having any knowledge at all in the transaction—is a dishonest and untrue excuse. One of these Removable Magistrates is a Mr. Horne, a gentleman who is lent to the Government by the Times newspaper, and who got up its case for the Times at the Parnell Commission. I congratulate him on his brilliant success. I only wish we could have that gentleman cross-examined himself before the three Judges as to the dealings of landlordism in Clare Island. There is another allegation, but as the right hon. Gentleman has conceived that I misconceived him, I shall not refer further to the point; but he certainly conveyed to my mind, and I think to the minds of many of my hon. Friends, that the adjournment to Westport took place on the application of the defendant's solicitor.

Mr. W. O'Brien

MR. JACKSON: No, I did not.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Well, the right hon. Gentleman has explained away that impression; but that was the impression I decidedly got. What was the solemn assurance given by these men to the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and by him solemnly stated to this House? That, indeed, these islanders were extremely pleased with their treatment—were most grateful to the Magistrates, because they only bound them to keep the peace. These poor people actually had to go through Westport begging for the one shilling necessary to pay for their bail bond; and, in one case, the man actually got it advanced by a policeman in Court through compassion. No sooner had these poor people returned home than they were served with processes to Castlebar Quarter Sessions—30 of them were served with processes; whole sheaves of them were sent flying amongst them. They had to meet these at Castlebar Quarter Sessions—many miles from their own place. There were 19 decrees given, and more are to follow. Practically speaking, the whole island is doomed. The first eviction has been already carried out; and I daresay that it was to blunt the edge of British sympathy that the first man they selected for eviction was the relieving officer. I venture to say that unless this House comes to their rescue, the whole population of that island is, practically speaking, exterminated. I venture to say that this persecution is a disgrace to the Government that in any manner permits or allows it; and I ask them to say that they will not, in the interest of Irish landlordism, permit this landlord to pounce down and take away the only little means of livelihood belonging to those poor people. We are constantly told in this House that when the tenants suffer in Ireland it is because they are our dupes. Well, the Clare islanders are not our dupes; it would be well for them if they were. Our dupes have safely in their pockets, nearly two millions a year, rack-rents that the landlords once carried off in plunder from them; but these poor people in Clare Island never held a public meeting, never established a branch of our Organisation there. They were as dumb and patient as sheep; and their reward is that within the last twelve years they have passed through three or four periods of famine, and the moment there was any relief from the charitable public or the taxpayers of these Kingdoms, that money was instantly appropriated by the representatives of their landlords, with the connivance and assistance of the officials of Dublin Castle. That is the sort of mercy Irish landlordism shows where its victims are too poor to offer resistance. I do not want to make anything like political capital out of the case of these poor islanders. It is not a case of politics; it is a case of common humanity. I submit to the House that whatever little means these poor people possess, they have received from the taxpayers of these Kingdoms not to pay rent to the landlords, but to put food in the mouths of themselves and their children. I say the landlord has no more right or title to appropriate whatever little stock or property they may have and to turn them out on the roadside than he would have to knock them down and rob them. It is a scandal for any landlord who attempts it, and I say it is a tenfold scandal and a shame that the power of this great Empire should be employed in carrying out a system of oppression of that sort. I shall not detain the House further, but this is a subject you will hear of again if you do not dispose of it. And I venture to submit to every respectable man in the House that we have a right to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland for a categorical and an unmistakeable declaration—first, that he will not allow these evictions to be carried out, and that he will deal with the landlord of this island in the same way as the hon. Baronet the Member for Bristol dealt with Lord Clanricarde; secondly, that we have a right to ask him that he shall not allow this arrangement by which the same man by whom the warrant is issued is the evicting Sheriff and the landlord's agent; and, thirdly, I submit we have a right to put it to the right hon. Gentleman's humanity whether or not the case of these poor people is not a case not for the Criminal Law, but for the Congested Districts Board? I would put it to him to recognise that what is wanted in Clare Island is not police expeditions, or eviction campaigns, or coercion prosecutions; but what is wanted is some reasonable project that would increase these poor people's means of livelihood—instead of robbing them—that would give them something like seaworthy boats to carry on the fishing industry, that would establish something like regular communication with the main land, and thereby help to make this island, as it could be made, one of the most beautiful islands in the Kingdom. I ask the House to say that the Government ought not, in the interest of Irish landlords, to exterminate these unfortunate people. I now move the adjournment of the House.

(3.31.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I rise to second the Motion. This is the same island upon which Lady Zetland and Miss Balfour descended, and upon the beach of which they received that remarkable address—from which the Times gave us so many beautiful passages in August last—thanking Mr. Balfour for his kindness, his benevolence, and his charity, and contrasting his heroic and noble conduct with that of the miserable agitators who had only brought devastation and spoliation in their track. It was an address which the First Lord of the Treasury probably has framed and glazed over his chimney-piece at home, although I am sure he has not many such documents as a souvenir of his administration in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman could not have listened to my hon. Friend the Member for North East Cork without feeling that the other and the real side of the picture was being presented to the House. The address was got up for him by the Local Resident Magistrates; but I would ask, is there to be no other fruit from the visit of these benevolent ladies to the island than that address and the articles which appeared in the London journals? In those articles the manners and customs, the rugged wildness and the native simplicity of the people of the district were very nicely and touchingly depicted, but, Sir, not one word as to the real circumstances under which these unfortunate people live, move, and have their being has not been allowed to reach the outer world as the result of that visit to that far-off locality; and when, for the first time, my hon. Friend lays the complete story before the House, the First Lord of the Treasury is not present with the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to listen to it. I would venture to say that if the Attorney General for England had been present he would not have attempted to defend the holding of the dual offices of Sheriff and of agent such as were held by Mr. Routledge. A Sub-Sheriff is not allowed to act as a solicitor, so that he should not be able to put into his pocket as Sub-Sheriff fees arising out of transactions which as a solicitor he might promote. Should it not be the same, a fortiori, in the case of Sheriff and agent? I further find in the list of District Receivers in the Court of Chancery in Ireland—that Court of Equity before which we are all asked to bow—the name of James F. Routledge, of Castlebar, as a District Receiver in the County of Mayo. Now, I say, that the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland ought not to allow for one instant a man to hold the position of Sub-Sheriff and District Receiver in one, who is carrying out the process of the law. It is forbidden in the case of Sheriff and solicitor, and there is a far stronger objection to it in the case of Sheriff and agent. Let the Government defend the holding of these dual offices if they can. Why should Mr. Routledge as an agent be able to levy the forces of the Crown for the assistance of a Sub-Sheriff? This scandal has gone on now for at least twelve years, and my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast made some years ago one of his most powerful speeches on this very same question—the treatment of the people of Clare Island. The remedial measures about which the Government have boasted so much at their Primrose League meetings has passed on in procession; Act after Act during these twelve years; and yet not one single benefit has been conferred on these islanders beyond that which has been given in the way of a little extra charity. That is the first branch of the case, and what is the second? I think that the Misses Macdonald are the ladies to whom Lord Carnarvon, when Viceroy of Ireland, sent a letter of special remonstrance with regard to their conduct as landladies. It was not till the distress of last year that the Government set about doing something for the Islanders. One of the things they did was to construct a road for the horses and carts, the only result being a macadam track for the bare feet of the poor people where they formerly had a comparatively level road. But that is not the point that I wish to insist upon. I contend that the Government ought not to have allowed these unfortunate people, who required relief in order to prevent them from starving, to have been marked out for eviction. We have been told that the charity of last year, and of the year before, was administered upon a basis of strictness and foresight such as never was practised in the administration of any previous relief; but instead of the Lord Lieutenant relying upon the local priest and parson as the almoners of charity he himself said that he relied upon Resident Magistrates, and upon the police and other officials as administrators of it. Is it likely, then, that that charity should find its way into the pockets of deserving persons? Is it not absolutely certain that it was misused when we consider who the almoners were? Is it not intolerable that these officials should, when finding out worthy recipients for the charity, mark down others to be dealt with by the law? Are not the Misses Macdonald on a par with Lord Clanricarde in the treatment of their tenants? I venture to say that they are even worse. I know from my own experience how the people suffered under the Crimes Act in Tipperary. How much graver and more serious is it when you prosecute the whole population of a distant island in a stormy sea, and compel them to go before their tyrants in the nearest town on the mainland over 13 miles of road in the depth of winter! If these islanders had had a little more devil in them you would not have got them to do it. If they had been of the Tipperary spirit and strain they would not have been harried in this way. The agents of the Government always adapt their methods to the character of the population. They treat the Sikhs and the Ghoorkas of India in a different way to that in which they treat the Parsee and the Hindoo; they treat the peasants in the West of Ireland in a very different way to that in which they treat the farmers of Wicklow and Wexford and Tipperary. The lesson to be drawn from this is not a lesson of patience or toleration or charity; but a lesson of vigour, and of determination, and of defiance. I believe that if these poor islanders had risen up against such oppression, if they had adopted some of the methods of the Scotch Crofters, attention would have been drawn to their case much more quickly. It is because they have been meek, because they have been humble, because they have been patient, that they have been persecuted. I ask the Government to give these unfortunate people something more than magazine articles. I ask the Government to let us have some statement that will bring hope and succour to them, and I venture to think that if some method is not soon adopted there will be further serious trouble. Strong remonstrances should be sent to the Misses Macdonald and to the Sub-Sheriffs, and justice should be done to these people. A remonstrance should also be sent to Mr. Horn of the Times. I do not know, however, whether this Government is strong enough to deal with that matter. Mr. Horn has been for months the organ of the Times, and probably he may have more influence at Printing House Square than a decrepit and dying House. I would suggest that he should be strongly blamed and reprimanded for the enormous hardships he has inflicted upon these unfortunate people. Finally, I say that if the Government have anything left of the fund in Dublin Castle about which we have heard so much, but the balance-sheet of which has not been presented to the public, it could not be better employed than by enabling these poor people in some way to meet the necessitous position in which they have been placed. I hope, Sir, that the Government will act as the really paternal Government, and not as the stony stepmother of Dublin Castle, and that it will show that the Union has some blessings in its train and is of some value and efficacy to these islanders.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—
(Mr. W. O'Brien.)

MR. JACKSON: This is, perhaps, not a very convenient form of raising a subject which is certainly not, so far as I am able to judge, so pressing as to necessitate the absorption of the time of the House on an occasion like this. I have listened with very great attention to the speeches which have been made, and I think I may say that it is not the first time that we have heard these impassioned statements as to what may happen unless immediate steps are taken for the relief of these particular tenants. The hon. Member who raised this question dealt with it in its two-fold aspects. He devoted most of his speech to a subject that cannot be considered urgent, because it is a question that has already been discussed in this House. The hon. Member has again gone over the incidents of the story connected with the prosecutions for unlawful assembly, and I would remind the House that these prosecutions were for resistance to the action taken by the executive officers in the discharge of their duty; and I would further remind the House that in reference to what took place on that occasion, that these persons pleaded guilty to the charge made against them. Surely there was no great hardship in prosecuting them for offences to which they pleaded guilty? Now, Sir, it is not necessary for me to go into all the details connected with these prosecutions, but I should like briefly to refer to one or two statements made by the hon. Member who introduced this question to the House. The hon. Member said that on the 23rd November a man of the name of Malley had been clubbed to the earth by a policeman with the stock of his rifle. This is the first occasion on which I have heard the matter mentioned. I have read carefully all the papers on the action of the police on the island; and, so far as my recollection goes, there is not the smallest foundation for any such charge as that which the hon. Member brings against the police.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Did the right hon. Gentleman read a letter from Father Malloney, the priest of the island?

MR. JACKSON: Oh, yes! I do not question his authority, but I want to deal with one or two points to which he referred. I was quite aware, when I heard the speech of the hon. Member, that he was giving us statements which came from the reverend gentleman. Well, Sir, I will say that I believe there is no foundation whatever for the statement that a man was clubbed to the earth by a policeman; that disposes of that point. But the hon. Gentleman also said that one young man, lying on his deathbed with fever, was served on his deathbed with a summons. I am in a position to say that there is not the smallest foundation for that statement.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: What is your authority?

MR. JACKSON: My authority is the Report of those by whom the process of serving the summons was carried out. There is no reason whatever to doubt their authority. The hon. Member made the statement most positively.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: I repeat it most positively. I do not know if the right hon. Gentleman's point is that this young man had not a bed to die upon.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member repeats the statement on the strength of the letter to which I have referred. I have examined carefully into the question, and I say without fear of contradiction that there is absolutely no truth in the statement. Well now, Sir, the hon. Gentleman referred to the fact that the hearing of these summonses was adjourned on several occasions; he has again referred to the fact that the hearing was adjourned from Louisburg to Westport, and he has referred to the statement that in the opinion of the Magistrates it was much more convenient and much more in the interests of the persons concerned that that adjournment should take place from Louisburg to Westport. It is quite true that on the first day the room at Louisburg was packed with these people, and it must be borne in mind that at this time one of the adjournments took place in consequence of an outbreak of fever among the islanders. On the first day they were packed into this room in rows, and they had to stand the whole time, as there was no possible accommodation for seating them. I have heard on the authority of those who were present that it was dangerous to the health of everybody concerned that they should be kept in such an atmosphere. On the first day it seemed probable that the case would be finished before the rising of the Court. I believe it is admitted that certain recommendations were made by the priest, and at one time it was somewhat probable that the case would be decided before the end of the day. Towards the close of the day, however, when the question came up as to these men, it was found that if an examination by each of the individual witnesses brought forward was to be continued in the manner in which it had begun, a reasonable estimate would show that it would probably take five or six days before being finally settled. It was in view of that fact that there were no means of accommodation at Louisburg, and it was in the interest of everybody concerned that the cases were adjourned to Westport. I think I may say that, so far from there having been any unnecessary harshness in dealing with these people, I believe that they themselves admitted that the course taken had been a course which was marked by great leniency. Now, Sir, reference has been made to Mr. Horne, and, unless I am very much mistaken, Mr. Horne is a very popular man, one of the most popular Magistrates in Ireland, and a man in whom the people have perfect and complete confidence; and certainly I have ascertained nothing that would in any degree show that the feeling towards

Mr. T. M. Healy

Mr. Horne is other than that I have described.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why the Magistrates did not attend?

*MR. JACKSON: In the first place, one of the Magistrates was summoned to the Assizes at Sligo. If this had been foreseen, arrangements would have been made which would have obviated the necessity for an adjournment. It was not possible in the circumstances to hear the charges, and it was through no fault of the Magistrate or anyone concerned that he was unable to attend on that day. In the other case the cause of adjournment was this. The first summonses were adjourned to a particular day, subsequent to the first case other summonses were issued against persons who had previously evaded service, and the second batch was made returnable on the same day as the adjourned summonses. It was found then that the day fixed was not a formal Petty Sessions day, and that, consequently, the new summonses could not be taken on that day. I admit that that was a blunder. No doubt the inconvenience of the second adjournment was caused by that fact. It would have been possible to have taken the adjourned summonses, but it was not possible to take the new summonses on that particular day, and I suppose that they thought it was better to adjourn them both rather than proceed with the adjourned summonses. I think a mistake was made in that case, and although I do not pass any severe censure on the officials, I make that admission to show the House that I desire to state the case as fairly as I can. Now, Sir, really what am I asked to do? In the first place, I am asked by the hon. Member whether I will undertake that the Forces of the Crown shall not be used for the purpose of protecting the Sub-Sheriff in carrying out these evictions; in the second place I am asked whether I consider it is right that a person occupying the position of a land agent should at the same time fill the position of Sub-Sheriff, and practically carry out the decrees obtained in those cases in which he acts as agent for the landlord. Taking the second point first, I believe the Lord Lieutenant has no power in the matter. The hon. and learned Member for Longford says in vigorous language that the Lord Lieutenant should threaten the High Sheriff that unless he appoints another Sub-Sheriff he, the Lord Lieutenant, will supersede the High Sheriff. That is the only remedy which the ingenuity of the hon. Member for Longford can suggest as being within the power of the Government, and it is a course that would be certainly very unusual and extremely irregular. On the merits of the case itself, I do not hesitate to express my own personal conviction that it does appear on the face of it a little contrary to the position that we should like to see, that a man who has to carry out the decrees of the Law Courts should seem to occupy the dual position of bailiff and executioner. I do not hesitate to give it as my opinion that it is not desirable that a man should occupy that double position. But I would ask hon. Members to bear in mind that that has nothing whatever to do with the question of carrying out the decrees of the Court, or of the duty of the Government in connection with those decrees. Certainly, so far as any influence I have can go, I say it is not desirable; but I say, at the same time, that in this particular district the most suitable man in the district has been selected. I believe Mr. Routledge to be a highly respectable man, and, apart from this particular case, nobody would raise a question of his suitability for the position of Sub-Sheriff. The Government, however, as I have said, have no power to interfere. The appointment rests with the High Sheriff.

Mr. T. M. HEALY: He is a nominee of the Crown.

*Mr. JACKSON: Yes, but the appointment rests with the High Sheriff, and the Government have no power to do that which the hon. Member asks us to do. Now, Sir, with regard to the carrying out of these decrees, it is, I believe, true that there have been 19 processes issued. I would ask the House to consider, just for one moment, what it is I am asked to undertake. I am asked to undertake that the Forces of the Crown shall not be used under any circumstances in this case in order to protect a Sheriff in carrying out his duty. If the Government gave that undertaking it would mean nothing more nor less than a distinct announcement and a distinct intimation to those people on Clare Island to resist the carrying out of those decrees, and we know perfectly well that in these circumstances it would be absolutely impossible to carry out the law.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: I only asked the right hon. Gentleman to follow the precedent set by the President of the Board of Trade when he was Chief Secretary for Ireland.

*Mr. JACKSON: I am asked to declare in Parliament that the Government will come under an undertaking or obligation not to use the Forces of the Crown for the purpose of protecting those officers in carrying out the law. I say, in reply, that it only needs to be stated to the House that whatever the view of the Government be, it would be absolutely impossible to carry out the law if that course were adopted. I say it is not possible for a moment to give such an undertaking. The hon. Member raises this question at a time when these processes have been taken out. I know nothing of the circumstances, but shall certainly deem it my duty to make inquiry into the facts of the case. But, so far as I am able to inform myself, I am bound to say that I hope the House will support the Government in the declaration I have made—that it is absolutely impossible, that it would be extremely unwise, that it would be cutting at the root of all the authority of the law in Ireland if, in answer to a demand made across the floor of the House, in a case where there has been no pretence that anything has taken place that has not been completely justified, in a case where there is no pretence that any injury has been done—that the Government should make a declaration that they would refuse that protection which the officers of the law are entitled to in carrying out the law. I say it is impossible for the Government to make any such declaration.

(4.15.) Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 156; Noes 188.—(Div. List, No. 76.)

Mr. Jackson

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SMALL AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS
BILL.—(No. 183.)COMMITTEE. [Progress 5th April.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Amendment again proposed, in page 1, line 10, after the word "may," to insert the words "either by voluntary agreement or compulsorily."—(Sir W. Foster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.55.) MR. WHITBREAD (Bedford): An hon. Member who sits on this side of the House moved a most important Amendment—more important, perhaps, than any other Amendment which has been moved on this Bill—and the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill in dealing with it made use of some arguments which were not very sound in themselves, and which, at any rate, were not sufficient to meet a very grave case. His argument was that he had supported compulsion in the Allotments Bill, but that he did not see the necessity for compulsion in the Small Holdings Bill. What the right hon. Gentleman said was that he quite agreed with compulsion in the Allotments Bill, because it was admitted on all hands that allotments were a public good and a public advantage, but that it was impossible that could be said for the Small Holdings Bill, because it is an experiment which we hope may succeed, but upon which no confident opinion can be expressed. I may put the statement of the right hon. Gentleman in this way:—"I believe in allotments, therefore I am willing to give compulsion. I do not believe in small holdings, I only hope for them, therefore I will not give compulsion." I do not know whether that kind of argument is likely to be accepted by the House or the country; but it does occur to me that you will have to go a very long way back in our history before you will find a Government which has had such an appalling lack of faith in its own legislation as the present Government has shown in free education and small holdings. But it is part of our business to stir up the faith of the right hon. Gentleman, and show him how to make a reality of this Bill. The next argument of the right hon. Gentleman was that there was no need of compulsion, because there is plenty of land in the market. And he quoted the figures of a firm of land agents to show that this was the case. I should like to ask a few questions of that witness on the subject. I should like to ask what was the character of the sale? What sort of land was it? Was it mountain and moorland, or farms that had been allowed to go out of cultivation; or was it good arable and pasture land fit for small holdings? And I want to know what is the character of the land remaining on their books, something like 200,000 acres? Were the sales in large plots, or so dispersed over the country as to justify the belief that if you rely on the supply of land in the market it will meet the needs of the separate parishes which may arise? That is the problem which we have to solve. It is no use to tell the labourer that there are 500,000 acres in the market in another county. Would this convenient witness tell us that if he were negotiating the sale of an estate of 6,000 or 7,000 acres in a ring fence, it would have no effect on the price or the willingness of the purchaser to buy if he were suddenly to tell him that he would have to surrender to the County Council for the purpose of small holdings a good plot of land in the centre of the estate? These are important questions when you come to rely on the amount of land in the market. If this Bill is to have any effect a surrender must be made. Most of the land in England is tenanted and occupied, and there must be a surrender. The figures of the right hon. Gentleman were very instructive. He said, take the number of acres sold by one land agent, and so many more on his books ready for purchasers, take the number of land agents in London whose names you will find in the Directory, and the multiplication table will do the rest. These figures came as trippingly from his tongue as the figures run in the prospectus of a Limited Liability Company. I do not think it would be a great misnomer if this Bill were called the Small Holdings Bill (Limited), for it is strictly limited to what the landowners choose to subscribe. When my right hon. Friend was describing all these acres to be sold, I could not help picturing to myself the County Councillors with whom I am connected driving through parish after parish, many of them contiguous to each other, and in which not one acre is in the market, or likely to be in the market. Hon. Members opposite represent 20 times, perhaps 50 times, the amount of land in England represented by men belonging to the Liberal Party, and they know what I am saying is true. The tendency of landowners during the last century has been to secure complete and absolute control over the whole land within the bounds of their estates. It has not always been for unworthy purposes, for it is easier to secure good buildings and good sanitary arrangements if you have complete control. Hon. Gentlemen on this side chafe at the notion of that control, and doubt whether the benefits and advantages accruing from it are worth the cost. I am not concerned to inquire on what side the relative Parties lie; we have to deal with the fact. You propose by the Bill to reverse all this. You are going deliberately to give the pendulum a swing in the other direction. It is not a question of letting land for allotments, but of sale outright. The sale will be supervised for ten years by the County Council, but after that the land, purchased in 50 or 25 acre lots, will be available for any object the purchaser may choose. It may be sold in half-acre lots, or for building purposes; there is no guarantee that it will be kept in cultivation. When the Bill is passed, do you suppose that the complete and absolute control which has cost so much to obtain will be very willingly surrendered? It is a mistake to suppose that the landowners will sell large plots to be used for any purpose at the end of ten years unless they are compelled to sell. Look at these "close villages" as they were called, and see what injustice you will do them if the Bill remains a dead letter in their case. If you do not provide them with their share of these new small holdings you do them a double injustice, for you tax them for the advantage of other villages. The right hon. Gentleman says he objects to compulsion, because it would cause friction between different classes. If I had to ask a tenant to surrender a portion of his farm for small holdings I should feel the friction much less if I were backed by compulsory powers. The tenant would feel more hurt if it were at the will of the landlord only that he had to give up the land. I certainly cannot agree that compulsion would make the state of feeling between landlord and tenant, or farmer and labourer, less pleasant than they have been hitherto. I am not ready to suggest that the right hon. Gentleman has taken up this Bill as a plaything, as a kind of Parliamentary pastime, to occupy a few spare hours between now and the Dissolution, or that he has put it forward as a convenient banner to be unfurled just before we go to the country, and after that to be rolled up again and put on one side. I believe he would have been glad to make a workable Bill, but I think he has wholly failed to realise the magnitude of the task under his hand. I wonder what he and his friends will think when the Bill is placed on the Statute Book if it is found that it will not work? I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has estimated the task he has taken in hand, or that the Party sitting behind him is prepared to make the sacrifices which are necessary if the Bill is to work. I look upon it that compulsion in this Bill is the test of sincerity. If they believe in the measure, if they believe that small holdings are a necessity, let them put a clause in the Bill which will insure that small holdings will be forthcoming. I am not enamoured of compulsion for its own sake, but there are some good things which cannot be obtained without compulsion, and this is one of them. There is one thing I dislike more than I do compulsion, and that is to see this House passing measures that we know cannot work, that we know are not real measures. I think that is a dangerous thing to do. I do not like to raise expectations among a part of the people of this country when I know that those expectations will not be fulfilled. I think that is inducing men to distrust Parliament, to feel that when expectations are raised they are not fulfilled, and to avoid raising such expectations and dooming them to disappointment, I would make a greater sacrifice than is involved in voting for the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

(4.50.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): Reference has been made several times to the decision of the Small Holdings Committee, of which I had the honour to be Chairman, and I should like in a few minutes to give some explanation as to the course taken by the majority of that Committee. Before I do so, however, I may refer very briefly to the speech we have just listened to. My hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) commenced by referring to the arguments against compulsion which had been used by the Minister of Agriculture, and he complained of the poverty of those arguments. He complained, in the first place, that the right hon. Gentleman did not appear to believe in his own Bill, because he had said that whilst he felt confident in proposing that which referred to allotments that that measure would be largely availed of, he considered the present Bill as in the nature of an experiment, and, therefore, he was not prepared to go as far in the way of compulsion in the latter measure as he did in the former. I very much wish my hon. Friend the Member for Bedford had been on the Committee to which I have referred. If he had been, and had been in the slightest degree impressed by the evidence, he would have agreed with the President of the Board of Agriculture that he would be a very rash man indeed who would predict beforehand what would be the result of State assistance of a scheme for providing small holdings. We had witnesses before us who declared it could not be successful, except in the case of land where fruit-growing could be carried on or where fruit cultivation could be economically practised, and to attempt to extend small holdings throughout the country would be to court certain failure. We were told by other witnesses that the class for whose benefit it was sought to create the small holdings would never be able to provide the capital necessary for working them, and that the very utmost they could possibly do would be to take something like the tenancies suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. Then again, we were told by one witness at least that even the rate of interest suggested in this Bill, and which we suggested to him, would be altogether too large for any small holder to pay if he belonged to the agricultural labouring class, and unless the Government would be prepared to accept the same rate of interest which the landowners are content to take—and which the witness put at about 2 per cent—the Bill would certainly be a failure. Again, we were told that no Bill of this kind would be satisfactory or sufficient which did not provide State assistance, not only to give the land to the labourer, but also to provide buildings. One witness declared that he should not be satisfied with this even, and that the State must go on and provide for the stocking of the farm. There were, of course, other witnesses holding different opinions, and the Committee, although impressed by all this evidence with the fact that a Bill of this kind must necessarily be an experiment, were unanimous in their conviction that it was very desirable to try such an experiment. But undoubtedly I am expressing the conviction of the Committee, or certainly the conviction of the majority of the Committee, when I say that they believed that the Bill must be a tentative measure. My hon. Friend went on to say that the evidence before the Committee was insufficient to show that there would be sufficient land for the purpose of the experiment.

MR. WHITBREAD: Sufficient land sufficiently dispersed.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Yes, sufficiently dispersed. I am inclined to agree with those witnesses who came before us and said that there would be exceptional cases; perhaps in some cases affecting whole districts, in which there would not be sufficient and suitable land at the particular time at which it was wanted. I think that is quite possible ; but, on the other hand, there was a general concurrence of testimony in the view that there would be ample land to be found in different parts of the Kingdom to supply, at all events, as much as would be required for such an experiment as this Bill provides for—an experiment which is confined to a capital expenditure which can be based on a penny rate. As to that I think there can be no doubt. I am inclined to agree with my hon. Friend that there may be cases in which this Bill will not provide for a want which may be found to exist, and if it can be shown that such a state of things exists to any considerable extent a good case would be made out for asking the House to provide compulsion, always supposing that in the meantime the experiment has succeeded according to the desires of those who are promoting this legislation. Then my hon. Friend made use of another argument which, I think, should lead to a different conclusion from that he based upon it. He pointed out that under the Bill these small holders are after ten years to have absolute possession of their holding, and I think he suggested that if now, under a voluntary system even, they were enabled to get land in the middle of an estate they might afterwards so use that land as seriously to injure the estate, and as that would naturally be unpopular with the landowners he actually suggests that compulsory powers should be asked for to do this great wrong to landowners against their will. I should have thought that if anything of the kind were possible it would be an argument against compulsory powers. For myself, I hold that to be an amendment to another part of the Bill which would prevent these small holders from obtaining this absolute possession, and always keep them under the control of the Bill, and carry out the object which the State is making sacrifices to secure—namely, that they should continue occupying and cultivating tenants. I go back again to what I wish to say with regard to the Report of the Small Holdings Committee, the effect of which has, I think, been a little misunderstood. It is said, and said truly, that we reported against compulsory powers, and hon. Members on the other side have supposed that we reported against compulsion on its merits. We recommended that compulsory powers should not be put in this Bill, or in the Bill which was expected to follow on our recommendations, and we did so on two grounds. First, that it was a tentative measure, and that it must be considered as an experiment, and that for the mere purposes of an experiment compulsory powers were not absolutely necessary; and, in the second place, because we believed that if compulsory powers were sought for at this stage of the discussion they would provoke so much opposition, both in the House and in the country, there would be very little chance of any Bill being passed. As regards the evidence we took on the subject of compulsion, I must say that it did not add very much to our information. It was conflicting in character, and hardly of the nature to justify us in coming to any confident conclusion. There were four witnesses—Mr. Standing, a small farmer from Lincolnshire; Mr. Dodd, who spoke as standing counsel for the Small Holdings Association; Mr. Jones, a solicitor in Cardiganshire; and Mr. Hughes, a small owner in Wales, who, I may say, were absolutely in favour of compulsion. On the other hand, Mr. Gibbons, who was connected with allotments at Wellingborough, advocated compulsion after my hon. Friend's own heart. He was for compulsion all round. He was not satisfied merely to compel the landowner to sell, but he demanded that the Local Authorities should be compelled to buy. Another small farmer, Mr. Jones, also from Wales, was in favour of compulsion, but he would only apply it in the case of unlet land. He would not apply it where tenants were in possession and were already cultivating the land. The late Mr. Fyffe, who gave us the most interesting and useful evidence we took in the course of the inquiry, put before us some very strong arguments in favour of compulsory powers. He said, with regard to landlords, "Some will not sell land for the purposes of this measure, though it is true," he went on to say,

"I believe these are exceptions, but I know some landlords exercising control over very large districts who certainly, at present, would absolutely refuse the land for such a purpose."

He said, what I think to be of more importance, that whilst some landlords will not sell there are many landlords who cannot sell owing to the opposition of their tenants, and it would enable these landlords who are quite willing to sell to get over this opposition of the farmers if they could appeal to the compulsion that was behind them. On those grounds, therefore, Mr. Fyffe said that although he was firmly convinced that if compulsion were included it would seldom be used, it would be a potentiality which was a great advantage. Then Mr. Fyffe, who, although he was a very strong Radical and an ardent politician, was an extremely fair-minded man, went on to say, in answering a question, that undoubtedly he thought that the Bill, even without compulsion, was a good and useful Bill, and he would vote for it, even without compulsion, though he thought it would be more useful if compulsion were included. My own opinion, and the opinion of some other Members of the Committee who voted against the immediate introduction of compulsion, may be very fairly expressed in the words of Mr. Fyffe. We think, and we thought, that the introduction of compulsion would be an improvement to the Bill, and if we could possibly hope to convince the Government of that, and at the same time not to arouse any considerable opposition in the country, I should have thought it was very desirable to include compulsion, even now, in the measure. But, on the other hand, if the introduction of compulsion is likely seriously to endanger the measure, then I am prepared to vote against compulsion, at all events at present, not on the merits, be it observed, but as a question of policy. I think that in doing so I should have no difficulty in justifying myself. In the first place, as the hon. Member for Bedford said, and as any reasonable man would say, compulsion is not to be desired for its own sake but should rather be avoided, because it might, in many cases, cause great friction; but I would also point out that it is certain to increase the cost of transactions under the Bill. I have had a very large experience in compulsory acquisition of land, acting on behalf of a great Municipality, and in all cases in which I have been personally concerned, and in every case of which I had the slightest knowledge of the cost of the proceeding, the general consequences of having resort to compulsion have invariably been to add at least 20 per cent., and in one case of which I know personally 50 per cent., to the value of the land. Therefore, I think we all desire that compulsion should be used as little as possible, and not at all unless it is necessary. I have already said that we had evidence before us that enough land was obtainable for the purpose of trying this experiment. I have no doubt that will be found to be the case if this Bill passes. I do not say it will be so in every case in which land is required; there may be cases of grievance but, practically speaking, it will be tried in every county in England, and we shall know what chance there is of giving a large extension to the measure. And if, hereafter, a case for compulsion is made out—as I think it will be made out—then, undoubtedly, we shall have the strongest possible grounds for coming to Parliament and saying, “We must have compulsion, without which this question cannot be dealt with.” But if we find, as I am afraid we do find, that there is amongst the landowners of the country a very serious alarm at the prospects of compulsion, I think we are bound, having regard to the prospects of legislation, to take that into account at the present moment. And let me say that some of the remarks which have been made in the course of this discussion are not calculated to relieve landowners from this alarm, because I have heard hon. Members say that what they want is not only land, not only ordinary land, but the best land in the best place. I confess that goes a long way further than I have ever proposed to go in this matter. By all means let the small holder have a fair chance with the other cultivators of the soil; but if you say that that is not sufficient, and that he cannot succeed unless you allow him to pick out the eye of every estate, I think in that case you are putting his claim so high that no just man can possibly recognise it as a fair one. It is because I do believe that the progress of this measure would be most materially advanced if compulsion were not introduced that I voted against its immediate introduction. I am prepared to do the same now. The hon. Member for Cirencester the other day threatened us in very plain language with vengeance and with an electoral agitation, and no doubt we shall be denounced throughout the country as the enemies of the agricultural labourer. The hon. Member does not show very good taste in threatening his colleagues in the House in that way, but I will tell him this. If only the matter is fairly stated to the agricultural labourer by himself and his friends without exaggeration and without misrepresentation, I have sufficient confidence in the shrewdness and intelligence of the labourers to feel certain that they will justify our action. Here is a Bill which, as Mr. Fyffe said, and as I believe, is a good Bill, a useful Bill, and a Bill which will go a long way towards carrying out the object which we have at heart. We are told that the Government cannot accept the Amendment which has been proposed, and if it were forced upon them it would be fatal to the Bill. The Bill would have to be dropped, and what would happen then? The labourers, who are the especial care of the hon. Member for Cirencester, would have to wait till another Government came in—I wonder why hon. Members do not cheer me—which is a matter, as we all know, of very few weeks or months. Yes; but they would have to wait a few years after that Government came in whilst that Government was engaged in dealing with Home Rule for Ireland, Home Rule for London, One Man One Vote, Disestablishment of the Church in Wales—and it is not until all these things have been dealt with that the turn of the agricultural labourer will come for his compulsory Small Holdings Bill. Under these circumstances I have no hesitation, and I believe I am acting in the interest of the labourers when I vote for half a loaf instead of no bread. I believe in doing so we shall have done a great deal to satisfy the aspirations of the labourer, and we shall have done much more in his interest than we should do if we postponed the settlement of this question till all the reforms to which my hon. and right hon. Friends are pledged have been carried into effect.

(5.10.) Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): I own to some difficulty in understanding the position of my right hon. Friend who has just sat down. But if I understand it at all, it appears to me to be a position which would go very far indeed to paralyse and to reduce to inanity all the reforming energy of Parliament. My right hon. Friend thinks that compulsion is sound in principle. He is convinced that a case will hereafter arise in which compulsion will be justified and necessary; and yet, although, he has these opinions, he is afraid to give a vote in favour of compulsion, because he says the Government cannot grant it. I want to know from my right hon. Friend whether there has ever been a single measure of reform and improvement in this House which, if we had treated it in that manner, we should not have totally failed in carrying. We have always had this opposition to contend against; we have always had this unwillingness and reluctance to admit the propriety or the necessity of what we proposed. But our answer and our grounds of action have been these: that we were confident in the reason of the case, and that, therefore, we must persevere. My right hon. Friend is perfectly confident in the reason of the case; he has no scruple there; he believes that the thing is in principle sound; and he believes that a case of necessity and compulsion will arise. Well, if we were under these circumstances to refrain from pressing our opinions, I should like to know where would be any of the reforming measures on which my right hon. Friend has heretofore in other days taken part? All these measures at the present day would still have continued to be the subject of idle and profitless discussion and of infinite ingenuity in finding circuitous methods of justification for shrinking from supporting them. If my right hon. Friend would only recur a little to the ancient faith which he used to have! I do not ask him to urge all his principles and all his opinions with the vehemence and in the alarming terms by which, in other days, he excited such horror amongst hon. Members opposite, by which he contrived to sever from the Liberal Party many good though timid men, who are now associated with him in the closest and most harmonious relations; I will not ask him to revert to his famous dicta, by which he earned an immortality, not, perhaps, altogether acceptable to his present humour; but I ask him in some degree to recall the sentiments cherished by him in his youth, and in his middle age to join with us—at least so far as reason will support our proposition—in something better than referring to the discretion and arbitrary will of the Government opposite, to say whether some improvement in our law shall take place or not. Then we come to this question: Is this Bill a Bill which absolutely requires the introduction of compulsion in order to give it any such character of utility, and any such terms of extent as the nature of the case and the expectation of the people demand? My right hon. Friend speaks as if there were nobody and nothing to consider in this matter except the apprehensions of nervous landlords, and except the will of a Tory Government. Now, we have a large rural population, and this rural population—as my right hon. Friend knows—has its mind intently set upon this subject. Of that there is no doubt. My right hon. Friend has got his specific for this. He says, “Only be reasonable and clear in your explanations to this rural population, and there is no difficulty whatever. Let there be no tampering, no exaggeration,” and no doubt the hon. Member for Bordesley, the faithful henchman of my right hon. Friend, will be glad to echo that opinion. My right hon. Friend says, “This is my specific: give rational explanations to the rural labourers, and they will be perfectly satisfied.” Well, now I should like much to know what are to be these rational explanations? Does my right hon. Friend think that if we have in our pockets a little printed copy of the speech which he has made to-day that will furnish us with a sufficient text for rational explanations to satisfy the labourers? Will the rural labourer be content when we go to him and say, “We believe compulsion is in principle just; we believe you have got a case, but because there is a Tory Government in power that I do not wish to displace, therefore my rational explanation must be sufficient for you; although your case is just, though I am the first in declaring it to be just and good, yet from political motives, brought from other quarters and not belonging to the merits of your case, without disparagement of your just claim, because of previous arrangements to which I have become committed, you are therefore to acquiesce in a measure which I do not deny requires this as a proper complement, but which at the same time it is not convenient for me to confer upon you.” Is this the moderate and intelligible and enlightened explanation to which I am to expect the intellect of the rural labourer at once to yield assent? But I confess I differ from my right hon. Friend; I am not so sanguine; and I believe that the rural labourer is either too unenlightened or a good deal too enlightened to give the slightest effect to such explanations. If, on the other hand, my right hon. Friend has got another set of explanations which he has not included in his speech to-day—if he will kindly on some other occasion supply us with them, we should be most happy to take them, provided they are available, and turn them to the best account we can. In the meantime, for the present purpose I must point out to my right hon. Friend that we cannot altogether decline to act in the manner in which we have endeavoured to act upon other subjects—and that is to say that by our speeches we will endeavour to assist the public mind in arriving at right conclusions, and by our votes we will endeavour to assert our conscientious convictions—which are evidently shared by my right hon. Friend with us—we will endeavour to assert them, and we will not be deterred from asserting them by the knowledge that we have before us, as we have had upon every occasion when there has been anything worth contending for, a phalanx banded in opposition to our views. Well, now, the real question comes to this: Is this proposal a reasonable proposal? Is it needful, in order to make this Bill a reality, that compulsion should be introduced into it?

But my right hon. Friend dropped important words, if I understood him rightly, in one portion of his speech, where I think he intimated vaguely that he approved of the proposal—I am sure he will correct me if I am wrong—that he approved, in principle, of the proposal to enlarge this Bill by introducing into it the principle of letting as well as selling the land.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg pardon. The Amendment of which I indicated my approval, and which is down on the Paper, was that for limiting the ownership by leaving quit-rent upon the land permanently, but I should have something to say against the proposal for substituting tenants for small owners.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I should be sorry to accuse my right hon. Friend of an intention to enlarge this Bill. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman, however, that I am glad of his intervention, because he has relieved me in that way from the danger of disappointments, which I have not infrequently felt in the course of the present Parliament, when after listening to an admirable speech from my right hon. Friends which tended to make it a matter of demonstration to me that we were going to have the support of my right hon. Friend on some important principle, he has by-and-bye found a way circuitously to a means of escape which ended with the announcement that it would be his painful duty to go into the other Lobby. It seems to me that, in considering this Bill on its present basis, we are bound to refer to the evidence of witnesses before the Committee of this House, who have shown that very great doubts exist in the minds of many as to the extent to which this Bill will work, that there are many obstacles in the way, and that although many of us believe that it may easily and reasonably be made into a Bill of large operations, yet many persons appear to be under apprehensions that the operations of it will be small on account of the difficulties and objections there are in the way. But if that be the case, I have to ask myself, first of all, two questions: Is the object in view any very great object; and if it be any very great object is it one on which the common mind of this country is firmly set? My answer to these two questions is in the affirmative. I say it is of enormous importance to bring into profitable use the land of this country—not of the whole land of this country—I speak of nothing of the kind; and I do not believe that any person sitting here will see a fundamental revolution of the sort in the rural land of this country. I believe its destiny is that for the most part it will be held by a considerable mass of persons who are not the occupiers and the cultivators of the soil. But I believe that it is of enormous—that it is of vital—importance and consequence on every ground to bring the rural population, the rural labouring population, as far as possible into union with the soil, and with the profitable use of the soil. Surely that is an argument of enormous power—to which a man of the acuteness of my right hon. Friend cannot possibly be blind—for endeavouring to give all the extension, and all the elasticity we can to the measure which is placed before us under the imposing title of the Small Agricultural Holdings Bill. This is indeed a very great question; and I confess I can conceive nothing more clear than that, without making extravagant or exaggerated demands, we should endeavour to equip such a Bill in such a way that it shall be a Bill of resource, that it shall be a Bill of carefully considered expedients for meeting the difficulties that confront us, and a Bill which aims at extracting from this great subject all the benefits that it can by rational processes be made to yield. Therefore, while disposed to admit that just consideration ought to be given to the arguments of opponents, and even to the apprehensions of opponents, I say I feel no reason to believe that our opponents constitute a considerable majority in this House, and that they have reason to make a call upon our compassion. They are here in a condition to assert individually their own views and principles and to give them effect. But it is a strange thing, indeed, that we who are of the minority should be reduced to the point that we are not to give a reason for our opinions, and not to give our votes in support of these opinions, because what we have before us is still not an inconsiderable majority perfectly able to hold its own ground, and to do what I must admit to be justice, and what I call a great deal more than justice, to bad arguments and insufficient conclusions. There is one statement of my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester which I wish to call attention to. Why is it, it may be naturally asked, that my hon. Friend behind me, in his admirable speech—the hon. Member for Bedford, and other gentlemen in this House—has attached this very great importance to the introduction of compulsion into this Bill? And here I wish to draw a distinction which undoubtedly, in my view, is important. The same distinction was taken by my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester. I wish to point out that if a multitude of blocks of 50, 40, or 30 acre holdings are to be taken out of existing estates, that may be regarded, and rightly regarded, as a very serious interference with the unity of those estates, and, without putting too high an argument on behalf of the landlord, on the landlord's reasonable influence on the control of the area where he is the principal proprietor, and must continue to bear the principal responsibility. As I have gathered from the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester, his anxiety for compulsion was not for the 50, 40, 30, or even 20 acre holdings, which the Government contemplate in the form of freeholds. Undoubtedly that is my feeling. I am indifferent whether you apply compulsion to those large blocks, which I call large holdings as compared with the holdings we principally have in view. Now, Sir, what is it we have principally in view? Who are they that have the real call upon us for assistance in this case? They are the rural labourers; they are not the men possessed of £2,000, £1,000, or £500. They are not the men who would buy 50, 40, 30, or even 20 acres. They are the men to whom it would be of the most vital consequence to obtain what I would call small holdings—those which border upon allotments, and which rise by slow gradations from the dimensions of allotments until you come to holdings of an entirely different character. I think the more these Debates are carried on the more it must be evident that the object of the Government is entirely distinct from that of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. The object of the Government is the creation of a class approaching the character of the ancient yeomanry of this country. An object of that character is an exceedingly good one; I have not a word to say against it, but it is an object necessarily limited and narrow in its sphere. There is before us a far wider purpose, and that is of going to the labouring population of this country, and of placing them, to their own profit and advantage, upon the soil from which until now they unquestionably have been almost altogether excluded. I hardly think it can be denied that that is a reasonable purpose on our part, and that we should look to this Bill with a desire that it should be made adequate to the attainment of that object. The right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture says that he is strongly for compulsion in regard to allotments, but that the holdings contemplated by this Bill are in the nature of an experiment, and that, therefore, there ought not to be compulsion in regard to them. I do not admit the distinction of the line which has just been drawn by the right hon. Gentleman at a single acre being a certain good on one side and a mere experiment on the other. I say that the allotments are a certain good, but that he is wrong in saying that holdings of two acres or three acres, four acres or five acres, ought to be regarded as mere experiments. Some of these holdings, even up to five acres—I believe multitudes of them—may be found to be perfectly capable of management by men who are now in the condition of labourers. I will now refer to a nobleman who was once well known to this House, and who will always be honourably known in the districts in which he lived—the late Lord Tolle-mache. He was a man of politics entirely opposite to mine, but he was one who did honour to his name and to his order, and to his country; and as regards this question of small holdings he was a model landlord. Now Lord Tolle-mache had an estate in Suffolk, where the people were not associated with grazing and the management of cows, and he gave to every labourer upon it half an acre of ground, partly to be used for the spade cultivation of corn, and partly for strictly garden purposes. But Lord Tollemache also had a large estate in Cheshire, and he gave $2\frac{1}{2}$ acres to every cottager upon it. These are what I call small holdings, and they were held without any call being made upon the labourer to invest money in the freehold, and thereby to deprive themselves of the means of cultivating their holdings. Why should there not be created in many parts of this country a class such as Lord Tollemache created on his own estates? Then we come to the question, whether it is certain that such a class could be created under this Bill as it is now framed? I maintain that they could not be created under it. My right hon. Friend who has just sat down said that in his experience compulsion was a more expensive way of securing land than by voluntary arrangement. That contention appears to be based on the assumption that we are setting up compulsion against voluntary arrangement. We are doing nothing of the kind. It is not a question whether land shall be taken by compulsion instead of by voluntary arrangement. It is a question whether land shall be taken by compulsion or its not being taken at all. The comparison of the standard of price has no reference to the case which is before us. My contention is that we ought to have a uniformity of action, so far as we can, all over the country—I do not say uniformity of action made compulsory, because we are agreed that this is a matter in which the initiative control and responsibility must be left in the main to Local Authorities—to the County Councils—as the basis of the Bill. About that I think there is no division of opinion in this House; but we ought not to frame our measure in such a way that where the Local Authorities are willing, intermediate or secondary obstacles shall be permitted to frustrate and render null and void ab initio the great purpose of the Bill. Can we expect uniformity of action on the part of landlords in this matter? In my opinion, the exceptions which must exist to prevent that uniformity are exceptions very considerable in number. There are the landlords who are indifferent; there are landlords who are absentees; and there are landlords who are minors, whose trustees and guardians, in a multitude of instances, will say "No" to the question of dealing with the corpus of the estate before the succession of the owner. There are landlords who are embarrassed, and whose estates are greatly encumbered—not, I hope, a very large number, but still a not inconsiderable number—to whom it might be a matter of great inconvenience to raise any money in order to release even a portion of their property from the encumbrances at present affecting them. But there is another consideration. This Bill must undoubtedly be regarded as a Bill calling for considerable expense. What I should like to see would be voluntary action of the landlord in dealing directly with the tenants without going to the County Councils at all. But a man must then be in a position of something like Lord Tollemache, whose operations cost him, unless I am much mistaken, a great deal of money. Perhaps not a very large proportion of landlords would be in a position to deal with their tenants upon the liberal footing which Lord Tollemache was able to adopt; and, on the whole, it appears to me that there is no inconsiderable number of landlords whom it is impossible to expect that they or their representatives would voluntarily concur in the purposes of this Bill. Then how will the people of three different parishes stand with regard to it? There may be parish A, parish B, and parish C in the same county: the people of those three parishes desirous of obtaining land; the County Council willing and active in the discharge of their duty. In parish A and C the landlords are willing to sell; but in parish B there is a landlord who from indifference, or from being an absentee, from want of money, or from other causes, is not willing to do so; so that while the labourers in parish B have their desires wholly unsatisfied, and those in A and C have attained the object of their wish, those in parish B would be subjected to taxation for the benefit of the others. Is that likely to conduce to harmony and to prevent friction? Will the right hon. Gentleman opposite apply the principle to a holding above as to a holding below one acre? Will he open the door which would give us a hope that the rural labourer will have a fair chance of coming into the profitable use and cultivation of a portion of the soil. The only desire we have is to aid him in doing it. My right hon. Friend said that this Bill would go a long way to accomplish our object—

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, no! What I said was that the Bill before the Committee was in its main features similar to the Bill which was introduced by my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. J. Collings), which also was not a compulsory Bill, and that compulsion is not necessary to bring a good many more people on the soil.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: The expression "going a long way" was, I think, unfortunately used. The sense and meaning of the present Bill is to increase the number of small holdings. By all means let that be done, but do not let us allow the rural labourers to suppose that we for a moment dream that this will meet their wishes. It is something far beyond it that is required. It is the establishment of a prevalent and useful union between the masses of the population and the soil that we should seek to effect. Is that an unreasonable attempt to make? Let the right hon. Gentleman give us, in the most moderate way, the means of accomplishing that object, and we shall be happy to meet him. We wish to give him every credit for what he has done, but to stimulate him to do more; because I fear that if something more is not done this Bill will remain a monument of good intentions, and will carry through the country when it comes into operation, from the extreme narrowness of its scope, a feeling of deep and prevailing disappointment.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The House has listened with interest, not altogether unmixed with amusement, to the speeches of the two right hon. Gentlemen. These speeches have been strikingly different in character. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham explained the reasons which induced him to give his vote against this Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian commenced his speech by spending at least a quarter of an hour in attacking my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham for refusing to return to what he called his "conscientious convictions," and denounced the bad arguments he had used on this occasion. I think, in so far as the right hon. Gentleman's speech was concerned, if I may be forgiven for saying so, the difficulty was to find what arguments he relied on. He spent so long a time in attacking my right hon. Friend that I can only come to this conclusion—that whilst my right hon. Friend was desperately anxious to forward and advance this measure, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian would not scruple to injure it, and injure it seriously if he could. The right hon. Gentleman asked if this was or was not a reasonable Amendment, and he went on to say it was a very large question, and that this Bill ought to be what he described as a "Bill of resource." But the right hon. Gentleman did not attempt to explain what a "Bill of resource" was to mean, neither did he give the slightest nor the smallest answer to the question as to whether this Amendment was reasonable or whether it was not. The right hon. Gentleman went on to declare that the endeavour to create a class of yeomen was not the only thing; but that the real object and purpose of the Bill ought to be to aid in the advancement of the agricultural labourer by increasing the number of small holdings. I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman, but I do not see how, by making use of that expression, he advanced in the slightest degree his argument in favour of compulsion. He said I had drawn a line between holdings below one acre and holdings above one acre, and that I stated that, though the one was nothing but an experiment, the other was an advantage that could not be disputed; and he asked me to justify that distinction. I wish to say, in reference to this subject, that that is not the argument I used. I said nothing whatever about a line between holdings below one acre and holdings above one acre. What I have constantly said on this subject is this—that while the system of allotments has been proved to be a success—which is a very different thing from saying it may be an advantage—on the other hand, no one in this House is able to say that the attempt to establish small holdings by the aid of the State can be described as anything more than an experiment, although it is an experiment of which we cherish the reasonable hope that it will succeed. The right hon. Gentleman said it is a question between compulsion and having no land at all. On what ground does the right hon. Gentleman make that statement? We have had some experience of this question in the past in dealing with allotments. Since the passing of the Allotments Act there have been added by voluntary means to the allotments already existing a number that is quite remarkable. Does that show any unwillingness on the part of landowners of this country to come forward and assist a measure of this description, and does that give the slightest ground or justification for the idea that we must either have compulsion or no land at all? Well, Sir, there has been this great addition to the allotments, and it has been obtained by voluntary means and not by the compulsory process which the right hon. Gentleman wishes us to introduce, with the exception, I believe, of one or two cases only out of the multitude of allotments which have been created. The right hon. Gentleman said there would be Parish A, in which the landlord would be willing to sell land for the purpose of being parcelled out in small holdings, and that in Parish B there would be a person of a different description, an odious and selfish character, who would refuse to grant any land whatever for the purpose. Well, Sir, when that is shown to happen it will be time enough to adopt the suggestion of compulsion: and I cannot help thinking it is an unworthy charge to make against the landowners of this country, before the thing has been tried, that at least one-half of them will refuse to give any assistance in the carrying out of this Bill. I will tell the right hon. Gentleman one or two arguments against this principle of compulsion, which seems to be exceedingly dear to him, although I do not think he has advanced one single solid argument in its support. The right hon. Gentleman said—and he has repeated the statement more than once—that in his opinion the holdings granted under any measure of this kind would in the great majority of instances be small, and that it was essential that they should be near the existing homes of the men who were to cultivate them.

Mr. Chaplin

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I said that small holdings which are capable of being multiplied to a very large extent in my view form the great subject of importance, and that the others are of secondary consequence.

*MR. CHAPLIN: Quite so; but I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that that was one of the grounds which made compulsion necessary. But if I accept the argument of the right hon. Gentleman as to the very small holdings it would be fatal. It would be an admission that would be fatal to the establishment or development of the system of small holdings throughout the country, except on the narrowest possible scale and to an extremely limited extent. The moment it is examined the Committee will see that the argument of the right hon. Gentleman is open to two serious objections. In the first place the Committee must remember that the number of small holdings in this country at the present time is very much larger than probably many Members are in the least degree aware of. I have not the figures with me, but according to the latest Returns I am certainly under the impression that there were over 1,000,000—I think the number was 1,300,000 holdings over half an acre; and it is precisely in the districts indicated, that is to say, in the immediate vicinity of the villages, of the homes of the holders, that the great number of these small holdings will be found to exist. If that is so, the right hon. Gentleman will see that if this system is to be developed to the large extent that he desires, and that I hope, you must go further afield than the immediate vicinity of the villages for the purpose of giving effect to your measure. As a matter of fact, instead of bringing land to the houses and the buildings, you will have to consider whether, if the system is to be developed largely, the buildings and the houses should not be taken to the land. If this is not done, and compulsion is insisted upon, then when it is applied in the cases the right hon. Gentleman desires, to the villages, it will be found that it cannot be applied without dispossessing those already in occupation, and inflicting great injustice and injury on others. Everbody who is at all acquainted with the subject must know that it is the commonest thing in the world in the immediate vicinity of the villages to find land occupied as small holdings. That is one of the reasons why, in introducing this measure, and ever since, I have impressed upon the House that we should not be justified in regarding it as anything more than an experiment, but at the same time it is an experiment we hope will be attended by a reasonable amount of success. Now, Sir, I turn to the speech of the hon. Member for Bedford, who opened the Debate this afternoon. The hon. Member was good enough to say that my arguments were not sound and that they were insufficient. He summed up my statements as follows:—"The right hon. Gentleman tells us he believes in allotments, but that he does not believe in small holdings." The hon. Member must pardon me for saying that that is an entire and complete misrepresentation of anything I have ever said. What I have said and what I repeat is, that allotments have been proved to be a success, but that no one can say the same of the question of small holdings. Did the hon. Member go further than that himself? Did he hold out to us any expectations that he would be prepared to introduce a Bill of this kind into Parliament, and recommend it as a measure the success of which had been already ascertained and proved? No. He was very careful to abstain from doing anything of the kind. The hon. Member said my figures were extremely loose, and he attempted to discredit the proposition that I put before the House that there were large quantities of land to be disposed of by voluntary means now in the market. The hon. Member does not dispute that; he knows better than to do anything of the kind, and he knows that when I made the statement that there never was a time when there was more land in the market to dispose of than there is at present, I made a statement which, in the opinion of everybody save the hon. Member, is literally, absolutely, and notoriously true. "Someone," said the hon. Member, "must give way." Granted. Someone must give way. But did the hon. Member find any unreadiness on the part of the landowners in England to give way when the Allotments Act was passed?

MR. WHITBREAD: Yes, before there was compulsion in it.

*MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member says before compulsion was in it there was unreadiness. The hon. Member is so little informed upon the subject that he is evidently not aware that the Act never was without compulsion. The hon. Member had not a word to say that was good of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, on the night this measure was introduced, described it as an honest measure, in the right direction. What did the hon. Member for Bedford say on the subject? He says it is a futile measure; dangerous, because it is impossible that it can succeed: a measure with regard to which he ventured to think I never hoped or intended to succeed, and a measure which would end in nothing but disappointment to the class for whose benefit it is intended. If that be the hon. Member's opinion, why, did he not oppose it on the Second Reading like a man? If I may be forgiven for saying so, a feebleness of exhibition than the attitude of the hon. Member, and a better illustration of the man who is willing to wound and yet desperately afraid to strike, I do not think I have ever seen. Now, Sir, I am still at a loss to know, though I have asked the question several times, what are the reasons and arguments in favour of compulsion. There has not been one single valid argument adduced throughout the whole course of this Debate except this—that you cannot get the land so cheap without it. It is, I believe, in the minds of hon. Members opposite only a question of the price at which the land is to be obtained, and nothing else. They hope and think and believe, as the hon. Member for the Ilkeston Division said, that compulsion will prevent the price of land rising in the future—that is to say, that it will depreciate the value of the property of the landowner, and compel him to sell at a cheaper rate.

SIR W. FOSTER: I wish the right hon. Gentleman would not impute to me what I have already denied. I said compulsion would prevent land being raised in price—having an artificial value attached to it by the advent in the market of the new purchaser, who will be created by the Bill.

*MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member said compulsion would prevent the land from rising in value. That is the object of his proposal. He drew a distinction between preventing land rising in value and depreciating in value—a distinction which I cannot say that I am able to comprehend. But, granting that it is so, how is it possible to justify the measure on those grounds? It is said this Bill contemplates a national object. If that is so, then why throw the burden of making this national object a success, when you say cheapness of land is one of the first requisites, upon one class of the community, and one class alone? We have had no answer to that question, although it is a question we have a right to expect answered before accepting any proposition of that kind. I must own I am astonished at the passionate devotion, as it seems to me, of hon. Gentlemen opposite to this principle of compulsion. Because, Mr. Courtney, when you come to consider it, what is the meaning of compulsion? Compulsion, after all, is only another word for coercion, and in this case for coercion in a most aggressive form. When coercion has to be applied in order to protect the weak and the helpless from the lawlessness, the tyranny, and the oppression of the strong, when it is applied to coping with outrages or to extinguishing crime and giving security to the person, and the property and the lives of the subjects of the Queen; above all, when coercion is applied to banish the disgrace reflected on our common civilisation by occurrences like those of which I only read this morning, of the barbarous mutilation of dumb animals, then, Sir, both coercion and the Government which enforces it are held up by the right hon. Gentleman and his friends to the odium and the execration of the people in every constituency throughout the Kingdom. But when compulsion comes to be directed only against landowners, in order to depreciate the value of the property they possess, then it is, Sir, that coercion goes home with a responsive echo to the heart, and is garnered in the inmost feelings of every good and every pious Radical in the country as the symbol of everything that is sanctified and blessed, and the idol before which he is constrained to kneel, in worship and in adoration. Sir, it is because I object to the inconsistency of the attitude of hon. Gentlemen opposite that I protest against their arguments, and I hope I have done something, however small, to tear away the flimsy veil of their pretences on this question. We have listened fairly to—we have entirely disposed of—their contentions, such as they have been, and we are now of opinion that we may reasonably be allowed to arrive at a decision on this subject. Nothing, I believe, could be more injurious to the future prospects or working of this Bill than the principle of compulsion. But be that as it may, we shall not suffer it to be wrecked by the maladroit attempts of hon. Gentlemen opposite to improve it by what they call Amendments, but what I can only regard as obstructions to the satisfactory working of this measure; and I call upon the House of Commons with confidence to support me in resisting a proposal which I am perfectly convinced, in all the circumstances of the present time, will do more than anything we can imagine now to retard the successful operation of the Bill.

Mr. Chaplin

*(6.12.) MR. LAMBERT (Devon, South Molton): The right hon. Gentleman has said that he would call upon the House of Commons to give a verdict upon this question, and he confidently expected a favourable verdict; but I do not think he would confidently expect a favourable verdict on this question if he were to call upon the newly-elected Members in the agricultural districts. He has also defined compulsion as meaning coercion. If it meant coercion I should certainly say it would receive the approbation of hon. Gentlemen opposite, for it certainly seems to us that they are maintaining compulsion or coercion where we think it has failed. The right hon. Gentleman has not attempted to answer the argument which has been placed before him by more than one speaker—namely, that if compulsion is necessary for acquiring allotments of one acre, why is compulsion not necessary for acquiring holdings of three or four acres or more than that. We all admit that this is somewhat of an experiment; but our policy, indeed, our reason for proposing this Amendment, is that we want to make this experiment as successful as possible, we want to give it a firm basis in the rural districts. And I apprehend that it will only be by the introduction of compulsion that the measure can be made such a success as we all desire to see it. It seems to me if compulsion is not added to this Bill, if landlords in one portion of a county or district do not sell, and the County Council invests its capital in buying land in other portions of the locality or county, they will at least be guaranteeing their funds from one locality for the benefit of the other, and that certainly will create grave dissatisfaction in the rural districts. The argument about friction has been dealt with by other speakers before me, but it seems to me it would be a very poor opening indeed if a small holder had to look to the charitable instincts of his neighbours in order to make him a successful small holding owner. We certainly think that County Councils are Bodies that may fairly be entrusted with this power of compulsion. They would not take any undue advantage of it, but would use it only when necessary and with the greatest fairness. It has been stated by hon. Gentlemen opposite that there may be grievous injustice executed under this compulsory legislation. The Leader of the House has also stated that compulsion may be recklessly or ill applied, but it seems to me that does not come well from hon. Gentlemen opposite who have claimed so much credit for creating County Councils; and yet seem to be afraid to trust them. County Councils surely know the local circumstances of the case, they would not use these compulsory provisions unless they believed in them, and that they were absolutely necessary, and if land is not to be acquired unless by compulsory measures, why should not compulsion be used. I say it is infinitely more important that the rights of the community should be considered than the rights of one individual, to whom no injustice could be done because he would get a fair price for his land. I would strongly urge that in my opinion compulsion would undoubtedly oil the wheels of the machinery of this Bill, by quickening the apprehension of the landlord who would otherwise be unwilling to sell. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that compulsion cannot be carried into effect, and he cited the St. Faith case as an example. It seems to me that the St. Faith case is not an argument against compulsion but against the complicated system which has been introduced before compulsion can take effect under the Allotments Act. I do hold that a system of compulsory leasing will be of infinitely more advantage to the agricultural labourer than any attempt to create small holdings. There are very few agricultural labourers who can acquire the capital necessary—£150 to £200—to become small holders under this Bill, and small capitalists are not the ones we want to benefit by legislation. Men with £150 or £200 are not leaving the country districts, and this measure would not touch the class it is intended to touch—namely, the pure and simple agricultural labourers. Compulsion is very much more necessary when it is a question of leasing small holdings, for it is of paramount importance that the holding of the labourer should be in a convenient situation to his dwelling. It certainly would not pay him or the landlord to put up buildings upon a small holding, whereas the labourer's dwelling does constitute a building which he would be able to make use of. And if he can have this small holding near his home it would be a great incentive to him to better his position in life. Under this system small holdings may be carried into effect, the labourers may be able to take advantage of them, and perhaps in time they will be able to become owners. And I say from experience in country districts and of the County Council in my own county, there is not the slightest fear that the County Council will take undue advantage of this power, but that, without the principle of compulsion, this Act will be the same conspicuous failure which the Land Purchase Bill of last Session has proved to be.

(6.20.) Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 184; Noes 226.—(Div. List, No. 77.)

(6.35.) MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): The rejection of the last Amendment doubles the necessity for enlarging the scope of the Bill in regard to the acquisition of land. I should have thought that word would have covered more than the fee-simple, but after the explanation which the President of the Board of Agriculture has placed upon the word it is necessary this Committee should give its opinion as to widening the means for securing land for small agricultural holdings. By the rejection of the last Amendment the Committee has taken away the guarantee that land shall be got where land is most wanted for this purpose, and has taken away the guarantee that land shall be bought at a fair market price by the County Council for small agricultural holdings. It seems to me the argument the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) used on the Second Reading of the Bill is practically conclusive as to the value, the enormous value, of this or some such Amendment as this I have to propose. The provision which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) has inserted in his Bill, that no money can be raised over and above what may be met by a penny rate, imposes an important restriction on the power of the County Council, and it becomes of enormous importance that every facility should be given to the County Council for obtaining land on the best and easiest possible terms. Now, what are the terms for obtaining land—for the purchase of land—in fee-simple? The first difficulty is that it must be extremely small in quantity. Take the case of a small county with a rateable value of a quarter of a million, the amount at the disposal of a County Council in such a county would be £25,000 according to the reply the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin) gave to a question the other night. This amount of £25,000 would not allow the Council to provide more than one or two small holdings in each parish. For the accomplishment of this the County Council will have to undertake the choice of the land; then an enormous amount of time and energy will have to be expended in the negotiations for the purchase of these one or two small holdings; then if negotiations are concluded there will be the difficulty and expense of proving the title; and the time and cost of concluding the transaction repeated in the case of the land for each parish will be enormous. But suppose we take the other alternative, and give the County Council power to take land on lease or to hire land? The County Council would, in the first place, have the choice as to how the land would best be taken. In many cases they might find it impossible to obtain the fee-simple where the owner would be unwilling to sell or would only sell at a price the Council would not be warranted in giving. But the owner might be willing to lease a farm of large size, retaining ownership and not breaking the entirety of his estate. In the ordinary course of events a farm may become vacant and a number of acres may be at the disposal of the County Council much in excess of the amount of land they could acquire by means of purchase. From the point of view of the County Council there would be much more opportunity of meeting the demand for small holdings, and there would be an advantage from the point of view of small holders. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian in his speech to-night, and on a previous occasion, has shown conclusively that it is impossible for the ordinary agricultural labourer to take a small holding on the terms presented in the Bill. Take the case of an allotment holder who, in good circumstances, has been able to avail himself of the Act, or take the case of a labourer who has lived on the homestead, and, paying no rent, has been able to save £150, and is anxious to have a small holding. Under the terms of the Bill he would have to pay a quarter of the purchase money for ten acres, say £25, and for securing the title and making the land his own he pays, say, £140, and is left with £10 to stock his farm, begin his buildings, and provide for his first instalment of the remaining three-fourths. It has been shown conclusively that it will be absolutely impossible for any appreciable number of agricultural labourers to avail themselves of the provisions and benefits of the Bill. I hope that I need not delay the Committee any longer, and that the Government will accept this and consequent Amendments largely increasing the powers of County Councils to obtain land, and largely increasing the opportunities for agricultural labourers to secure small holdings. These may not be the right or the only words by which the object may be effected; but without the acceptance of some such words I feel certain, more especially after the rejection of the last Amendment, that the Bill will be a failure, to the disappointment of agricultural labourers, whose hopes have been raised by speeches of right hon. Gentlemen opposite. If this is refused there will naturally arise strong feelings of resentment, and punishment will await the authors of a Bill from which so much was expected.

Mr. Lambert

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, after the second "Act," insert "lease, hire, or."—(Mr. T. E. Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(6.45.) MR. CHAPLIN: I am quite aware of the importance of the question raised by this Amendment. I admit that there is much to be said on both sides, and I hope we may be able to meet the views of a good many hon. Gentlemen on the other side. I think I stated on an earlier stage of the Bill I was greatly attracted by the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian that land should be acquired by lease or feu; but after carefully considering the proposal I find the balance of argument is against it. I cannot, in the short time now at my disposal, go into the reasons which induce me to think that the principle of the creation of freeholds should be the first thing to be considered rather than the creation of a great number of tenancies. But it has been suggested—and this is the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Gladstone)—that it might be desirable and possible that Local Authorities should acquire land by feu instead of by purchase, and I have gone carefully into an examination of the Bill, taking counsel with the Attorney General, with the result that we find the power to feu land is conferred upon Local Authorities by the Bill—that is to say, they can take payment by means of a perpetual rent-charge instead of by a capital sum. That gets over one of the main objections of the right hon. Gentleman to the Bill, in the first instance, that Local Authorities require the payment of a capital sum. I recognise that it is desirable that greater facilities should be given to agricultural labourers in particular to have the opportunity of obtaining land on a tenure other than ownership. This is a subject I should like to dwell on at more length than I can this afternoon, for there are some very grave considerations arising on the proposal. But, at the same time, I may say that when we reach Clause 3 we propose to make what we feel is a considerable concession to the right hon. Gentleman. In Clause 3, Sub-section 2, there is this limitation—that in the opinion of the County Council the persons to whom the land is let must be persons who in their opinion will be able, if permitted to occupy a small holding, ultimately to be the buyers. I propose to omit that, and thus give the opportunity, of which labourers may be deprived under the clause as it stands, of obtaining a small holding. It is impossible for me within the limited time left for the Sitting to say more, but we shall be prepared to make this concession, and possibly, when we come to an Amendment later in the Bill, but which has also some bearing on this question, after having heard what may be said on both sides, to make a further concession in the same direction.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.

(No. 31.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. SPEAKER: The two Motions for Instruction to the Committee are both out of Order. I, therefore, leave the Chair.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House will, upon Wednesday, 22nd June, again resolve itself into the said Committee."—(Mr. G. W. Balfour.)

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I object. The hon. Member takes the first Wednesday after the Whitsuntide Vacation. I object, and I understand that by the Standing Order if objection be taken at this stage the question stands over. I ask your ruling on the point.

MR. SPEAKER: It is for the hon. Member in charge of the Bill to appoint the date when the Bill will be taken unless the House should decide otherwise.

MR. SPEAKER ascertained by the preponderance of voices that the House was in favour of Wednesday, 22nd June.

Committee to sit again on Wednesday, 22nd June.

MAIL SERVICE (IRELAND) CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): With reference to the correspondence on the acceleration of the Dublin and Queens-town mail service, may I ask if my Motion will be granted?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: I shall put it down for Monday.

THE EASTER RECESS.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I said something at two o'clock to-day as to the possibility of my making a statement at this hour regarding the Easter holidays. I find it will be more convenient if I make the statement at the rising of the House to-night, and this I shall be prepared to do.

EVENING SITTING.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE SEPTENNIAL ACT.

*SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name, viz.:—

"That in the opinion of this House the Septennial Act should be repealed for the purpose of shortening the duration of future Parliaments."

In doing so I will ask the indulgence of the House while I endeavour, in a short space of time, to open this truly important subject, which, on many occasions, has provided matter for Debates of considerable interest. In the first place, I wish to say that I intend to discuss the subject as far as I possibly can without the introduction of anything like Party passion, and to treat it from the general point of view of the electorate of the country. My first object is the repeal of the Septennial Act, and then I propose that the duration of Parliaments should be shortened. The Septennial Act dates from 1716, and was passed to meet a temporary danger to the Constitution. That danger has long since passed away. The Preamble of the Act sets out the reasons for it in a clear and definite manner. Among other reasons it recites that the Triennial Act—

"If it should continue, it may probably at this juncture, when a restless and Popish faction are designing and endeavouring to renew the rebellion within this Kingdom, and an invasion from abroad, be destructive to the peace and security of the Government."

The Act referred to the rebellion then happily suppressed, but there was still some danger of a renewal of disturbances from frequent Elections, and consequently the lengthening of the duration of Parliaments from three to seven years was carried out. At that time it was regarded by many, and more especially by the Representatives of the Tory Party, as an encroachment on the Constitution which made three years' Parliaments the law: an encroachment on the part of the Whigs, no doubt justifiable, although there were strong protests against it. In the House of Lords there was a very strong protest from 30 Peers against the Bill signed by the Duke of Devonshire and Lord Salisbury. But protests in either House were ineffectual, and the duration of Parliaments was extended from three to seven years. The Triennial Act thus repealed was passed in 1694, and the Preamble of that Act declared—

"Whereas by ancient Laws and Statutes of the Realm frequent Parliaments ought to be held, and whereas frequent new Parliaments tend very much to the happy union and the good agreement of the King and his people."

Well, there are many of us on this side of the House, and I hope many who have inherited the principles of their predecessors on the other side of the House, who still feel that frequent Parliaments are for the good of the nation at large, and bring about a closer sympathy between the rulers and the ruled. At one time the Motion I am now moving was repeated almost annually in the House of Commons. It was repeated for a long number of years while the Whigs remained in office, not only by the adversaries of the Whigs, but by a faction of the Whigs called "Patriots." From time to time attacks on the Septennial Act were renewed until, in the course of political events, those who led the attack obtained seats on the other side of the House, when the zeal of reformers in Opposition gave place to the complacent indifference of statesmen in Office. These yearly Motions of the old reformers were carried on to nearer our own time. In the early stages of Parliamentary reform we had this shortening of the duration of Parliaments made one of the chief planks in the Liberal platform. It was among the six points of the People's Charter, and in all the early discussions of reform it ran close in importance to the extension of the franchise. I do not propose to-night to enter at any further length into the history of this great question, but this I will say—that the old Debates on the subject will well repay perusal by any hon. Member who may devote time to them, not only from the rich quaintness of the language and arguments used, but from the energy of the opposition to the extension of Parliamentary life. The history of the custom of yearly or triennial Parliaments was most eloquently expounded in the last Debate twelve years ago by Mr. Joseph Cowen, then Member for Newcastle. Twelve years ago seems a long period for a question like this to remain dormant. But it has slumbered only—it has never died. In 1883, when Parliamentary reform was in the air, it was much discussed, and popular feeling was strong in its favour. But it became overshadowed by the question of the extension of the franchise—that great and crowning triumph of Parliamentary reform in our day. And this other question, deemed subsidiary, but intimately connected with the freedom of the popular voice, was allowed to take a secondary place, while the extension of the franchise absorbed the attention of the Legislature. But the notion of making the life of Parliament an entirely secondary question is, I think, founded on a mistake, for the possession of a vote is only of avail when associated with the opportunity for exercising it. To give a large extension of the franchise, and to keep from the people, or a large number of them, their just opportunity of making their voices heard in the election of the Parliament that rules them and makes their laws, is a one-sided and unequal distribution of the benefits of reform. This point was argued in the Reform discussions of 1883, and an admirable history of the movement for short Parliaments was written by Mr. Alexander Paul, full of quaint extracts from the speeches of the old reformers. In 1886 there was evidence that the feeling had still been growing, for ever since then there has been year by year before the House a Bill most ably drawn for a complete scheme of reform, introduced by the hon. Member for Bethnal Green (Mr. George Howell); one of the points of which has been the limitation of the duration of Parliaments—the repeal of the Septennial Act. Now, I want to-night more especially to call attention to the effect of the Act on the duration of Parliaments in more recent times. I think I shall be able to show, from reference to the duration of Parliaments since the Act was passed, that the effect has been to lengthen the life of Parliaments, and that that effect has been increasing in late years. If we take the first period after the introduction of the Act, from the date of its passing, 1716, to 1801, we find that in that period there were 13 Parliaments. Of these eight lasted over six years, three over five and a half years, one nearly five years, and one three years and five months. So within that period, the Act passed for lengthening the duration of Parliament, and directed to meet the dangers of a time when rebellion was rife, and appeals to the electorate were said to be dangerous, had full effect for the purpose intended. Now from 1801 to the present time there have been 22 Parliaments, giving an average of over four years each, so that the duration of Parliaments from 1801 to the present time may be said to be limited by practice to that period of four to five years. Of these 22 Parliaments three lasted over six years. Six (including the present) lasted over five years. But if we compare different periods since 1801 we find that the duration of Parliaments has varied considerably. From 1801 to 1830 there were seven Parliaments, giving an average of about four years each. From 1830 to 1860 there were ten Parliaments, giving an average duration of three years. Then, if we take the period from 1860 to the present time, we find six Parliaments, giving an average duration of over five years. The tendency, therefore, in recent times has been to increase the duration of Parliament to five years, whereas the average of the 92 years since 1801 was only a little over four years. An increase in the length of Parliaments in recent times has, then, been brought about by the operation of the Septennial Act, aided to a considerable extent by the presence of powerful majorities under the personal influence very often of Prime Ministers of exceptional genius and ability. But this action has not been popular, and I think the best evidence of the unpopularity of long Parliaments is shown in the extreme swing of the political pendulum in successive elections. If we take the more recent elections this is most clearly made out. In the period since the Reform Bill of 1868 it comes out in remarkable figures. In 1868 a Parliament was elected in which there was a Liberal majority of 128. That Parliament lasted five years one month and 16 days. Well, on an appeal to the electorate in 1874 the representation was almost reversed, the pendulum swung over to the other side, the Conservative majority became 106, replacing the Liberal majority of the previous Parliament of 128. This Conservative Parliament of 1874 lasted a little longer than its predecessor, six years and 20 days. Then in 1880 we find the figures exactly reversed; the Conservative majority of 106 was replaced by a Liberal majority of 106. This Parliament of 1880 with a Liberal majority of 106 lasted for five years six months and 20 days; but during the last few months of that period the Liberal majority were not in office. In 1885 an appeal was made to the country, after there had been considerable alterations in the franchise. The county franchise was extended, and a numerous class was added to the electorate. Now, on that occasion the new Parliament returned a Liberal majority of nearly 100, exclusive of Irish Members, and that apparently falsifies the law I am endeavouring to establish—namely, that lengthening the duration of Parliament brings about a swing of opinion to the opposite point. But if we analyse the direction from which that majority came, we shall find that the law I am endeavouring to lay down was maintained even in this exceptional instance. In 1885 the appeal was made to a great and new electorate in the agricultural districts of the country through the extension of the franchise to rural labourers; from these came the Liberal majority. If we look, however, at those parts of the Kingdom that returned Members to the House on the old electorate — the boroughs where the franchise had not been altered by the Reform Act of 1884—there we find the same law still holding good. The Parliament of 1880 gave in the boroughs 85 Conservative Members and 185 Liberals, giving the latter a majority of 100 in the borough representation; the Parliament of 1885 showed 115 Conservative Members from the boroughs and 110 Liberals, a Liberal minority of five in the boroughs to replace a majority of 100. So, my contention is unaltered by the result of the Election of 1885, the swing of opinion, as before, endeavouring to substitute a change of Parties in consequence of the undue prolongation of Parliamentary life. Now, I think the inference from the figures I have given is that there grows up in the constituencies a feeling of resentment against too long a duration of Parliaments and the long continuance of one Party in power. I do not think it is due merely to fickleness on the part of the electorate as some have said; on the contrary, I believe the electorate never were more inclined to follow and maintain the principles they have adopted, but I believe the electorate do get tired of one set of men being in office too long. People in the present day know the character of the work of Parliament. Parliamentary work is carried on under a vigilant scrutiny of the people of this country such as did not exist in the old time, and I think they have noted the fact, and taken it to heart, that in all the Parliaments to which I have referred the best work has been done in the earlier years. So we must agree it was with the Liberal Parliament elected in 1868. The great legislative work of that Parliament was done in its earlier years, and I believe the fortunes of the Party would have been better, if the Government had retired a year or two before they did, instead of holding on to office for the period I have indicated. Certainly, with reference to the Parliament of 1874, its best work was done in its earlier years, particularly in its social legislation. That Parliament, although it kept a Government in office by a vigorous majority for a number of years, and had the influence in its favour of the so-called "Jingo" fever, yet that Parliament outlived the impulse of "Jingoism," which subsided under the eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Gladstone). Again, with reference to the Parliament of 1880, setting aside the great Reform Act passed in its last days, it did its best work in its earliest years. It would seem as if these long-lived Parliaments, after three or four years, lose touch with the people, and cease to be in harmony with the desires and aspirations of the electorate, and so, when the appeal is made, the Party in power meet with the condign punishment of a reversal of the judgment given at the previous Election. This is natural, I think, on other grounds. If one considers for a moment the enormous alterations in the electorate itself, there is ample reason for the constituencies becoming out of touch, out of harmony with a Parliament which has lived so long. Taking the figures of the last Census of the United Kingdom I find we have every year 255,000 men becoming eligible by age to be put on the register. Unfortunately, only a small proportion of the number do get on the register; but a considerable number are added every year, and we may expect, as time goes on, and the difficulties of registration are removed by future legislation, that many more thousands will be annually added to the electoral roll. Taking England and Wales, I also find that since 1886—that is, in five years—there has been an average of nearly 90,000 electors added each year. This is an enormous addition to the voting power of the country, especially when we consider that at the last General Election 100,000 votes would have made a vast difference in the representation of Parties in this House. Multiply this 90,000 by five, and we have nearly half a million of new electors at the end of a five years' Parliament. That is not all. According to statistics, it may be estimated that 74,000 persons die out of the register every year, and, adding these, there are thus in round figures 164,000 changes in the register each year, and the grand result is that there is a change to the number of 820,000 votes in the electorate to which a Parliament appeals at the end of five years. That is an enormous change: one-sixth of the entire electorate changed during the existence of a five years' Parliament. Is it any wonder that under such circumstances, at the end of its long life, a Parliament ceases to be representative? Is there not truth in the comment of an old Member, made two centuries ago, that Parliament is like manna—when it first comes from Heaven, it is fresh and pure and sweet in the mouth, but if kept long it only breedeth worms?—a forcible way of describing the corrupting influence of time; but that influence in the decay of sympathy with the people, and in the want of harmony with popular wishes, exists in these days, though it is referred to in less forcible language. This enormous change in the composition of the electorate is sufficient to account to some extent for the extreme swing of the political pendulum, and I believe the shorter duration of Parliaments would result not only in greater harmony between Parliament and the people, but in greater stability in the composition of the House of Commons itself, and by that very stability would afford opportunity for a more continuous policy in matters domestic and foreign. I have not in my Resolution fixed any time limit for the duration of Parliament; that may be left for statesmen in the future, who will draft the next Bill dealing with the subject; but I hope, when they do consider it, they will limit the duration very considerably. So far as my own opinion goes, I would say four instead of seven years. When we think of the changed conditions of life since 1716, seven years of our day are equal to 20 of the olden time. That is not an exaggerated estimate when we consider the enormous advances we have made in popular knowledge and education, the great influence of the Press on public opinion, the means of rapid communication with people far away from us, the wonders worked by electricity, the almost miraculous annihilation of space, the great characteristic of modern scientific progress—taking all these things into consideration, I think we must agree that if in

Sir Walter Foster

1716 seven years were long enough for the duration of Parliament, it is vastly too long a period in 1892. Parliament in a long life changes its attitude to the people, but represents in itself comparatively little change. Members sent here to vote for either Party retain, and very often acquire, an additional dose of the original sin called "political partisanship." They retain the same attitude they assumed at the time of election towards great questions then occupying men's minds. We know in the present Parliament how solid has been the majority on one side of the House in carrying out a policy which we believe will be reversed when an appeal is made to the country. But although Parliament remains very much the same, I have shown from figures and other arguments that people outside change very much, and so the influence of the constituency on the Member, or of the Member on the constituency is, I think, considerably lessened. As "Junius" wrote—

"With regard to the influence of the constituent over the conduct of the Representative there is little difference between a seat in Parliament for seven years and one for life. The prospect of your resentment is too remote, and although the last Session of a septennial Parliament may usually be employed in court- ing the favour of the people, consider at this rate your Representatives have six years for offence and but one for atonement. A death-bed repentance seldom reaches to restitution."

That opinion of "Junius" is appropriate, I think, to the present day. Although a Government may in the last year of office, with the death rattle almost in its throat, pay more deference to opinions to which they paid no respect in former years, yet that does not come up to the point of restitution, and does not atone for the wrongs arising out of a too long duration of Parliamentary life. But there is a change in Parliament in other ways. In four or five years the Members change not only in their relations to their constituencies, but become more crystallised in their Party vote. An old Coventry Member once said, "Men come hither free men, but are here made bondmen." Hon. Members opposite, who have long been under the domination of the Whips, can appreciate what it is to be a bondman in the present day. It may be good discipline for individual Members, and essential for the success of the Party in office; but at the same time it produces facile votes: a result not always desirable in what ought to be the independent Representatives of the constituencies of the country. In shorter Parliaments Members would have a somewhat happier lot than at present. Their lot would be rendered happier by the inward conviction that they were in closer sympathy with their constituencies. It must, I am sure, be unpleasant to any Member of this House to feel he is out of touch with his constituents, and that feeling must overtake many of us in the course of a long Parliament. If there is one thing more than another which makes a seat worth holding in this House and an honour to the holder, it is the fact of being the real Representative of the wishes and feelings and interests of the people you represent. Nothing else would make the drudgery of Parliamentary life at all tolerable to the mind of an independent man. Mr. Bright expressed his opinion on this point in very forcible language in a Debate on Parliamentary Reform. He said—

“He believed it would be better for Members if they were more responsible to their constituents at the beginning of a Parliament. He found them suffering from an intense feeling of responsibility just before a Dissolution. He should like that the feeling of responsibility should be spread over the whole period of Parliament. He believed that it would add very much to the conscientiousness with which Members would perform their duty to that House. It would render it difficult for the Government to call a Party meeting in Downing Street to frighten them with a Dissolution, a course pursued by Governments from both sides greatly to the injury of the House.”

That feeling of responsibility to the constituency is one of the most wholesome feelings that can exist in this House, and would be strengthened and maintained by a shorter duration of Parliament better than by the present system. It has been urged that shorter Parliaments are not advisable on the ground of expense. None of us desire too frequent elections; but once in four years would not be too often to call on Members to bear the expense. I think the expenses would be lessened by shorter Parliaments, even if they were not lessened by law. Members would find it less worth while to spend money for a seat for three or four years than they do now for five or six years. On the other hand, it is contended that the personal labour of Parliamentary life would be increased. I am not at all convinced on that point; I believe, if anything, it would be lessened. At all events, it would not be worse than during the last five years. For that period Members on both sides have been engaged, as it were, in a continual election contest from one end of the country to the other, and the result has been a great strain on public attention, and on the health and strength of individual Members. Another result has been the building up of a great political programme for the Party to which I belong, which we hope to carry out. Hon. Members opposite say that a four or five years' Parliament would never carry out the Newcastle programme; we are prepared to take the risk. We feel that so much of it would be carried out that we could appeal with confidence to the electors to give us a chance of carrying out the rest, and in future such great programmes would not grow up, because the desires and wishes of the people in three or four years would not be so great as they become in five or six years. Another point is that the personal change in long Parliaments becomes very great. It is argued that shorter Parliaments would introduce many new men. I think we have seen many changes in this Parliaments, and we hear on all sides of a number of men who are unwilling to come back to the arduous labour of Parliamentary life, and no one can regret that more than I do. I think that would be prevented if we had shorter Parliaments; a larger number of Members would be willing again to serve their constituents than under the present system. The results of inquiries in foreign countries as to the duration of Parliamentary Bodies ought to convince this House that we, the mother of Parliaments, have been lagging a little behind our offspring. In none of our colonies have we sanctioned septennial Parliaments, and in no other Continental country is the duration, seven years. We believe work would be more effective with shorter Parliaments; we should come fresh from our constituencies with a fresh mandate, and carry it out in the first three or four years of our existence, and not drag on, as sometimes happens, a comparatively useless life to the end of the tether allowed by law. The practice for the last 100 years has been for Parliament to dissolve in about four years; I do not see why that should not be sanctioned by law, and so the law made to agree with the practice. There are many other points and arguments which I will not trespass on the time of the House to give, but, in conclusion, I thank the House for its indulgence, and hope that this Resolution will receive support from both sides. The Tory Party were the first and strongest opponents of the Septennial Act, and I hope their descendants have not degenerated. It is true that at that time they were out of office, and remained so for many years. It has been said that "no one man in office has ever promoted or encouraged a Bill for shortening the duration of Parliament." If that has been true in the past, I hope it will not be so in the future. The opportunity now rests with the Leader of the House; he has the opportunity of saying that he agrees with the old Tory principle of shorter Parliaments. He described himself the other night, in a very interesting speech, as "an old Tory politician." I ask him to-night to support old Tory principles and vote for shortening the duration of Parliaments. If he does so—the authorities are not all on my side of the House—I would refer him to many distinguished Members of his Party who have worked in this cause. I would refer him to the most distinguished of his predecessors in recent times — Mr. Disraeli — who, in 1848, said—

"I am the less inclined to say anything against Triennial Parliaments, because they are part of those old Tory principles which I have ever taken every opportunity of propagating; they are a portion of that old Tory creed around which I am happy to observe more than one indication that the people of this country are inclined to rally."

If he lets them rally round it to-night he will do much for the benefit of Parliament, and for bringing about that purification of it, which results from an appeal to the people. There are many distinguished Members of former Parliaments whom I might quote on my side—Members of the Whig, the Radical, and the Tory Parties—but I think I have given enough to back up my appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, and I would appeal beyond him to this House, to shorten the duration of Parliaments in future. I believe it would add to the dignity and character of the House of Commons, and to the usefulness of our legislation. It would bring about a higher and better relation between the Crown and the people, and finally make the House of Commons, in the highest and best sense, what it ought to be—in the words of Mr. Pitt—"an Assembly united to the people by the closest sympathies."

* (9.43.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): The Mover of the Resolution has spoken with so much force and clearness that there is no need for me to say more than a few words in seconding the Resolution. In fixing the duration of Parliament we must be guided by two considerations—it must not last so long that it will get out of touch with the people or lead them to be discontented because they have not an opportunity of expressing their opinions. On the other hand, the period must not be so short as to disturb the progress of business by frequent elections. I do not think anybody is in favour of extending Parliament beyond seven years, and then there is the other side of the question. I remember very well the agitation in favour of annual Parliaments. A great many of the proposals of the Chartists have become law; that one has not, and I do not think it has grown in favour with either people or politicians. But seven years is much too long. My hon. Friend has shown that long Parliaments get out of touch with the people. He has shown it a priori by pointing out the inevitable change in the electorate which is made by a few years, and a posteriori by showing that on a dissolution of a long Parliament, the election has proved that the people were thinking very differently to what Parliament was thinking. I do not fear large changes in many things; but I desire that change should be gradual; and if it be gradual and not revolutionary, it may in the long run be very great, and yet be perfectly safe. Parliament ought to exist only so long as the Members represent the people; it is not desirable that they should sit one day longer than they possess the confidence of the people. I do not measure that confidence by momentary impulses and expressions of opinion. The people elect us, and we come here to legislate according to their wishes, and so long as we have reasonable ground for believing that we are, on the whole, representing their wishes, there can be no legal or constitutional objection to our continuing to occupy our positions. But when we find that a change is in progress, and that it is continuous and progressive, and is increasing from year to year, then it is time for Parliament to be dissolved. I have no desire to speak in any Party spirit on this occasion; but I think those who have looked at the bye-elections for the past four or five years will find abundant evidence that the wave or tide which has been advancing is a real tide, and not merely a splash of the waves in one or two places. It is shown, as all tides are, by rising high in some places and lower in others, but it is continuous and almost universal. I have examined the bye-elections for two years and there has been a gain for one Party—the Liberal Party—in every election but four, and only one of those four is really of very substantial importance, that of Aston Manor; and in two other cases there was only a slight diminution of the Liberal majority. I want to ask whether there is not another indication, not only that seven years is too long, but that the present Parliament has sat long enough? I have been struck during the short time I have been in the House with the air of languor manifest in the great mass of the Debates and the small attendance on all but very important occasions. It is not at all uncommon to find present only 20 Members on the one side and 20 Members on the other out of 670 Members. As a general rule there are more persons at a Division than are present in the House, and during the present Session, until yesterday, there were only four Divisions where there were more than 400 Members present—that is, very little more than half the total number of Members have shown by their votes that they take any real part in the business of the House. I think that is some indication that this Parliament has reached its period of real usefulness. If this kind of thing is to continue, it would be well to revert to the old practice under which the Sheriff required two persons to stand surety that the Member would attend when elected. Is it not natural that after four or five years many Members should have had enough of active service in the House? It should be remembered that many of us are elected late in life, and our time is not always at our own disposal, and that the hours of attendance are likely to make those getting on in years somewhat weary. We should get Representatives to sit for periods during which they would not get wholly out of sympathy with the work, or unable to perform it properly. But the main consideration is, does not this period of seven years put the Members out of their proper relation to the people they are professing to represent? At the present time this House does not represent the opinion of the people of England, Scotland, and Ireland, in 1892; what it really represents is a slightly modified expression of the opinion in 1886. It is not safe for the country generally, it is not wise for us as Representatives, or judicious for the people who desire to see their wishes carried out and work done, that we should stay one day longer in office than the confidence of the people is fully placed in us. Seven years is very different now to what it was at the beginning of the last century. The people of England are not separated by great distances, as many of them were, from the proceedings of the House, so that they only got occasional glimpses of what took place in the House. They are practically present with us, and it is obvious that they come more quickly to a decision than they used to do. And I do not think we shall be doing our duty if we do not give them more frequent opportunities of saying who shall be their servants, what measures they consider most important, and what principles they desire to be put in action. I do not wish to lay down any arbitrary rule as to the period, but I am inclined to think that five years instead of seven years would be quite long enough, for that would mean practically a four years' Parliament. Some people, I know, think that a little too long; but I think in that time a Parliament acting with vigour, and carrying out the instructions of its constituents, would do very much more useful work than a Parliament which drags out a weary existence in its last years under the Septennial Act.

Sir Walter Foster

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the Septennial Act should be repealed, for the purpose of shortening the duration of future Parliaments,"—(Sir Walter Foster.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(9.58.) MR. AMBROSE (Middlesex, Harrow): I wish to congratulate both the Mover and Seconder on the conciliatory tone they have adopted, and the moderation of the views they have expressed. But I have been somewhat struck by the peculiarity of their arguments, because, as I understood them, what they have put forward with a view of supporting this Resolution, to my mind, is an argument in an exactly opposite direction. One of the hon. Members gave various figures representing the majorities in the Parliaments of 1868, 1874, and 1880, and said that the majority of 1868 was changed in 1874, and the majority of 1874 was reversed in 1880. This he declared was calculated to give greater solidity to the Government. I thought it was important to the maintenance of a Government that there should be continuity of policy; that there should not be fickleness on the part of the Government of the day, and that when a policy was declared and acted upon it should be continuous. Take, for instance, the case of Ireland. When the right hon. Member for Midlothian introduced his Home Rule Bill he observed that our treatment of that country had been unequal, and thus unfair, and that at one time we had a Government which courted the favour of the Irish people, and at another a Government which produced Coercion Bills. That is the swing of the political pendulum, and it is to that very swing that the right hon. Gentleman attributes many of the evils which affect Ireland. I always thought that one of the evils of a strictly democratic Government was that there was no permanence of policy. The populace was fickle, and frequently foiled statesmen in their efforts at wise government. They were apt to be led away by any outcry of the moment, or by sensational articles in the newspapers. Is it the object of this Resolution that the Government and the country should be governed by sensational writers in the newspapers? I have a great respect for the Press, and when the Press produces sensational articles based on fact and reason no one respects the Press more than I do. But that is one thing, and I say that the interests of the British Empire should not be left to the writers of sensational articles or the changeable views of the populace, but should be dealt with by the steady views of statesmen and of men who have been sent to Parliament as the Representatives of the people, and not merely as delegates. That is another point which has been raised. If you are a Representative of the people you do not need to be going back to the people every now and then, because the people have confidence in you. But the whole force of the argument of the Mover of this Resolution is that when a man comes into this House, he comes, not as a Representative of the people, but as the delegate of his constituents, and, as I say, of that portion of his constituents who may force themselves to the front and claim to be the representatives of the people whom he actually represents in this House. That is a very different thing from the position of a Member under present circumstances, when he is really the Representative of the people, and ought to be free from pledges with respect to particular Bills, and free to exercise his judgment on a subject which may come before the House. I came into this House unfettered, and if I come again I will come free to exercise my own judgment.

Mr. Roby

I quite recognise that there are particular questions which affect a constituency sometimes on which the constituency has a right to ask for the support of its Member. But you find one section of a constituency wanting its Member to vote one way on the liquor question and another section wanting him to vote for the deceased wife's sister, and you would find Members come into this House bound hand and foot by their pledges upon the hustings. If it is the wish of the Mover of the Resolution, let us understand it. Are Members of this House to be free to use their intelligence and experience, or are they to be merely the delegates of a faction, and to surrender their own judgment in order that they may carry out the behests of that faction which is most forward at the time of the election? I know of nothing more calculated to hamper the usefulness of a Member of this House than the feeling that he is bound to act upon the instructions of a section who say that they represent his constituents. We all know that as soon as any particular class is affected by any Bill, an organisation is started, with branches and secretaries, and influence is brought to bear in the constituencies, and a number of people who profess to speak in the name of the constituency try to bring pressure on the Member. When I am told that my constituents wish this, that, or the other, I reply that I am their Representative, and I take every opportunity of learning their views, but I decline to recognise any particular section who profess to speak for the whole. And I say I know of nothing so calculated to lower the tone of the House as that Members should give up the position they have occupied and become mere delegates. Another argument which rather pointed the other way was the one that shorter Parliaments would shorten their labours. Does the hon. Member mean to say that as a Parliament ceases the labour of a Member ceases? One of the difficulties which has arisen in this House this Session is that so many Members, under the belief that the Dissolution is imminent, are electioneering and cannot be here. Does the hon.

Member mean to say that that shortens the labours of a Member? It increases their labours fourfold, or even more than that, and I say that frequent election campaigns are calculated so to increase his duties as to unfit him for the honest, faithful, and serious discharge of his duties. The hon. Member who last spoke (Mr. Roby) says that he has observed the languor of the debates, and the small attendance of Members, and half suggested, I believe, that there should be some security for attendance. Does he suggest that the Business of this House would be better done if there were 500 or 600 Members sitting on these Benches than when the ordinary number are present? If he does I disagree with him, for I think that the worst thing that could happen to this House is a large attendance of Members at every Sitting. Such an attendance is not only wholly unnecessary, but it would be found to be very inconvenient. Very little Business would be done. I do not accept the hon. Member's estimate of 20 or 30 as the number generally present in the House. I put the normal number down at something like 100, and I say that number is much safer for the discharge of the ordinary duties of the House than a larger number would be. The work is now done, to a large extent, by delegation. It is not always the same 100 men who are present. A particular question arises, and the men who are interested in that question are present, and those who are not interested may be in the libraries preparing for other questions that are coming on. The other men come in when the Division bell rings, and are instructed by those who have been present. It is, as I have said, a question of delegation. When a financial question is on, the City men are here, and the other Members, when they come in, are content to follow their lead. So it is with questions of Local Government and other questions—the men who are experts on the particular subject before the House are here, and the others are quite content to leave the matter in their hands, knowing that it will be treated with full knowledge. What would be the effect of extremely short Parliaments? The Members would not have as much experience as is necessary for the proper discharge of their duties. I do not know what may be the experience of other Members, but for a long time after I came in I had a difficulty with the forms of the House. Then I suppose, just as I began to feel my way, hon. Members would wish that I should go back to my constituents, and perhaps a new man comes in who has to go through the experience that I went through before I think the experience of the House, and the knowledge of—I will not say statesmanship, because that would be an impertinence on my part, but the knowledge of Government matters and the affairs of the nation—for one cannot help becoming acquainted with them to some extent in this House—all that would be thrown away if we were constantly changing the Members, which is the view suggested by these frequent dissolutions. But there is another argument against the proposal which is far more important in this connection and which seems to me to be most conclusive. It is a fact, of which we have evidence every day, especially by the questions put to Ministers, that some of those who occupy the Front Bench are supposed at all events to have great difficulty in dealing with the permanent officials of the Government. I want to know if you are to have a constant change of Parliament how are you to keep the permanent officials under control? You must have these permanent officials under the control of Members of the Government who are responsible to Parliament; but if you have these constant changes of Parliament you will have constant changes on both Front Benches, you will have constant changes of Ministers; and the result will be that you will have Ministers who have insufficient experience to assert their proper authority over the permanent officials, and you will have the Government of the day—and if you have the Government of the day then you will have this House—practically controlled by irresponsible permanent officials. There is this further argument: that however much we shorten the duration of Parliaments, we must recognise this fact, that whenever you come to the last year, and a dissolution is imminent, as soon as you come to that the Members of the House have their attention directed to electioneering, and the business of the House is neglected. Nobody has got energy enough to apply themselves to the real business of the House. Suppose you reduce the duration of Parliament to four or five years, as soon as you got into the fifth year the very difficulty which we now see in the case of a seven years' Parliament would be apparent, and there is no getting over it. The next movement would be to reduce it from five to four, from four to three, from three to two, and so it would be brought to a minimum, till, in fact, you would have annual Parliaments, and the swinging of the political pendulum would then be to your most entire satisfaction. But the result would be that you would have no permanency, no continuity. Our foreign policy would change from day to day, our domestic Government would change from day to day, and our policy as regards Ireland would change from day to day. That would be most disastrous. Therefore I shall vote against this Resolution.

Mr. Ambrose

(10.18.) MR. COGHILL (Newcastle-under-Lyme): The hon. Member who moved this Resolution told us that this question had slumbered for the last twelve years, but I must say that this question might be allowed to slumber on for twelve years longer. I do not remember myself that either in the year 1880, or in the year 1885, when a Liberal majority was returned, this question formed a leading item in the Liberal programme. This Resolution has been most ingeniously worded, because while it proposes that all future Parliaments should be shortened, it evades all mention of the precise term to which they should be shortened. So far as the present Parliament is concerned it is well within the terms of the Resolution. The present Parliament has only lasted five years and nine months, which is a long way off seven years. The hon. Member for Ilkeston would be inclined to set up a Parliament at any particular period; the hon. Member for the Eccles Division suggests five years. In this diversity of counsels, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton if he would kindly tell us what is the period that Parliament is to last if the Septennial Act is to be repealed? I think we ought to know what it is proposed to substitute for it. It is all very well for hon. Gentlemen to go up and down through the country talking about triennial Parliaments, and then in this House to bring forward such an innocent indefinite Motion as this about the shortening of Parliaments. I should like to know whether the Gladstonian Party are coming back to power at the next General Election? The hon. Member for Ilkeston says not, because, in bringing forward this Resolution, the hon. Member for Ilkeston has, at any rate, no confidence in the Gladstonians being returned at the next General Election. I should like just to press this question from the historical point of view, and I must say the conclusions which I have formed from studying the Statutes are just in an opposite direction to those put forward by the hon. Member for Ilkeston. The Act 6 William and Mary is referred to as the Act establishing triennial Parliaments. It is quite true that it mentions a period of three years, but what is meant by triennial Parliaments was never taken into contemplation at the passing of that Act, and I will tell the House why. The whole object of that Act was to prevent the King reigning without calling Parliament together. That is shown by the title, which is—"An Act for the frequent meeting and calling of Parliaments." If we go back from that to the 16 Charles II., this becomes still more apparent. If we go back to the previous Statute, 36 Edward III., we find it there provided that a Parliament shall be holden every year; and this is proved more conclusively by the Act 4 Edward III., in which it is provided that a Parliament shall be holden every year once, and more often if need be. That proves that the object of this so-called Triennial Act was not that a Parliament should be held every three years, but that the King should not reign over us without having Parliament called together. The Preamble of the Septennial Act—1 George I.—which has been referred to is most instructive. It shows, I think, that after a period of 22 years it was found conclusively that the triennial period was not a satisfactory one, and therefore the septennial period was substituted for it. The Septennial Act has lasted for 180 years, and before we repeal that Act I think a much stronger case should be shown than has been shown by the Mover or Seconder of the Resolution. There are four distinct reasons, in my opinion, why the Resolution should not be accepted by this House. In the first place, if the Septennial Act were repealed, and a Triennial Act passed, it would result in a great increase in the Election expenses. Unless we were all millionaires we could not afford to meet the expenses which would be incurred by holding Elections so frequently unless the Election expenses were paid by Act of Parliament, or in some other way. The second objection is, that with all these frequent and almost continuous Elections that would result Members of Parliament would naturally demand to be paid for their services. I need hardly remind the hon. Mover of the Resolution that that subject has been discussed only very lately in this House. The Motion, which was rejected, did not receive the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian; it did not receive the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle; and it was opposed in the Division Lobby by that sturdy Radical the hon. Member for the Cirencester Division of Gloucester. There is another difficulty in the way of short Parliaments, which the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Ambrose) has touched on already, and that is, that as frequent Elections would take place hon. Members would be scampering all over the country for the purpose of keeping up their popularity, and they would not be here. The result would be that legislation in this House would come to a standstill, and the legislative business would be almost entirely transacted by the House of Lords over the way. The hon. Member for Ilkeston entirely forgot the existence of the House of Lords. We must remember that this is not the only House. A comparison is made by the people of the country between this House and the House of Lords; and we hear many remarks made about the excessive amount of talk there is in this House, and that there is very little business transacted; whereas as regards the House of Lords it is just the other way about—there is very little talking, but a great deal of business is done. And there is another objection also with regard to the House of Lords. This House has to contend in a certain sense with the House of Lords as a Legislative Chamber, and if the Members of this House were liable to lose their seats every three years, while the Members of the House of Lords sit there for life and cannot be removed, it is perfectly obvious that the power of the House of Commons must be seriously weakened in contrast with that of the House of Lords. It is not the theory of the Liberal Party to increase the power of the House of Lords; and if it were for no other reason—only this—I should certainly oppose the Resolution. We must remember that the machinery of our Constitution is of a very delicate and complex character, its existence depending on the nice balancing of the different parts. If we disturb this system of balances and checks on which our Constitution exists, then you throw the whole machinery out of work. And I should like to know for whose benefit this great change is going to be made? So far as I know, it is not desired in the country at the present time. There is no great popular outcry in its favour. It seems to me that it is only desired by a certain number of election agents in the country, and possibly by a few restless and unhappy spirits who find their chief delight and enjoyment of life in the excitement, confusion, and turmoil of a General Election. The hon. Member for Dumfries in a recent magazine article has been very candid in the expression of his views with regard to a matter of considerable interest at the present time. I am not prepared to go so far as the hon. Member for Dumfries, who is quite evidently prepared to give up our Constitution and begin over again. I am not prepared to start afresh in that direction. I think we should be content with our present Constitution, considering, as we have been reminded by the hon. Member for Ilkeston, that our Parliamentary Institutions, whatever may be their defects, have served as a model for all other nations in the world. The hon. Member in bringing forward his Resolution has been very indefinite in his language; and I must say that the appeal with which he concluded was one of the most extraordinary that I ever heard in this House from the mouth of a Member of the Liberal Party. He appealed to the Tory Party because this was a Tory measure. I am a Liberal myself, and I am surprised at the hon. Member for Ilkeston advancing that argument from the Liberal Benches in this House. I hope the House will deal with the Resolution of the hon. Mover to-night in a proper way, and that it will be defeated by a large and decisive majority.

Mr. Coghill

(10.36.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S): I think the speech of the hon. Gentleman which has just been delivered from these Benches would be a very strong argument in favour of shortening Parliaments, because if such a change were brought about gentlemen who were sent to Parliament as Liberals and voted as Tories would have a short period put to their Parliamentary entertainments. There are some gentlemen whose constituencies have their eyes intently fixed upon them—gentlemen who have passed into this House as Liberals and who vote with the other side—those pseudo-Liberal Members of Parliament. I have said that the gentleman who says he is a Liberal and votes Tory is a pseudo-Liberal. I would not have intervened in this Debate if it were not for the extraordinary theories of history propounded by the hon. Gentleman, who is as ignorant of history as a good Liberal Unionist ought to be; and that is a strong expression. He assured the House that if we interfered with life of Parliament the Constitution would topple down. Does he know that within this reign, as late as 1867, the duration of Parliament was interfered with in a very remarkable and stringent and strong measure. Until 1867 the demise of the Crown ipso facto, or practically within six months after the demise, put an end to the Parliament. Now the demise of the Crown has no effect upon Parliament at all. I think I would be able to show, without fear of contradiction, that it is from the shortening and curtailment of Parliaments that all our constitutional privileges have taken their origin. The hon. Gentleman says that if the Septennial Act be repealed the power of the House of Lords will be increased. The House of Lords did not think so, because the Septennial Act originated in the House of Lords, like many another bad measure of the time. And a remarkable confirmation of that theory is that the Septennial Act for many years—for almost one generation after it was enacted—was considered to be a temporary measure, the real theory of the Constitution limiting the duration of Parliament to three years. In no one of our Colonies has there been a septennial Parliament; and more remarkable still, when in the time of George III., about 1783 or 1784, the American jurists drew up their Constitution, which is admittedly drawn on the model of the English Constitution, they went practically not on the model of the Septennial Act, but on the model of the Triennial Act, which they believed to be the best model and theory of the English Constitution. Hon. Gentlemen on both sides have stated in terms of indignation that they were not mere delegates—that they were Representatives of the people, and not mere delegates. That is utterly at variance with the great principles laid down by the Conservative philosopher Edmund Burke. It is an insolent assumption that hon. Members understand and know better than their constituencies. We are here the servants of our constituencies, to carry out their behests. In that great letter which was written by Edmund Burke to the Sheriffs of Bristol he, it is true, expressed a different view; but that was 100 years ago, when there was no Newspaper Press, when it was a matter of privilege to publish the Debates of this House, and when gentlemen who published the Debates could be summoned to the Bar, and have punishments inflicted on them. He then said he should exercise his own discretion, and that he would be unworthy of his position if he did not do so. A few days ago the hon. Member for Northampton wished to have a Return of the duration of Parliaments, from the date of the first reformed Parliament to the present time; but the First Lord of the Treasury said: "No; let us have the Return from the date of the Septennial Act." The right hon. Gentleman was right from his point of view, because from 1716 to 1784 every Parliament continued for the full term of its existence. In 1784 there was a great majority at the back of Fox, but that majority feared the people and a Dissolution, lest Pitt should be returned, as, in fact, he was returned with an enormous majority. In 1834, Mr. Tennyson, the father or grandfather of the poet, said that up to the time of the Reformation there had been 42 Parliaments, and of these 26 lasted less than a year; that from the time of Charles I. to the Revolution there had been twelve Parliaments, the average duration of which was three years; but that their average duration, excluding the Long Parliament, would not be more than nine months. Therefore, it is clear that this Parliament has exceeded the usual time allotted to the life of Parliaments. I will conclude by saying that as long as I have a humble voice in this assemblage—and I hope that will be for a very long time—I shall never allow any gentleman to say without challenge that he is a Representative and not a delegate. He and every other person who is a true Representative of the people should look upon himself as the representative of their wishes and the mouthpiece of their wants.

*(10.35.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): There is a remarkable contrast between the present state of things and those which were in existence before the Septennial Act was passed. The Triennial Act of 1694 was supported by the Tory Party, whilst the Septennial Act of 1716 was opposed by them. Yet on the present occasion, so great has been the change in the constitution of Parties, that we find the first voice which is raised against short Parliaments is that of the hon. and learned Member for the Harrow Division of Middlesex, and the second that of the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme. The hon. and learned Member for the Harrow Division argued as if this proposal would impair altogether the character of a Member of Parliament as a Representative, and convert him into a mere delegate, and he urged that he would become more and more the mouthpiece of a particularly organised section of his constituents instead of representing their general opinion. The argument of the hon. and learned Member might well be turned in an exactly opposite direction, because, the longer a Parliament lasts, the more likely he is to accept as the views of his constituents an expression of opinion which might be sent up from a particularly organised body which might not represent the sentiments of the majority. On the other hand, if he were brought into frequent contact with his constituents, the more disposed he would be to be guided by the real opinion of those to whom he owed his seat. The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme did not appear altogether to appreciate the crisis when the Septennial Act was passed. That crisis occurred just after a most important dynastic change had been carried into effect. There were at the time plots and counterplots which might have developed into most serious proportions, and there was danger of foreign invasion in the interest of the Pretender. There was, therefore, justification for the introduction of such a desperate measure. But that is no reason for thinking that the causes which then existed were of a permanent character. It has been said by the present Duke of Devonshire, with regard to the question of Disestablishment in Scotland, that it ought to be settled in accordance with the opinion of the Scotch people; and the noble Duke said afterwards that a General Election ought to be fought on that question. But if that is to apply to such a question as the Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland, it would also apply to many other questions of equal importance. Therefore it is desirable that more frequent opportunities should be given for consulting the constituencies on questions which may be brought to the front. It may be said that the logical alternative would be the introduction of something like the referendum in Switzerland; but the introduction of any such system, under our present condition, would be attended with difficulties of such a serious character that no one would advocate the adoption of such a course. The only alternative is a more frequent consultation of the electors by Members of Parliament; and this becomes the more important as time goes on, because one Parliament is called upon to deal with many questions. Take the case of the present Parliament. It has been in existence now for nearly six years. Was it anticipated in 1886 that it would have to deal with the questions of Irish Land Purchase, the Sugar Convention Bill, or the compensation and endowment of brewers? It is highly desirable that some decided step should be taken at the present time, when the present Parliament is drawing to its end, and when Members can, therefore, be supposed to be impartial. Some expression of opinion should go forth from this House as to the advisability of shortening the duration of the life of Parliaments, though the exact period to be fixed is a matter for careful consideration whenever the time comes to embody the expressed opinion in a specific measure.

Mr. F. S. Stevenson

*MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I rise for the purpose of expressing my surprise that we have not had any statement from the Government with regard to the Motion dealing with this great constitutional question, and on behalf of which my hon. Friend the Member for Ilkeston has made an able and powerful speech. The arguments in that speech deserve, and will, I hope, receive, some notice from the Government before we are called upon to divide upon the question. Whatever else may be said of this Debate, I think we must have enjoyed very much the ideal picture of Parliamentary life which was drawn by the hon. and learned Member for the Harrow Division of Middlesex. The picture was that of an irresponsible Member, superior to the criticisms of the Press, enjoying an unbroken continuity of representation, and absolutely free from all kinds of pledges. The hon. Member told the House how humiliating it is to make a pledge, and he seemed to think that it would be almost as humiliating to keep a pledge. But I think the hon. Member's constituency had a very distinct understanding as to which Party their Representative would support before they elected him; and the steady loyalty with which the hon. Member has supported his Party is a conclusive proof of the honourable manner in which he has carried out his obligations to his constituents. The House has been asked to express the opinion that the Septennial Act should be repealed for the purpose of shortening the duration of Parliament. The Septennial Act was passed in 1716, and the Parliament that passed it was the only one that sat for seven years. What, then, has been the length of the life of Parliament? I will take the period commencing in 1784, for it was in that year, I believe, that the first General Election occurred which practically put a Minister into power. Up to that time Ministers were put in power by the will of the Sovereign or by the action of the House of Lords, or by the intrigues of the ruling families. It was in 1784 that Pitt obtained the great majority which gave him the confidence of the country. From 1784 to 1886 there have been 25 Parliaments. If you take the period as 100 years, that would give to each Parliament an average life of four years. I can, however, hardly imagine any subject to which it would be more delusive to apply the test of averages than to the life of Parliament. We must look a little further to see what the Septennial Act means. The existence of Parliaments has been terminated by four causes—(1) the death of the Sovereign; (2) by electoral reforms which necessitate new elections; (3) by what we call a Ministerial crisis; and (4) by effluxion of time. I think that classification comprehends all the diseases of which Parliaments die. Now, Sir, I find that during the century of which I have been speaking three out of the twenty-five Parliaments were dissolved owing to the death of the Sovereign. Of course, as the House knows, the law has been altered, and the demise of the Crown does not now involve a Dissolution, though up till 1867 the death of the Sovereign involved a Dissolution within six months. The three Parliaments thus dissolved followed upon the death respectively of George III., George IV., and William IV. There have been three great Constitutional alterations—the great Reform Act of 1831, the Extension of the Household Franchise in 1867, and the Extension of the County Franchise in 1885. On each of these occasions there was necessarily an Election. In the century there have been nine Ministerial crises—nine occasions upon which the Ministry have been in conflict with the House or divided amongst themselves so that it was necessary to appeal to the nation; and there have been ten Parliaments which have expired by effluxion of time. In endeavouring to ascertain what the duration of Parliament under the Septennial Act is we ought to see how long each of these ten Parliaments has lasted during the present century; who have been the Prime Ministers in power when the lives of the Parliaments were determined; and from this date we can pretty accurately arrive at what the Constitutional position is. I shall commence my retrospect with Mr. Pitt, who was firmly in power in 1784. His first Parliament expired by effluxion of time in 1790. This great Tory Minister, with a majority in Parliament, dissolved in 1790. In the zenith of his power he again dissolved in 1796. That was the second time he put the seal of his Constitutional interpretation upon the Septennial Act. Again in 1802, Mr. Addington, being Prime Minister, dissolved the Parliament. Then came a series of short Parliaments, partly due to the death of Mr. Fox and partly to the Catholic Question. We do not come to another Parliament which was allowed to run its course of six years until 1812. That Parliament had a Tory majority, and Lord Liverpool kept it sitting until 1818, again recognising the principle of six years, and six years only. The Parliament of 1818 was dissolved on the death of George III. A new Parliament was called together in 1820, and that was the longest Parliament of the century, and under Lord Liverpool lasted until 1826, its actual duration being a few days over the six years. No Parliament after that expired by effluxion of time until the Parliament of 1841, the Parliament which put Sir Robert Peel in power. Then Parliament was dissolved in 1847, and if Sir Robert Peel is accepted on the one side of the House, surely on the other Lord John Russell will be accepted as a great Constitutional authority. When Lord John Russell was called upon to construe the Septennial Act his construction corresponded with that of Mr. Pitt and Lord Liverpool, and he dissolved the Parliament of 1841 in the year 1847. The next Parliament that expired by the effluxion of time was the Parliament of Lord Palmerston in 1859. No pressure was put upon him; it was understood his political opponents would keep him in power as long as he liked; yet Lord Palmerston dissolved in 1865, so that again Parliament sat only a few days over the six years. The Parliament of 1868 of my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian was dissolved in 1874. Lord Beaconsfield's Parliament, which was summoned in that year, was dissolved in 1880. In no case have these Parliaments exceeded six years and a few weeks at the most. Now, Sir, my point is that the practice of these great Prime Ministers and the uniform precedents of upwards of 100 years show that the clear, undoubted interpretation of the Septennial Act is that that Act means that the duration of Parliament is six years, and six years only. Therefore, if I am called on to deal with the Motion of my hon. Friend behind me, who says it is necessary that the Septennial Act should be repealed in order that Parliaments may be shortened, it would not be fair to say that we are dealing with Parliaments of seven years' duration. Seven years' Parliaments are not known to the Constitution. There is no precedent for them. The Parliaments we have had to deal with for a century have been for six years, and six years only. It may be said—and said with justice—who is to decide what is Constitutional in a case of this sort, and that we cannot go beyond the text of an Act of Parliament. We have no written Constitution, and I am very glad of it. The elasticity of our system has secured greater freedom than where a Constitution is arbitrarily defined by some legislative Act. But that necessarily involves an enormous reserve of power in the hands of the three branches of the Legislature—the Sovereign, the House of Lords, and the House of Commons, and you might reduce the case of each to an absurdity by defining the extreme powers they undoubtedly possess and by saying that they might exercise them to the uttermost. But our Constitution rests upon the play of the various parts of the Constitution, and on the tradition that no branch of the Legislature—neither the prerogative of the Sovereign, nor the Upper House, nor this House—is justified in stretching to the extreme any one of its powers or privileges. Therefore I put it to the House as clear that the Constitutional Law of this country is that Parliament should last for six years, and for six years only, and that any Motion put before the House that Parliament should be shortened must deal with the question, whether right or wrong, of shortening the period of six years. Well now, Sir, is it desirable to shorten that period of six years? Some of my hon. Friends have been induced to state the period which they think a Parliament should last. I do not think that this is the proper occasion for attempting to define that period. This is not a Party question at all. It is an undoubted truth that the Tory Party opposed the Septennial Act. I suppose there is a tendency on either side which happens to be in power rather to strengthen its grip upon its period of power than to loosen it, and I do not claim for the Opposition any superior virtue over hon. Gentlemen opposite in that respect. But, looking at it as a public question, is it desirable that the period of Parliamentary life should be shortened from six years? I think it is. I do not attach the slightest importance to the contention that if we had frequent elections the expense would be so enormous. The expenses, as we all know, have, thanks to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bury, been substantially reduced during the last ten or fifteen years. There was another reason, that Members would have to be paid; another reason, that Members would be always skirmishing about the country; and another reason, that it was not advisable to shorten Parliamentary life to Members themselves. Sir, the best way of renewing the Parliamentary life of a Member is for him to have the confidence of his constituents. The principle of Parliamentary Government is representation. It is not that a Member of Parliament is put, as the hon. Member for the Harrow Division of Middlesex suggests, as a superior sort of being exalted above and beyond the criticism of his constituents. He is not here as a delegate, and if ever this House consists not of Representatives but of delegates, it will cease to be the House of Commons. But the House must represent the people that elected it, and my experience is that the new and the enlarged constituencies repose greater trust in their Representatives in what may be called the minor matters of administration and legislation than was the case under the older and more restricted system. The constituency has a right to know what its Members are going to do on certain great questions. When the present Government dissolve it will be on a great question of public policy—one of the gravest ever raised in the history of this country. Will anybody criticise or deny the right of the constituencies to know how their Representatives are going to vote on that question? It may be assumed that the new House of Commons will be an accurate reflex of the opinions of the constituencies. But how can you keep a Representative Body in touch with those whom it represents unless you give them not too frequent but moderately frequent opportunities of contact? It has been stated to-night that a period of five years affects the votes of a million of voters. No fewer than 500,000 persons who voted in 1886 have ceased to be voters now, and 500,000 persons who were not voters in 1886 are voters now, so that putting the two together that means 1,000,000 voters, or one-fifth of the whole constituency. In these circumstances the constituencies have a right to be heard. It is not what will be more convenient or more costly to us, but how best to carry out the representative system to enable the represented to make their power felt through their Representatives, without going into the question of three years or four years or five years. We ask the House confidently to say that six years is too long a period for Members to be elected. There is another feature in the present state of public life in this country which was alluded to by hon. Friend the Member for the Ilkeston Division in terms of disapproval—namely, what he called “the great swing of the pendulum” when General Elections take place. The tendency of the present day is rather to diminish the number of Dissolutions arising out of want of confidence between the Government of the day and the House of Commons of the day. I think the remark of Lord Beaconsfield was very accurate when he said he had observed that the duration of Parliaments and of Ministries was co-terminous. Well then, Sir, as appeals to the constituencies will be by effluxion of time rather than from any want of confidence between the Government of the day and the House of Commons, I think that is another reason for shortening the duration of each Parliament. There is one reason more. In the present day—during the last Parliament and during the present Parliament, and it will be the same in the next Parliament—the tendency is to increase the power of the House of Commons. Seventy or eighty years ago the House of Commons had not appropriated to itself, as it has now done, the powers of the Executive. Now it exercises supervision over every Department of the State, over the permanent officials, and a more minute and continuous control over the various branches of the Public Service than was ever done before. The House of Commons is now more than ever the fountain of new legislation. We are in a period of great social reform; and when this great Constitutional question which is at present under discussion is disposed of, the probability is that the attention of the House of Commons will be brought to bear more and more upon what are called social problems. If that be so, if the House is to be called upon to discuss questions of capital and labour, of master and servant, of the condition of the masses of the people, and the distribution of various rights and powers among the bulk of the population, it is necessary that the House in so doing should faithfully and adequately represent the views of those by whom it is elected. That in itself is an additional argument for shorter Parliaments. My desire in supporting this Motion is not either to reduce the status or the efficiency or the independence of the House of Commons. I wish to see the House of Commons fulfilling in the broadest manner and in the highest degree that conception of its duties which was defined in the quotation from the speech of Burke at Bristol, which was read to-night. Upon the broad ground that it is for the public interest—I do not care to put it for the convenience of Members, for that is a question that ought to be absolutely excluded from consideration—but on the broad ground of public convenience, and in order to promote its efficiency and its adequate discharge of its rapidly increasing public duties, I am convinced it is desirable that the period of the duration of Parliaments should be reduced.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

(11.30.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have listened with very great interest to the speech which the right hon. Gentleman has just delivered; but I confess that in some respects my surprise was even in excess of my interest. The right hon. Gentleman spent the greater part of his speech not in defending the thesis that Parliaments should be shortened, but in establishing by elaborate historical analysis what is the precise duration of Parliaments which he thinks is in conformity with Constitutional usage. I do not know whether he had an eye to consequences other than those raised by the Motion before us; but if he had, I would point out to him that if there is any attempt made by any section of politicians to establish in this country the novel Constitutional doctrine that no Dissolution is to take place on an old register, then it is possible it may be thought necessary on the part of others to seek to establish the equally novel Constitutional principle that Parliament shall last more than six years and one month. I do not develop that point, but I pass to the second part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech—the more important and the less prolonged part, in which he dealt with the question more immediately before us. There, I confess, I was rather surprised to find that the right hon. Gentleman, in common, I think, with every other Member who has spoken from the same side of the House, has taken up the position that though Parliaments are to be shortened, they are not necessarily to be shortened by any considerable period of time. One hon. Member suggested six years, another five years, and another mentioned four years; but I do not think any one Gentleman has specifically suggested three years, and yet I had understood it was one of the accepted items of the Newcastle programme that triennial Parliaments were to be introduced. ("No, no!") Some hon. Members say "No, no!" Well, I have not refreshed my memory recently by a perusal of the document, and I do not deny that hon. Gentlemen opposite have a greater title than I have to speak on the point; but certainly I had understood that the authorised view of the duration of Parliaments, as embodied in the Newcastle programme, was that they should be three years instead of seven. I believe I am right in that.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

SIR W. FOSTER: May I state to the right hon. Gentleman that there was no period specified in the Newcastle programme; but simply a statement that there should be shorter Parliaments?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman was not the author—at least I do not think he was the author—of the Newcastle programme. If he says on authority that no period was named, I have no desire to contradict him; but I should like to refer to contemporary documents before I entirely give up the opinion which I have formed. If triennial Parliaments are to be the rule, and if we are not to follow the universal constitutional usage, founded not merely upon custom, but upon obvious convenience, of not running out any Parliament to within a month or two of its death, it means that two years, or at most two years and six months, will be the duration of a Parliament. Remembering that proposition, that particular period, and not merely the general proposition, that Parliaments are to be shortened, and, keeping in view that two years and six months will be the extreme length of Parliament—"No, no!" Do I understand that hon. Gentlemen opposite are unanimous in rejecting triennial Parliaments? Keeping in view that, according to a large body of opinion, two years and six months will be the extreme limit of Parliaments, let us consider what will be the practical effect upon the Government of this country of such a change. I will not dwell upon the cost to Members, or upon the dislocation of the business of the country, though they are both matters of considerable importance. The matter of cost the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down dismissed with a wave of the hand. He attributed such merits to the Bill—a most excellent measure passed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury—that he seemed to think the cost of an election was really of no moment in these days. I take it, however, that the cost of a great county election might reach the limit of £1,400 or £1,500. That spread over a triennial Parliament is about £500 a year, in addition to the other expenses and the subscriptions which a Member of Parliament is expected to pay. If the hon. Member thinks that is a matter of absolute indifference, I congratulate him on the condition of his banker's balance, but I fear his happy fortune does not attach to every gentleman who sits in this House. I do not wish to dwell upon that in the short time at my disposal, because there are considerations, in my judgment, of incomparably more importance, and which ought to be more in the minds of hon. Gentlemen when they go into the Division Lobby. I have heard a great deal to-night from every Member who has spoken in support of this Motion in favour of what he is pleased to term the bringing of the opinion of Parliament into exact conformity with the opinions of the people. That is a good, sound, constitutional doctrine, against which I have nothing to say. But what does "opinions of the people mean?" It does not mean that the people of this country, the 37,000,000 who inhabit these islands, change their opinion from one side to the other. What it does mean is that out of the very large body of electors, 100,000 perhaps either abstain from going to the poll or alter their vote. That amount of alteration, and that amount of alteration alone, is sufficient to transfer power from one side of the House to the other, and to place gentlemen in power who now sit in the cool shade of Opposition. The change is not a change in the opinion of the nation; it is a change, and always has been a change, of a very small fraction of the nation. Our constitutional system is that the majority should decide what Government shall be in power, and the necessary result of this, in a country where Parties are fairly evenly balanced as in this country, and as I believe they must be fairly evenly balanced if Party Government is to continue to exist—the result, I say, is that a relatively small number of abstentions, or a still smaller number of changes of opinion, are quite enough to make what is called the voice of the people give utterance to opinions diametrically opposite to those of three, five or seven years ago. The necessary effect of our constitutional machinery is greatly to emphasise the result of any such change, because the consequence of this relatively small change of opinion is to place in power a Ministry who, on all controversial questions, profess precisely opposite doctrines to those professed by their predecessors. I do not complain of that, because I think it is the necessary result of Government by Party. It is not the part of a wise man to change anything that is necessary, but we should not deliberately aggravate that which may become a necessary evil when we are considering how far this House is capable of fulfilling the colossal duties which in process of time it has taken upon itself to perform. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that he endorses the view which modern experience shows to be correct, that Ministries and Parliaments always change together, and that is to be taken in connection with his view that Parliaments should last such a very short length of time.

SIR W. FOSTER: It was not my view; it was the view of Lord Beaconsfield.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say he endorsed the view that modern experience shows that habitually the Ministry changes with the Parliament; and, undoubtedly, recent experience does tend in that direction. I thought the right hon. Gentleman adopted that view. If he does, it means that the Administration of this country is for all time to be broken up into short lengths of two or three years. Is that a desirable or a safe thing? Is it desirable, in the point of view of foreign policy, that Parliament should be broken up into short periods? I quite admit that the great traditions of the country have established the practice that one foreign Minister shall not, at all events, violently change the policy of his predecessor. A continuity of foreign policy has always been aimed at by the great Parties in the State. But whether that is to last, or the heat of controversy is to break through that tradition, or whether it breaks through or not, my argument remains untouched, because foreign Powers, whose opinions we have to consult, will always hope that on a change the Ministry will be found more pliable, and that after a General Election they will find a foreign Minister who will carry out a policy which they think will be more congenial to their own special interests. Therefore, if we really are to look forward to the time when no foreign Ministry especially is to last more than a comparatively few months, then I say a continuous foreign policy will become more and more difficult, and this country cannot possibly escape from having a difficulty of some kind, for her interests are bound up in having a foreign policy of a kind to maintain her honour abroad. Unless she has such a policy, I say the public interests of the country must most seriously and gravely suffer. To turn from foreign affairs to domestic affairs, no doubt at one time England flourished under a system of short Parliaments, and possibly no difficulties followed from it, because in these times, as I think the right hon. Gentleman has just stated, the Ministry depended just as much upon the Crown and the House of Lords as upon the House of Commons. The result of the modern system is that the House of Commons not only supports the Ministry who carry out their domestic legislation and are supported in their domestic policy, but it insists upon knowing all that they are doing in each one of the numerous Departments of State. Is it desirable or possible that we should entrust these enormous functions—functions never dreamt of in the time of Pitt, never dreamt of in the time of Lord Liverpool, only first dreamt of at the time of the first Reform Bill—are we going to hand over these enormous executive powers to Parliaments whose experience is going to be limited to one or two or three years at the most? In these days, when a large change in its personnel occurs at each Election, during the first year Parliament is learning its business, and during the last year it is not doing its business at all. It is thinking of its constituents. It has passed from the stage of callow inexperience through a stage of mature experience, and has lapsed into a position of senile courtship—and I do not think we ought to endeavour to repeat too often that period of Parliamentary experience. We all know, on both sides of the House, that there are a very large number of gentlemen so anxious to retain the honour of a seat in the House that they have not time to perform the duties of a Member. I do not think that is altogether a desirable or creditable state of things. But I go further; I confess that I think this habit of anxiously scrutinising the effect which each vote or which each speech is to have on the electorate is not a wholesome state of mind for Members of Parliament. Hon. Members have spoken as if that frame of mind simply consisted of a desire that a Member should conform to the wishes of those who have returned him. It is nothing of the sort. He knows very well that he is secure of the support of the great body of gentlemen who support him. What he is anxiously looking for is the good opinion of the small and doubtful margin of support which he may get, but of which he is not quite certain, by a stray vote or a stray speech. I feel that to be a very bad electoral calculation; but it is a calculation constantly made by Members of this House, and which does not conduce to the dignity of Members responsible for the government of a great Empire. It appears to me that some stability of administration is absolutely necessary for the mere conduct of affairs. In America they have biennial Parliaments, but, according to their system, they elect a Ministry for four years, for the President does not stand in the position of the Crown. He stands in the position of Prime Minister of the country, who settles the Ministry to carry out the work of the Government, and in the American Constitution you have more security for that continuity of Government which is so absolutely necessary. But, remember this, America has no foreign policy; it is not brought into constant contact with every European State; it has not affairs to transact with every Power on the face of the globe; it has not colonies in every latitude and in every sea. We have all the difficulties of a great Empire to face. Do not let us rashly, out of some abstract theory of the Constitution, which takes no account of the practical facts of the case, deliberately alter a system which has worked admirably in the past, which I am sure is rendered more and more necessary by the progress of democratic power, and from which I am convinced we shall be able to gather as beneficial fruits in the future as we have in the history of the past. For these reasons I hope the House will emphatically record its conviction that this Motion should not pass. We on this side of the House have nothing to gain or lose by it; and if I spoke from a purely Party point of view, I do not think the Conservative or Unionist Party are likely to be losers by any system which will shorten Parliaments. But whatever the balance of Party gain or loss, I am convinced from the point of view of general administration that it will be perfect folly to make it impossible to have continuous administration either in our foreign or our domestic affairs.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

VOL. III. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Question put.

(12.0.) The House divided:—Ayes 188; Noes 142.—(Div. List, No. 78.)

Main Question again proposed.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY—Committee upon Monday next.

SHOPS (WEEKLY HALF-HOLIDAY)
BILL.—(No. 142.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.13.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I hope the House will allow the Second Reading to be taken with the object of referring the Bill to the consideration of the Committee upon Shop Hours.

Objection taken.

Second Reading deferred till Tuesday next.

ARMY AND NAVY EXPENDITURE,
1892-3.

Return ordered—

"Showing the Net Estimated Expenditure, for the year 1892-3, on the Army and Navy, and the provision made for it."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)

ARMY AND NAVY EXPENDITURE,
1891-2.

Return ordered—

"Showing the Net Expenditure, for the year 1891-2, as estimated at the commencement and close of the year, and the provision made for it."—(Mr. Shaw Lefevre.)
2 U

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS.

Copy ordered—

"Of Memorandum stating the nature of the Proposals contained in the Provisional Orders included in the Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 1) Bill."—(Sir Michael Hicks Beach)

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 139.]

PUBLIC EXPENDITURE AND REVENUE.

Account ordered—

"Of the Total Expenditure in the year ending the 31st day of March 1892, distinguishing between the ordinary Expenditure provided for out of the Revenue of the year and the extraordinary Expenditure provided for out of Loans and other sources, and also the total receipts of the year, distinguishing between the ordinary Revenue and Receipts derived from Loans and other sources (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 412, of Session 1891)."—(Sir William Harcourt.)

PLUMBERS' REGISTRATION BILL.

Reported from the Select Committee, with Minutes of Evidence.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 140.]

Bill, as amended, re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House for Tuesday next, at Two of the clock, and to be printed. [Bill 270.]

MOTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Urban Sanitary Districts of Bethesda, Bolton, Burton, Eye, Lowestoft, Nottingham, Oswaldtwistle, Reading, and Wigan, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 266.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Urban Sanitary Districts of Barnsley, Halifax, Keighley, and Wigan, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 267.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 3) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Urban Sanitary Districts of Acton, Bridgend, Lincoln, New Windsor, Rawdon, Sale, and Stapleton, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 268.]

SECONDARY EDUCATION (ENGLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Arthur Acland, Bill to promote Secondary Education in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur Acland, Sir Henry Roscoe, and Mr. Hobhouse.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 269.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

THE EASTER RECESS.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I gave a pledge at 7 o'clock that I would, before the House separated to-night, state the arrangement the Government propose for the Easter Holidays. I think, having looked at the matter in all its bearings, that we may, although perhaps the holiday may be considered rather a long one, permit ourselves to adjourn from Tuesday next until the Monday week following.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Will there be a Dissolution in the interval?

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 11th April, 1892.

QUESTIONS.

TELEGRAPH RATES TO INDIA AND AUSTRALIA.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the fact that the telegraph rate from England to India is 4s. a word, and the telegraph rate from England to Australia via India, but double the distance, is also only 4s. per word; whether he is aware that this latter concession was brought about by the Telegraph Companies and the Australasian Governments jointly agreeing to share any loss arising from the reduction of rates from 9s. to 4s. per word; whether he has ascertained that the joint loss has on the first year only amounted to about £12,500 aside, and is expected to involve no expense after the second year; and whether he has taken any steps to recommend the giving of a similar guarantee by the British and Indian Governments, whereby the rates to India may be reduced from 4s. to 1s. per word?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The lately-reduced telegraph rates to Australia and Tasmania may be said to be about 4s. a word. To Queensland and New Zealand they remain at about 10s. To India the charge is 4s. The reduction was brought about by the Governments concerned and the Eastern and Eastern Extension Telegraph Companies agreeing to bear jointly any loss that it might entail. Her Majesty's Government were not parties to the agreement, and we are not aware what the consequent loss has been. I have not any intention of proposing a similar reduction and guarantee in regard to India; and I have reason to believe that the conditions of commercial life in India would not produce any increase of business commensurate to, or approaching, the loss of revenue which would be the result.

INDIAN REVENUE FROM INTOXICANTS.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to a statement in "Abkari" for this month to the effect that the revenue from native intoxicants in Bombay has increased from Rs.38.82,966, as the average of five years ending 1881-2, to Rs.75.19,911 for the year ending 1889-90; whether he can state what was the increase in the quantity consumed; whether he will draw the attention of the Bombay Government to the Resolution passed by the House of Commons in March, 1889, against giving undue facilities for the sale of strong drink in India; whether his attention has been drawn to the statement that the Government of Bengal raises an annual revenue of £240,000 from the sale of bhang and other preparations of hemp; whether he has any evidence to show that these drugs are the cause of much of the lunacy in India; and whether he will call the attention of the Government of India to the dangerous character of these drugs, and the necessity of restricting their sale?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): (1) The Secretary of State has seen the statement which is taken from the published Abkari Report for 1889-90. (2) The consumption in the Presidency cannot be stated as a whole for the earlier period, when the farming system, under which the statistics were not ascertained, prevailed in some districts. (3) The Secretary of State does not think it necessary to communicate with the Bombay Government in the manner suggested. The hon. Member is aware that during the period named in the first paragraph of his question, the rate of duty on native spirit has been greatly raised. For instance, in Bombay City, of which we have full statistics for the last ten years, the duty on mouro spirit was raised from R1 to Rs1½ in 1876; to Rs.2½ in 1878; to Rs.2½ in 1886; and to Rs.3 in 1889, at which rate it stands at present. The consumption in 1881-2, with a population of 773,000, was 639,975 gallons; in 1890-91, with a population of 804,000, it was 564,190 gallons. (4.) The Bengal revenue from drugs in 1890-1 was not £240,000, but Rs.236,000. (5.) The Reports of Lunatic Asylums attribute some 25 per cent. of the cases treated to the abuse of ganja. (6.) A Report on the subject of the consumption of narcotic drugs other than opium has been called for, and has been promised by the Government of India. Until it is received, the Secretary of State does not propose to take any action.

REGIMENTAL MESS AND BAND FUNDS.

MR. KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, in relation to Orders which were issued by the Indian Government on the disbandment or conversion of certain regiments in India that the mess and band funds of the regiments mustered out of service should be handed over to the newly-constituted or substituted regiments without compensation, and to the statement made in this House last year by the Under Secretary of State that there appeared to have been some irregularity, and that the Secretary of State had called for a Report, whether such Report has been received, and whether he will lay it upon the Table of the House; whether the Secretary of State is aware that, in the Orders lately issued for the conversion of the 30th and 31st Madras Infantry, the "band, mess, colours, and other regimental properties" belonging to the officers of these regiments have been ordered to be handed over to the "newly-constituted" regiments, without compensation to the officers of the old regiments; and whether the Secretary of State is aware that in similar cases in the British Service the highest military authority has invariably recognised the right of the officers of a disbanded regiment to the property in their mess and band funds?

MR. CURZON: No, Sir; the Report of the Government of India has not been received. A despatch was sent to them in July, and another to remind them of the matter in February of this year. Till the reply is received, the Secretary of State is not in a position to express an opinion. As regards the 30th and 31st Madras Infantry, the General Order says that the mess, band, and other property of the regiments, together with the colours, will remain with the regiments as re-constituted. The answer to the third paragraph will no doubt be given in reply to the question on the subject addressed by the hon. Member to the Secretary of State for War.

Mr. Curzon

MR. KING: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what is the recognised rule or custom in the British Army with regard to the disposal of the mess, band, and other officers' funds of a regiment which is disbanded or re-constituted; and whether His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief has officially declared that these funds were the private property of the officers, and that it was never thought desirable or advisable for the authorities to interfere with their disposal?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): There has been no recent case of a British regiment being disbanded; and His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief does not remember making the official declaration attributed to him. At the same time, the practice has been to regard the mess and band funds of a corps as its private property.

LICENSED METROPOLITAN CABS AND CAB DRIVERS.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will state what is the registered number at the present time of licensed cabs and licensed cab drivers within the Metropolitan Police District?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I am informed by the Commissioner of Metropolitan Police that the number of hackney carriage proprietors' licences is 11,062, and of drivers 15,024.

"REGINA V. HURLBERT."

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the fact that the Director of Public Prosecutions states in his Report, which has been presented to the House, that he found great difficulties in taking action in "Regina v. Hurlbert," owing to being refused permission to take copies of the impounded documents, owing to a Rule of Court, and that the refusal "Caused great difficulty and delay in prosecuting the inquiries that he had set on foot with the object of ascertaining whether evidence was procurable which would justify a charge of perjury against the defendant," and that a correspondence between the Director and the Court of Queen's Bench took place in regard to this matter, he will lay upon the Table of the House copies of this correspondence, in order to enable the House to decide whether legislation is necessary in the interests of justice?

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman also say if he has any knowledge of the means by which the defendant was enabled to evade apprehension?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not aware. As to the question on the Paper, I should be glad, first, to obtain the concurrence of the Lord Chief Justice. If he sees no objection, I shall be ready to lay this correspondence on the Table. The Lord Chief Justice is now on circuit, but I will apply to him without delay.

THE CASE OF FANNY GANE.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, considering the great difference between the sentence of one year's imprisonment recently passed upon Mrs. Montagu for the manslaughter of her child, three years of age, and the sentence of death, since commuted to penal servitude for life, upon Fanny Gane for the murder of her newly-born illegitimate child, he will consider whether Fanny Gane might be released from imprisonment, or if he would state what course it is proposed to take in her case?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have twice this Session informed the hon. Member that I am not prepared as yet to announce the ultimate reduction of sentence in the case of Fanny Gane. The hon. Member may feel sure that it will not be overlooked.

MR. COBB: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when an announcement can be made?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is usual to wait and see the effect of prison discipline before announcing the ultimate decision. The reduction of the sentence is always very considerable.

POSTMASTERSHIP OF LIMERICK.

MR. SHEEHAN (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if the postmaster of Limerick is yet fully retired under the 65 Rule; and, if so, has his place been filled, and by whom?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes; the postmaster has retired, and the vacancy has been gazetted; but the applications have not yet been all collected.

THE ORPHANS FLANNEGAN, MOTHERWELL WORKHOUSE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that Mr. James Muir, Inspector of Poor, Parish of Bothwell, who has in his charge two orphan girls, Rose and Mary Flannegan, now respectively 14 and 12 years of age, has removed the children from the Motherwell Workhouse, and refuses to inform their next-of-kin—namely, Mathew Flannegan, their uncle, and Elizabeth Flannegan, their grandmother, where the children are at present; and whether the uncle and grandmother, being desirous to bring up and educate the children, are entitled to have the custody of them?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I learn that the grandmother of the children has herself petitioned the Supreme Court in Scotland for their custody. This being so, and the statements made in the question being more or less nearly related to that litigation, I must respectfully decline to give the hon. Member any opinion on the subject. It may, however, allay the hon. Gentleman's anxiety if I add that, according to my information, the elder girl is in domestic service in Scotland; that neither of them has ever seen either the grandmother or the uncle; and that the guardian ad litem of the younger child has reported to the Court, after an interview with her, that her determination not to go to Ireland is so strong that in his opinion nothing short of force would induce her to go.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman will see there is no question of going to Ireland. Is there any reason why the relatives—the grandmother and uncle—should be denied access? May I ask whether the question of the right of the relatives to an interview must depend on the result of litigation, or whether such can be granted?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: That is a totally different question, of which I must ask the hon. Member to give notice.

BOARD SCHOOL MASTERS' APPOINTMENTS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the following advertisement which appeared in the issue of the Schoolmaster dated 2nd April, 1892:—

"Willand School Board (Devon).—Wanted, Midsummer next, Certificated (Married) Master and Mistress, Mixed Board School, Willand, Collumpton, Devon. Wife, Infants, Needlework. Average 63 children. Harmonium in church. Drawing"; and whether it is the duty of the district auditor to surcharge the members of the Willand School Board, who sign the cheques for the salaries of teachers, with any amount which may be paid out of the school fund for work other than that directly connected with the office of schoolmaster?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes (who replied) said: My attention had not been previously directed to the advertisement referred to. I have no doubt that the district auditor will duly consider any question which may arise as to the legality of any payment which may appear in the accounts of the School Board; and if the Local Government Board are called upon in the exercise of their equitable jurisdiction to determine any appeal which they may receive against his decision, the facts will be fully considered by them.

Sir C. J. Pearson

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to the following advertisement which appeared in the issue of the Schoolmaster, dated 2nd April, 1892:—

"Willand School Board (Devon).—Wanted, Midsummer next, Certificated (Married) Master and Mistress, Mixed Board School, Willand, Collumpton, Devon. Wife, Infants, Needlework. Average 63 children. Harmonium in Church. Drawing"; whether he is aware that the income of the Willand School Board is entirely derived from Government grants and local rates; whether he will instruct Her Majesty's Inspector of Schools for the district to inquire at his next annual visit to the school whether, in the Form IX. presented to him, the amount returned thereon as expended in salaries includes any payment to the master for playing the "harmonium in church"; and whether he is yet prepared to take any steps to prevent the masters and mistresses of elementary schools being compelled to undertake work for which they either receive no payment, or else receive payment out of public funds provided solely for educational purposes?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Such advertisements as that referred to in the hon. Member's two questions are, I believe, not uncommon; but a note has been introduced into the manager's Return which makes it the duty of the Inspector to see that the salary paid to the teacher does not include any sum paid in respect of services in any other capacity, and will thus prevent any misapplication of the school income. I must, however, demur to the terms of the last paragraph of the second question, as teachers can always discover, on applying for an engagement, whether it involves distasteful duties.

MR. H. J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has seen in the Schoolmaster, of 27th February, an advertisement of the Painswick School Board for a certificated assistant master, which advertisement states that "the post of organist at the Parish Church is vacant, salary £20 a year. Assistant would be eligible;" whether it forms any part of the duties of a School Board to advertise for a Parish Church organist; and whether, in view of the fact that such an intimation is calculated to deter all but members of the Church of England from becoming applicants for the assistant mastership, the Department will take steps to prevent a repetition of such proceedings?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I cannot undertake to review the advertising columns of the Schoolmaster, but it does not appear to me that the School Board limited its choice to persons who were competent to undertake the duties of organist. There is, however, no power in the Department to interfere, and I cannot accept what appears to be the doctrine of the hon. Member that such an advertisement is in the nature of a religious test.

BOARD SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, with reference to the correspondence which has taken place between the Education Department and the School Board for London on the subject of an application of the School Board for authority to provide additional accommodation for 420 children in connection with the Burghley Road School—namely, a letter from the School Board dated 30th October, 1891, and a letter from the Education Department dated 25th February, 1892, whether the Department have receded from the position taken up in their letter to Mr. Ambrose Goddard, published in the School Board Chronicle of 20th July, 1889, and in their letter to the managers of the National School, Luton, dated 17th June, 1889, to the following effect:—

"My Lords consider that for the purpose of determining whether the application of a School Board under Section 10 of the Act of 1873 should be granted, the existing accommodation for older children should not be taken at eight square feet per child, which is the minimum allowance under the Code for the purposes of annual grants, but should be calculated at ten square feet?"

*SIR W. HART DYKE: It is obvious that the application in any particular instance of the principle to which the hon. Member refers must largely depend upon local circumstances; and looking to the grave responsibility attaching to any new departure in calculating a deficiency over so large and populous an area as that of London, I am of opinion that the Department should proceed with the greatest deliberation and upon the fullest information which the Board can supply.

MR. SUMMERS: Then in this instance the Department do not adhere to the position taken up in 1889?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: We have not receded from that position as to the general application of the principle, but there may be exceptional cases. I can assure the hon. Member the matter is not definitely closed. The Permanent Secretary, unfortunately, who has been dealing with the matter, is absent from illness, and I have not been able to consult him.

MR. SUMMERS: I will put a further question on the subject.

LAND COMMISSION APPOINTMENTS.

MR. MAC NEILL: (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why have the Registrar and Assistant Registrar of the Irish Land Commission, after an official experience of 20 years, in which they have efficiently discharged their duties, been deprived of their posts; on what ground has a salary of £1,000 been given to Mr. Porter; on what ground has the salary of Mr. Lynch been raised at one bound from £300 to £800 per annum; why has Mr. O'Farrell been made Registrar to the Land Commission on a much larger salary than that drawn by the late Registrar and Assistant Registrar, who have filled those posts for upwards of ten years; and over the heads of how many officials have Mr. Porter, Mr. Lynch, and Mr. O'Farrell respectively been promoted?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. JACKSON, LEEDS, N.): The Registrar's Department in the Land Commission had, under its old constitution, assigned to it merely duties connected with the settlement of judicial rents; but on the re-organisation of the whole Commission, pursuant to the Land Purchase Act of last Session, more difficult and important duties arising under the administration of the Land Purchase Acts were combined with the other duties. To this combined office Mr. O'Farrell, who had already held an important position in the Commission and was a barrister of standing, was appointed as the officer best qualified for the discharge of these duties. Mr. Porter had been an Assistant Commissioner in receipt of a salary of £800 a year. On appointment as the permanent head of the Agricultural Department he obtained the higher salary mentioned. Mr. Lynch was not at the time of the re-organisation in receipt of a salary of £300 a year, but of £490, proceeding by increments to £550, as Chief Clerk in the Examiners' Department. On appointment as First Assistant Examiner he was, in consideration of his previous services, awarded a personal salary of £800 a year, the normal salary of the post of Assistant Examiner being fixed at £700. Neither Mr. Porter nor Mr. Lynch has been promoted over the heads of any official, while Mr. O'Farrell, as already explained, has been appointed to practically a new office.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): When was this Agricultural Department created, and what are its functions?

*MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Member desires a detailed answer as to the duties of the Department, I am afraid I must ask him to give notice of his question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Surely, if an appointment is made of £1,000 a year for the head of an Agricultural Department, we ought to know what that Department is. We hear of it now for the first time. Does the Department undertake the publication of the Reports of the sales of live meat and the weights? Does it take £1,000 to publish these market Reports?

*MR. JACKSON: Oh, no; there are many very important duties, and I may say none of these appointments were made until after very careful investigation by the Irish Government and the Treasury.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What was the date of the creation of the Department?

Mr. Jackson

The Commission has gone on for ten years without it.

*MR. JACKSON: I am speaking of the appointments made from 1st January.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Was the Department only created then?

*MR. JACKSON: It was not then created, but I referred to these appointments.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But when was it created?

*MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Member will give notice of his question I can give the precise date.

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us, is not Mr. Porter the son-in-law of one Commissioner and Mr. Lynch the son of another? Is not this a family job?

*MR. JACKSON: Mr. Lynch may be the son of a Commissioner, but I believe Mr. Porter is a bachelor.

POOR LAW ELECTIONS, MOHILL

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Local Government Board has been informed that, in the recent Poor Law election for the Caltan Division, Mohill Union, numbers of voting papers were wilfully spoiled by persons who visited the houses of the electors and obtained possession of the papers by threats, and many others were spoiled after they had been given to a constable for delivery to the Returning Officer; and whether a new election has been ordered?

*MR. JACKSON: Complaints of the nature referred to have been received by the Local Government Board. Careful inquiries on the subject are being made.

DISPENSARY DOCTORS, BELFAST UNION.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the population within the area of the Belfast Poor Law Union, the number of dispensary districts and dispensary doctors, the population in each dispensary district, and the salaries paid to the doctors; whether there is any other district in Ireland where dispensary doctors have such large populations within their district ; and whether, in the interest of the poor of Belfast, the Union will be divided into a larger number of dispensary districts, and additional dispensary doctors appointed ?

*MR. JACKSON: The population of the Belfast Union in 1881 was 239,283. There are two dispensary districts, Belfast and Castlereagh. The first-named has ten medical officers, the latter three. The population of the Belfast district in 1881 was 203,000, and of Castlereagh 36,000. The salaries of the medical officers of the Belfast district amount to £1,009. These officers receive salaries varying from £100 to £125. In Castlereagh the three officers receive £145, £135, and £115. While the population is larger than in any other district in Ireland, it should be borne in mind the area of the district is small. No representation has been made to the Local Government Board as to the necessity of subdivision of the district and the appointment of more doctors.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider that, though the area of the district is small, the growth of the population of Belfast has been so exceptional that these medical officers, in proportion to the work done, are the worst paid in Ireland ?

*MR. JACKSON: I am sure if any representation is made to the Local Government Board it will be carefully considered.

DISTRESS IN THE RUSKEY ELECTORAL DIVISION.

MR. O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Ruskey Electoral Division of the Strokestown Union has been scheduled as a congested district ; whether any, and what, steps have been taken to put the Act into operation in the district ; whether there is at present a property, consisting of several thousand acres of unclaimed bog, in the district suitable for planting, drainage, &c. ; and whether, considering the poverty and overpopulation of the division and the high poor rate (varying during recent years from three shillings to six shillings in the pound), he would recommend the purchasing of this property, with the view of giving employment by planting and draining it, and, where practicable, migrating a portion of the population ?

*MR. JACKSON: The Electoral Division mentioned is scheduled as a congested district. The other matters referred to will be considered by the Board when they receive Reports of the inquiries that they have directed to be made.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

MR. SHEEHAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the last sitting of a Sub-Commission for the hearing of fair rent applications took place in the County Kerry ; and when there will be another sitting ?

*MR. JACKSON: The Irish Land Commissioners report that a Sub-Commission sat in the County Kerry during the month of October and November last. The date of the next sitting in that county has not yet been arranged.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if any, and, if so, how many, fair rent applications from the County of Cork served prior to the 29th September, 1887, are still unheard ?

MR. JACKSON: The Land Commissioners report that there are 25 cases in the County Cork still undisposed of in which the originating notices were received in their office prior to 29th September, 1887. Every one of these cases, however, has been already listed for hearing, but adjourned for various reasons.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the existing number of Assistant Land Commissioners, legal and lay, appointed by the Land Commission ; into how many Circuits they are divided ; whether they have been sitting as Sub-Commissioners continuously since October last; and in what Circuit the County of Cork is, and how many counties are included with Cork in the Circuit?

MR. JACKSON: The Land Commissioners report that there are four Legal and 24 Lay Assistant Land Commissioners employed on Sub-Commission duty. These are divided into four Sub-Commissions, each consisting of one Legal and six Lay Commissioners. These gentlemen have been continuously engaged in the disposal of fair rent cases since last October, excepting the Christmas vacation. The Counties of Waterford, Kerry, Queen's County, Carlow, Kilkenny, Cork, Tipperary, Clare, Limerick, and a portion of King's County are included in the Circuit allotted to Sub-Commission No. 2.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH JAMAICA.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a message of the Governor of Jamaica to the Legislative Council of that island, enclosing a letter to His Excellency from the Halifax and Bermudas Cable Company, asking for an annual grant from the island of £2,000 per annum, as a condition of laying a cable to the Island of Jamaica via Turk's Island, and stating that it is proposed to ask the Imperial Government to grant an annual subsidy of £8,000 per annum; and whether Her Majesty's Government has any intention to grant this subsidy?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Secretary of State's attention has been called to the message in question; but it is premature at present to make any statement on the subject.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Do I understand that there is an assurance that before such a subsidy is granted it will be submitted to the House?

BARON H. DE WORMS: That is a question which should be addressed to the First Lord of the Treasury.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I would ask the question now, but I do not see the right hon. Gentleman in his place.

Mr. Maurice Healy

ENFIELD SMALL ARMS FACTORY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he will state what amount was paid in wages at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield, day work and piece work respectively, on the last pay day in March and first pay day in April, 1891; and what amounts for the corresponding periods this year, and the number of men engaged piece and day work on these dates respectively?

MR. BRODRICK: The figures are being prepared. I shall be glad if the hon. Member will repeat his question to-morrow.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he will explain why the notice which was posted at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield, on Friday last, intimating that the factory would be closed on Saturday until further orders, was cancelled on the following day; whether any further discharge would take place in consequence of the cancelling of this order; and, if so, would he take the opinion of the employees at the factory as to their willingness to work short time for the purpose of obviating further discharges; and what number of men were at work on Friday and Saturday last at the factory?

MR. BRODRICK: The notice posted at Enfield, intimating that the factory would be closed until further orders, was cancelled by order of the Secretary of State, who, while hoping to carry out the necessary discharges, by a temporary resort to short time, as gradually as possible, was not prepared to approve the order as it was issued, as its effect would have been the establishment of short time for a long period. Its cancellation will have but a small effect on the number of discharges, and is a question of administration on which it seems scarcely desirable to consult the employees. The number of men at work on Friday last was 1,943, and on Saturday 1,906. This does not represent the whole number on the books, some being absent from temporary causes.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I rather think the hon. Gentleman has not given me the information I want. Surely a week ago there were not so many as 1,900? My question refers to the Friday and Saturday before I gave notice of my question.

MR. BRODRICK: I am speaking of last Friday and Saturday.

CARBINE CONTRACTS TO THE HENRY BARREL COMPANY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what contracts for carbines have been given to the Henry Barrel Company, when were such contracts given, and how many have been delivered up till 31st December, 1891; and if the firm have asked for the assistance of Enfield to turn out this order?

MR. BRODRICK: The only contract under which deliveries could have been made before the end of last year was given in 1890, and was for the conversion of 12,000 carbines to .303 bore. Under this contract 800 had been delivered at the date named. The only other contract with the Henry Barrel Company for carbines was made in the present year for 30,000 carbines for India. Assistance from Enfield has not been asked for.

WASTE WORK STOPPAGES—OLD FORD RIFLE WORKS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the practice of stopping men for waste work, which exists at the Rifle Works, Old Ford, is a breach of the Truck Act; and whether the discontinuance of this practice at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield, has had the result that less waste is made now than previously?

MR. BRODRICK: We have no information as to the practice at the Old Ford Rifle Works in regard to stoppages for waste work. Whether such stoppages constitute a breach of the Truck Act is a legal question, on which I would prefer not to express an opinion. The practice was discontinued at Enfield some four years ago. The amount of waste is dependent on so many circumstances that it is scarcely possible to determine the result of any particular measure.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: May I ask, is not the waste attributable to defective machinery?

MR. BRODRICK: No, I do not think so. As a matter of fact, it is almost impossible to arrive at an exact result.

LONDON SMALL ARMS COMPANY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what contract for the Lee-Metford rifle has been given to the London Small Arms Company; when was such contract given; and what number had been delivered up to 31st December, 1891?

MR. BRODRICK: A contract for 75,000 Lee-Metford rifles was made on 17th February, 1890. To 31st December, 1891, there had been delivered under it 6,743 arms.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he will take steps to put a stop to the system of sub-contracting which exists at the London Small Arms Company; and if there exists any arrangement between the foremen and the Company to lessen the cost of production?

MR. BRODRICK: I have no special knowledge as to the arrangements between the London Small Arms Company and their workmen, but I believe that sub-contracting is more or less a custom in the gun trade.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: May I ask the hon. Gentleman whether sub-contracting is discouraged in this case?

MR. BRODRICK: It is forbidden, except in regard to those portions of a contract where sub-contracts necessarily have to be made.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: But what I want to find out is whether the conditions against sub-contracting is allowed by special arrangement with the Small Arms Company to be dispensed with?

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): May I ask whether the factory clause is inserted in this as in all other contracts?

MR. BRODRICK: The clause is inserted in the contract. We have no knowledge of the sub-contracting referred to, but I believe it is usual, according to the custom of the trade.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I must press this matter of sub-contracting, of which there has been much talk of late. I should like to know if the hon. Gentleman will give some assurance that the grievance of the employees will be considered?

MR. BRODRICK: I will make further inquiries if the hon. Member will put down notice of another question.

SENTENCES ON DYNAMITARDS AND ANARCHISTS.

MR. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will state to the House the official record of the crime of which the Walsall anarchists or dynamitards were convicted and of the sentences imposed; and also the official record of the crime of which the Irish "treason felony" or dynamitard prisoners were convicted and the sentences imposed?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not copies of the records in these cases; and if I had, it would far exceed the limits of an answer to state the effect of all the counts of all the numerous indictments referred to. I may say, generally, that the Walsall anarchists were indicted under the Explosives Act of 1883, and received sentences of ten and five years' penal servitude. "Treason felony" prisoners, whether Irish, English, or Scotch, were indicted under the 11 and 12 Vict., c. 12, and received sentences ranging from transportation or penal servitude for life to penal servitude for five years.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the case of Egan, in whose possession explosives were not found; they were found in his garden?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member will perhaps put notice of his question on the Paper?

PRECAUTIONS AGAINST FAMINE IN INDIA.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Secretary of State for India has been directed to a letter appearing in the Echo of the 6th April, signed by Sir A. Cotton, R.E., K.C.S.I., that the prospects in the part of India now subject to drought seem quite as bad as in 1877, when four millions of people perished, and that, except in the Punjab, where some real grappling with irrigation is now evident, not one single thing has been done since the last famine to provide against another; whether it is the fact, as stated in Sir A. Cotton's letter, three populous districts in Madras—Godavery, Kistna, and Tanjore—had been effectually provided with water, and that in these districts there was sufficient food for the sustenance of the inhabitants, and for the export of provisions which saved millions of lives in the adjacent districts; and will an inquiry be made into Sir A. Cotton's charge, which he says calls for peremptory investigation, that, after the awful results witnessed, not one single step has been taken to extend these effective works to the rest of the country dependent on the North-East monsoon?

MR. CURZON: The Secretary of State has seen Sir A. Cotton's statements. There is no ground for fearing that the distress in South India this year is as severe or as widely extended as at the same season in 1877. Then there were 783,000 persons receiving relief in Madras and Mysore; now the corresponding total is 39,500. The latest information received during the present week from the Governor of Madras does not justify any fresh alarm. As regards the allegation that, "except in the Punjab, not one single thing has been done since the last famine to provide against another," the capital expenditure on irrigation works since 1877 has amounted to Rs.123·85,000; while, in addition to continued expenditure upon existing works, the following new irrigation works have been commenced since 1877:—North-West Provinces.—Betwa Canal. Madras.—Sangam Anicut, Barur Tank, Rushikalya Canal, Periyar Canal. Scinde.—Desert Canal, Unharwah Canal. The facts stated in the second part of the question were, broadly speaking, true of the situation in 1877, and not to the present scarcity, to which they refer. In view of the facts which I have mentioned, the Secretary of State sees no reason to inquire into Sir A. Cotton's allegations.

THE BOARD OF TRADE RETURNS.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to a leading article in the Daily Chronicle of 2nd April, suggesting possible improvements in the monthly trade and navigation statements of the Board of Trade; whether German goods shipped to England via Antwerp are classed in the Returns as Belgian, imports from Norway and Sweden via Hamburg classed as German, imports from the United States via the St. Lawrence classed as Canadian, and imports from Canada via Portland, Boston, and New York classed as United States goods; whether he will consider the possibility of obviating this inaccuracy by reference to the bills of lading and by a greater use of the Merchandise Marks Act, so that the real place of origin may be shown; and whether, with a view to increase the value of the Returns to the commercial community, he will follow the custom of the United States and other countries, and enter more into detail in the information given in these statements?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have looked at the article referred to. It does not accurately describe the present state of affairs. In the import and export statistics of the United States—referred to as superior to our own—no distinction is made at all as regards the countries from which imports are received, but the totals are lumped together from all countries, so that our monthly Returns already give more details than those of the United States. The suggestion contained in the question is one which has often been inquired into by Statistical Committees, with the result that the present practice has been adopted.

German goods coming from Antwerp are not classed in the Returns as Belgian goods, but are entered as coming from Belgium, as is the fact, and so with the other instances mentioned. It is easy to ascertain the country from which goods come to us, while difficulties, delays, and serious inaccuracies would probably be caused by the attempt to give the country of origin. The practice of other leading countries in the matter is not uniform; and some that have attempted to show the country of origin of imports, or the country of ultimate destination of exports, admit their failure. The subject, with others, will be again considered by the Revision Committee of the Board of Trade and Customs which annually considers all representations made for improving the accounts.

RURAL POSTS IN IRELAND.

MR. BARTON (Armagh, Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a Petition has been received by him from the merchants of Portadown and inhabitants of the townlands of Ballinagore, Derryanville, Derrycorey, Derrycarn, and Derrymacal, near Portadown, asking for a rural post delivery to these townlands; whether the prayer of the Petition has been inquired into, and reported on by the Inspector; whether the result of such inquiry and report is favourable to the prayer of the petitioners; and whether, in view of the present serious inconvenience to persons residing in the locality, a rural post delivery will be granted for the district?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Such a Memorial has been received. The arrangement desired by the memorialists appears to be convenient, and I hope that it may be found practicable to adopt it.

THE PLAGUE OF MICE IN SCOTLAND.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, considering that the plague of field mice or voles continues to spread, and is doing most serious damage in certain districts of the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, Dumfriesshire, and other parts of Scotland, he will appoint a Departmental Committee to have a thoroughly scientific investigation of this scourge, and of the best methods of stamping it out?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I replied on Thursday last to a precisely similar question, and I am afraid I have nothing to add to what I said on that occasion. I must refer the hon. Member to the answer I then gave.

MR. MARK STEWART: Will the right hon. Gentleman make further investigations during the Recess?

MR. CHAPLIN: I beg to say that we have already made as full investigation into this question as seems to be possible, and there is nothing to lead me to believe that I should acquire any further information which would tend to throw any fresh light on the question. I frankly acknowledge that I do not see my way to any action on the part of the Board of Agriculture.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY.

MR. MARK STEWART: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture what progress the survey on the scale of the six remaining Scotch counties is making; how long in each case is it expected that the survey will take with the present staff employed; and when is it anticipated that it will be completed?

MR. CHAPLIN: The arrangement come to some time ago was to employ four out of the 18 Survey Commissioners in Scotland as soon as the Lancashire and Yorkshire surveys were finished. This arrangement will be adhered to.

CAPTAIN BUTCHER AND THE MANIPUR DISASTER.

MR. KING: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether Captain G. H. Butcher, whom the Indian military authorities have removed from the Army on account of his conduct during the recent deplorable events at Manipur, asked for a Court Martial; and, if so, why it was refused?

MR. CURZON: On the receipt of the Report of the Court of Inquiry which sat at Manipur to investigate the circumstances of the disaster, Captain Butcher was furnished with the passages from the Report dealing with his conduct, and was requested to submit explanations. It was on those explanations that the Commander-in-Chief in India recommended Captain Butcher's removal from the Service, which was carried out by the Secretary of State. Under the Queen's Regulations, no officer is entitled to a Court Martial, and neither the military authorities in India nor the Secretary of State saw anything in the case to justify them in granting Captain Butcher's request for one.

SORTERS IN THE POST OFFICE.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, on 5th February, the Lords of the Treasury sanctioned an increase of 49 first class sorters in the Circulation Department, and whether the sanction was dated 23rd January; whether a large number of second class sorters have been performing first class duties since the above was issued; and whether any appointments to the first class have been made; and, if so, how many?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The answer to the first two paragraphs is, Yes. No appointments to the 49 vacancies have yet been made, but they are under consideration.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE IN WEST AFRICA.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs at what date communications between Her Majesty's Government and Alnamy Sammory were first initiated; and whether at any time, and, if more than once, at what dates, Alnamy Sammory has expressed his desire to Her Majesty's Government, either through official channels or otherwise, to place his dominions, or any portion of them, under the protection of the Queen?

BARON H. DE WORMS (who replied) said: The first occasion on which Sahnadoo sent messengers to the Government of Sierra Leone appears to have been in 1880 in reply to letters which had been sent to him and other Chiefs in the interior by Sir S. Rowe in 1879, for the purpose of encouraging trade between their countries and Sierra Leone. The next visit was in 1885, on which occasion Sahmadoo's messenger made a statement to Major Festing to the effect that his master wished to ask the Queen to take the whole of his territories under her protection. In reporting this statement in June, 1886, Sir S. Rowe stated that he did not attach much importance to it, but looked upon it as a mere expression of politeness. In March, 1886, Sahmadoo had already concluded a Treaty with the French Government by which, as they have informed Her Majesty's Government, he placed his countries under the Protectorate of France. He also made further Treaties with the French in 1887 and 1889. Sahmadoo has on subsequent occasions repudiated his Treaties with the French, and asked for British protection; but Her Majesty's Government were of course, under the circumstances of his engagements to France, debarred from complying with his request.

Mr. Mark Stewart

MR. LAWRENCE: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell me in what month of 1885 the first application was made to Her Majesty's Government?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I cannot say without notice.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the statement in the Figaro of 23rd January, 1892, that, by an arrangement of 26th June, 1891, England recognises French possession of the sources of the Niger on the eastern frontier of Sierra Leone; what is the nature of the arrangement referred to; and whether, considering the publicity already given to the matter in France, he is prepared to lay it upon the Table of the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): My attention has been called to the statement referred to. The arrangement mentioned is one for the purpose of delimiting a portion of the boundary between Sierra Leone and the French Protectorate, and also for delimiting a portion of the western boundary of the colony of the Gold Coast. Papers relating to the Agreement will be prepared and laid.

THE GIBRALTAR SANITARY BOARD.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what was the reason for the change made in the constitution of the Sanitary Board of Gibraltar by the Order in Council of October, 1891?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The reasons will be disclosed by the correspondence about to be laid; but it may be stated briefly that, looking to the interests at stake, Her Majesty's Government considered that they should have more control over the Sanitary Board than they had before October, 1891.

EXCISE OFFICERS' PETITION.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what reply has been made to the Petition of the Excise officers sent in May last to the Board of Inland Revenue for transmission to the Treasury?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): I must ask the hon. Member if he will put off this question, as I have not had an opportunity of conferring with the Chancellor of the Exchequer on this subject.

LETTERS TO MEMBERS.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of the near approach of the Easter Recess, he will consider the propriety of directing that letters addressed to Members of this House shall be re-directed to their addresses in the country?

SIR J. FERGUSON: I presume that the hon. Member means gratuitous re-direction. I have no power to remit the usual charge to Members of Parliament; but the whole question of charges for re-direction is under consideration.

MR. MACNEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman give instructions to the Post Office officials of the House to put our letters into large envelopes? I sometimes have to pay as much as 1s. a day for my letters.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman if the Post Office is using the powers given to it last Session with respect to the posting of letters?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: In answer to that, I can only say that we are using the powers.

THE DUBLIN POST AND TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if higher scales of pay and higher positions have been abolished or reduced anywhere else in the Kingdom but Dublin by the recent revision of sorting offices generally; and, if so, to what extent as compared with Dublin; on what grounds the abolition has been made, in face of the immense increase of the quantity and quality of the things carried by the Post Office; when and why the abolished or reduced higher scales of pay and higher positions were established or last raised; and whether, and, if so, how, it is proposed to compensate those officers whose prospects have been injured by this revision?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Dublin postal and telegraph establishment has recently been revised in order to bring it into line with other establishments of the same class in the United Kingdom. The old establishment at Dublin was irregular and anomalous—e.g., the chief supervision of the telegraph duties being relegated to officers belonging to the postal branch, and in other respects. Under the changes of classification thus carried out, the staff generally have obtained material advantages in pay and prospects of promotion; and everything possible has been done to preserve the interests of the few officers who received no immediate benefit from the revision by allowing them to retain their old scales. Of course, no reduction has been made in the pay of any officer in consequence of these changes.

THE DELIVERY OF POST PARCELS.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if in the ordinary course of transmission a parcel for Cork posted in London early on Wednesday should have been delivered before the following Friday; whether the Postal authorities are justified in saying that such delivery was within a reasonable time; and whether the Post Office officials are correct in stating that they are not obliged to deliver Parcel Post parcels promptly?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: If for Cork itself it should have been delivered on Thursday afternoon; if for a place outside Cork, on Friday morning. Such would be reasonable. The rule is that parcels are to be delivered without delay, provided that the delivery of letters is not impeded.

THE CASE OF JAMES HUGHES.

STRANRAER.

MR. MARK STEWART: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if it is the case that James Hughes, of Stranraer, who was nominated by the Lords of the Treasury as a Customs boatman, was refused admission to examination by the Civil Service Commissioners on the ground of unsatisfactory certificates as to character; whether, when applied to, the Civil Service Commissioners refused all explanations of the grounds of their decision, although the Provost of Stranraer and other respectable tradesmen certify to Hughes's good character; and whether the Order in Council authorises the action of the Civil Service Commissioners?

SIR J. GORST: James Hughes passed his examination; but the Civil Service Commissioners having made the usual inquiries, were unable to certify that his character was such as to qualify him for public employment. The Commissioners have refused in this as in all other cases to make public the confidential communications which they receive in answer to inquiries as to character. I am not aware that the Orders in Council allow any appeal in such a case from the decision of the Commissioners.

POSTAL DELIVERY IN COUNTY KILKENNY.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) (for Mr. CHANCE): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the letters for the district of County Kilkenny, between and round Hugginstown and Harristown Post Offices, lie there, until called for, often for a month; and whether he would take steps to remedy this inconvenience by having the delivery extended for two miles to Monroe School, which is attended by the great majority of the children of the locality?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am sorry I have not been able to obtain this information, and I am afraid I shall not be able to do so till after the holidays.

THE IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can give any figures showing the comparative volume of the mails transmitted between Dublin and Belfast, as compared with the mails transmitted between Dublin and Cork, including in the latter the American mails?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am unable to give the precise figures, but will have Returns made. I am sorry to find that I misled the hon. Member the other day in stating, in reply to his supplementary question, that the volume of mails on the Northern and Southern lines, of which I spoke, included all the through mails. I so read the information which I had received. The fact is, as I understand, that the volume of local mails carried by the two lines is not very different, while the American mails would render that over the Great Southern and Western much larger, and heavy mails are in addition carried to Belfast by the Stranraer route.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: When will the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to give me the information?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have directed that an account shall be kept. The letters are not weighed; they are only counted. After the holidays I shall be able to give the hon. Member the information.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he can grant the Motion for to-day relating to the Irish Mail Service?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will answer this question. I cannot give the Correspondence between the Post Office and a Railway Company. It is not usual to publish Correspondence relating to a Departmental arrangement, but the results are known to Parliament.

DR. TANNER: Seeing that there is such a difference of opinion between the Treasury and the Post Office, will the right hon. Gentleman not afford us an opportunity of ascertaining where the blame lies?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have already given the House all the information I have on the subject. The House knows quite as much as I do about it.

ROMAN CATHOLIC MAGISTRATES AND DEPUTY LIEUTENANTS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what proportion of the inhabitants of County Donegal belong to the Roman Catholic religion, and what proportion of the Magistrates of the same county are Roman Catholics; and how many Roman Catholics in the said county have attained to the rank of Deputy Lieutenant?

*MR. JACKSON: As regards the religious persuasion of the inhabitants of County Donegal, the hon. Member will find all the information in the Census Returns when they are issued. There is no official record kept of the religion of gentlemen appointed to the Commission of the Peace, and it would be impossible to get the detailed information sought in that direction. No official record is kept of the number of Roman Catholics appointed to the office of Deputy Lieutenant; but, as I have stated in reply to previous questions, the Lord Lieutenant of a county is always ready to consider the names of Roman Catholics submitted to him for Commissions of the Peace, and the Lord Chancellor is always ready to give effect to his recommendations.

ELTHAM WOODS.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have signed a provisional agreement to sell the Eltham Woods to a private association?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have entered into a provisional agreement for the sale of Eltham Park; whether the London County Council is trying to acquire the park; and whether the Government will prevent the sale of the property to private individuals until the Representative Authority of London has had full opportunity of negotiating for the purchase of it for the use of the people of London?

SIR J. GORST: My right hon. Friend has asked me to answer this question. The answer to the first question is, No. The Commissioners of Woods have no knowledge that the London County Council is trying to acquire either Eltham Woods or the residence and land known as Eltham Lodge, or North Park, Eltham.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether in the public interest the County Council should not be given an opportunity of purchasing this land before any other body?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir. I do not think the Woods and Forests Commissioners can give the right of pre-emption to the London County Council. I am not aware that any negotiations on the subject have been entered into by them.

OVERTIME IN THE POST OFFICE.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that the uniform rate of overtime payment allowed by the Treasury for clerks of the Second Division and paid to officers of that class in Departments other than the Post Office is 1s. 6d. per hour; and, if so, why are the Second Division clerks in the Post Office not paid at that rate; and whether sorting clerks, postmen, and other classes of the minor establishment of the Post Office are paid for overtime at a rate and a quarter with a maximum of 1s. 7d. per hour; and, if so, will he extend this principle of payment to the major establishment, in so far as it is covered by the present limit allowed by the Treasury?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: In the Post Office, subject to a prescribed maximum, Second Division clerks are paid for overtime rateably upon their salaries. The practice could hardly be altered in the case of Second Division clerks without a similar alteration throughout the Post Office generally; and this would involve a very large outlay. An application to that effect has, however, been received from some of their number and it is under consideration. It is not proposed to extend the principle of paying for overtime at a rate and a quarter beyond the classes which now receive it.

DRIFT FISHING IN THE SUIR.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (for MR. CHANCE): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government will lay upon the Table of the House the evidence taken by the Irish Fisheries Commissioners at Waterford on 3rd August last, when they refused to amend the bye-law of 15th July, 1884, prohibiting drift fishing in the tidal waters of the Suir above Drumdowney Point, or to revert to the previously existing bye-laws permitting drift fishing up to Fishertown Point and Glasshouse Quay; whether he is aware that since the passing of the bye-law of July, 1884, the drift fishers at Ballinalaw and Glasshouse have become impoverished, and the number of amateur rod fishers on the Suir largely increased; and whether the Government intend to make any provision for protecting public rights on that river, and for repairing the quay at Glasshouse, now ruinous and dangerous to the working fishermen using it?

MR. JACKSON: I find that the shorthand writer's notes of the proceedings in Court before the Inspectors of Fisheries in the case referred to are, together with the evidence, available, and if the hon. Member thinks it of importance and desires to move for it I shall not oppose it. There are no funds at the disposal of the Government for the purpose of repairing the quay mentioned.

LETTERKENNY DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many Catholic members are on the Donegal District Asylum Board, and how many Protestant members; and whether, having regard to the fact that the Catholic population of the county far outnumbers all other denominations in it, he would recommend the appointment of other Catholic members?

Mr. J. Rowlands

MR. JACKSON: The Board of the Letterkenny District Asylum consists of 18 members, of whom nine are selected from nominations made by the Grand Jury, and nine are nominated by the Lord Lieutenant. There is no official record of the religions of the gentlemen so appointed.

MR. MAC NEILL: Does the right hon. Gentleman know how many are Catholics and how many are not?

MR. JACKSON: No, I do not, and I suppose there is no record of it.

ALLEGED VIOLENCE BY THE IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether there has been any inquiry by the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary as to the circumstances under which Constable Millar of that Force fractured the skull of a man named Francis Coogan by a blow of his baton, in Belfast, on the night of the 10th ultimo; and whether Coogan's life is or has been in danger?

MR. JACKSON: The Constabulary Authorities report that the constable alleges that he was attacked by the man referred to, and that he struck him in self-defence. The man's life does not appear to have ever been in actual danger. It is understood that legal proceedings are contemplated against the constable by the complainant, when the circumstances will be fully investigated on oath.

MR. SEXTON: If there are no legal proceedings will there be an inquiry?

MR. JACKSON: I think the hon. Member will see that if proceedings are going to be taken it is desirable that the case should not be prejudiced on one side or the other.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Has not the constable his remedy at law?

MR. JACKSON: I do not think I can go into that matter.

THE SCARIFF DOCKS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the ruinous condition of the Scariff (County Clare) Docks and the roadway leading thereto has been brought under the notice of the Irish Board of Works, in whom the control of the docks and the Scariff River navigation is vested; whether it is a fact that there is neither a crane nor a weighing machine on the pier, although there is a regular service of twelve steamers plying to and from the dock weekly; and whether, in view of the great importance of this quay to the trade of the surrounding neighbourhood, he will give instructions to the Board of Works to have the necessary improvements immediately carried out?

SIR J. GORST: I am informed that the Scariff Quay is in fair order, and the road up to it within the Board's boundaries is in good order. I am advised that the traffic would not justify the erection of a crane by the Government, and there is no weighing machine at any quay on the Shannon. The approach road from Scariff is a County road, and the Board cannot spend money in improving it.

MR. COX: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire whether there is not a weighing machine at Killaloe?

SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Member will repeat his question I shall be able to give an answer.

HAULBOWLINE DOCKYARD.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many dockyard employees are now working at Haulbowline; what is the nature of their employment; and whether any skilled dockyard artificers are now employed at Haulbowline?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Excluding men employed under the Works Department, there are at present 21 men working in the dockyard at Haulbowline. These men are at present engaged in the repair and maintenance of caissons, yard machinery, pumping engines, steam launches, boats, yard plant, &c. Among these men are included six skilled dockyard artificers.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I should like to know how the machinery comes to require repairs, considering that it has never yet been set in motion?

No answer was given.

THE GLENBEIGH ARTILLERY RANGE.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the artillery practice carried on at Glenbeigh seriously interferes with the salmon fishing and the gathering of cockles at low water in Caran Estuary, County Kerry, which are sources of livelihood for the poor people of the neighbourhood; and whether he will give directions to have a stop put to this artillery practice?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The case of the Glenbeigh range will be considered by the Committee on Target Practice Seawards. Bye-laws have been recently framed, after a public inquiry, but they will not be promulgated till the Committee has reported.

MR. MAC NEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that reports have been made that this place is seriously affected by the artillery practice?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I am not aware, but if the hon. Member will give me any evidence on the point full inquiry shall be made.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Target Practice Committee will hold sittings in Ireland for the purpose of making local inquiries, as they have done at different places in England?

MR. E. STANHOPE: That question will lie entirely with the Committee, and if evidence is tendered I have no doubt they will accept it.

ILLEGITIMACY IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he would be willing to support a Bill to confer on the mother of a child born out of wedlock the same rights and obligations towards that child as if the child had been born in wedlock, and to confer on the person acknowledging himself to be the father of a child born out of wedlock, or against whom a bastardy order has been made in respect of a child, the same rights and obligations towards that child as if the child had been born in wedlock?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I cannot give the hon. Member my decision on this question until I have seen his proposals put in the form of a Bill.

THE CONFIRMATION OF ASYLUM INMATES.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in view of the fact that certain inmates of the Starcross Idiots Asylum have recently been confirmed by the Bishop of Exeter, whether any of those who were confirmed are still in the asylum; and whether any steps will be taken to ascertain their mental condition with a view to their release?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no official information as to the facts referred to by the hon. Member. The Lunacy Commissioners inform me that they will inquire whether any of the inmates of the Starcross Asylum are fit for discharge. It does not follow from the fact that they have been, no doubt most properly, confirmed, that it would be expedient to deprive them of the care and training which the asylum affords.

MR. COBB: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Bishop gave as the reason for confirming these idiots that the weakest minds were most open to religious influences?

MR. MATTHEWS: Oh, no, Sir; I have no information of that sort.

A SCHOOL BOARD FOR HANDSWORTH.

MR. P. STANHOPE (Wednesbury): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether, having had sufficient opportunity to consider the representations which the Education Department have received from Handsworth, Staffordshire, he is now prepared to take steps, under Sub-section (2) of Section 12 of the Education Act of 1870, in order to constitute a School Board for Handsworth?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The case was not so clear as to justify the Department in acting under Section 12

(2) of the Elementary Education Act, 1870, and notices are in course of preparation for the supply of the deficiency in the manner prescribed by Section 9, but if the feeling of the inhabitants is strongly in favour of a School Board being set up immediately they cannot do better than pass a resolution to that effect under Section 12 (1).

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside) : I should like to ask whether in this and all other cases the rule applies with respect to applications?

*SIR W. HART DYKE : I have fully answered that question in regard to the application of the section in this particular case, and I am not sure that I know what exceptions the right hon. Gentleman has in his mind.

MR. MUNDELLA : I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that it does not apply to London.

*SIR W. HART DYKE : Oh, no, Sir. Does the right hon. Gentleman refer to a previous question?

MR. MUNDELLA : I do.

*SIR W. HART DYKE : I do not know whether I am in Order in referring to a previous question, but if I am I can only repeat that the particular case is before the Department, and a final decision has not been arrived at. I have already stated that the Permanent Secretary is away, and I have not been able to confer with him in the matter.

THE IRISH EDUCATION BILL.

MR. FLYNN : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has seen a copy of the resolution passed at a meeting of the Bishops and Archbishops of Ireland on the subject of the Irish Education Bill, and which called upon the Government to "Give effect to the recommendations of the Powis Commission in the matter of religious freedom in unmixed schools ;"

and whether these resolutions of an important body will be taken into consideration by the Government?

MR. JACKSON : Yes, Sir ; by the courtesy of the Catholic Bishop of Galway I received copies of the resolutions referred to, and the hon. Member himself sent me a newspaper cutting. I do not think I can add to the statement I made during the introductory stage of the Education Bill?

MR. FLYNN : Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to give no consideration to this resolution?

MR. JACKSON : I do not think the hon. Member must draw any conclusion of that sort, but he must bear in mind that the Commission sat as long ago as 1868 or 1870, and since then there has been a reasonable amount of time.

THE SENATE OF LONDON UNIVERSITY.

MR. SUMMERS : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any, and, if so, what, steps have been taken to fill up the vacancies on the Senate of London University caused by the deaths of the Duke of Devonshire and Dr. Hirst?

MR. MATTHEWS : I have submitted to Her Majesty the name of a gentleman to succeed the Duke of Devonshire in the Senate of the University of London. When Convocation has nominated their list of those persons to supply the vacancy caused by the death of Dr. Wood, I shall in due course submit to Her Majesty the name of a gentleman to succeed Dr. Hirst.

THE DISTRICT MESSENGER SERVICE.

MR. LABOUCHERE : I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests are exacting a charge of 5s. per annum from the District Messenger Service and News Company for premium to maintain any attachment, for the purpose of carrying a wire for telegraphic communication, to the chimney stack of any house of which the Crown is the ground landlord ; and whether he will consider the expediency of urging on the Commissioners of Woods and Forests the desirability of allowing their tenants to become subscribers to companies providing means for telegraphic communication without exacting from the companies this rent?

SIR J. GORST : The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. I see no ground for urging the Commissioners of Woods and Forests to alter the arrangement.

ORNAMENTAL GARDENING IN THE GREEN PARK.

MR. SEAGER HUNT (Marylebone, W.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he will consider the advisability of planting with flowers the Piccadilly side of the Green Park in a manner similar to that in which the Park Lane side of Hyde Park is planted?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The Piccadilly side of the Green Park was formerly planted with flowers, but the planting was discontinued some years ago, owing chiefly to the fact of the trees having grown so much at that time that they shaded the beds and spoiled the flowers; and this difficulty, in the way of making such planting successful, would be greater now by reason of the further growth of the trees. I think we must apply such funds as we can afford for this kind of ornamental gardening in those places where it can be carried out to the best advantage.

THE CORK COURT HOUSE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by whom the costs of the Act passed last Session for the rebuilding of the Cork Court House was defrayed; whether he is aware that all the criminal business of the County and City of Cork is done in the building in question, and that, in addition to this, the Winter Assizes for the whole of Munster is frequently held there, and large numbers of criminal cases from all parts of Ireland have been, at the instance of the Irish Executive, tried there within the past ten years; whether the Government propose to contribute anything to the rebuilding of the Court House; and whether there is any distinction in principle between this case and that of the Green Street Court House, in which the Government offered to contribute a large sum towards the costs of rebuilding?

MR. JACKSON: The cost of the Act referred to is presumably to be paid by the Local Authorities. I know of no intention on the part of the Government to make any contribution towards rebuilding the Court House.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the second and fourth paragraphs.

MR. JACKSON: I presume that there is a certain portion of criminal business done in the Court House, but I have no knowledge of the circumstances which led the Government to give in this case a contribution to the cost of the Green Street Court House in Dublin. I see nothing to distinguish Cork from the other counties of Ireland.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I did not ask the right hon. Gentleman whether Cork should be differentiated from the other counties of Ireland. I asked him whether Cork was differentiated from Green Street?

MR. JACKSON: I have no knowledge of the circumstances.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I will put it on the Paper.

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Gentleman will allow me to answer, I will say that I have no knowledge of the circumstances which led the Government to promise a contribution in the case of Green Street in Dublin, and I know nothing which differentiates Cork from the rest of the counties of Ireland.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I shall repeat the question, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will then have the information.

MR. JOHN HOOD.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in consequence of Mr. John Hood being deprived of his means of livelihood through having given evidence before a Committee of this House, and therefore under the protection of this House, he will receive at the hands of Her Majesty's Government compensation for the loss he has sustained?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not know any precedent for the course proposed by the hon. Gentleman, nor do I think it would be convenient to make one.

ALLOTMENTS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to bring in a Bill this Session to make provision for conferring on Scotland the same powers which are in operation in England and Ireland in regard to allotments?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The conditions in Scotland differ very much from those in England, and there is not the same desire or necessity in Scotland for a Bill of this kind; but, at the same time, the Government are perfectly ready to extend these powers to Scotland, if there is any wish for them.

RURAL POSTMEN IN IRELAND.

MR. FLYNN (for Mr. MAC NEILL): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that James M'Carthy, a rural postman, walks with the mails every morning from Money-more to Miscarn, a distance to and fro of 14 miles, for the salary of 9s. per week; and whether, having regard to the great distance this man goes on foot in all weathers, he will be able to see his way to making some increase of his salary?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Attention has already been called to this case, and it is intended to raise the postman's wages.

THE CHICAGO EXHIBITION.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in considering the question of an increase of the grant for the Chicago Exhibition, the Government will also consider the question of allocating Ireland's share of that grant to a committee of Irishmen; and how soon he will be in a position to state whether an increased grant has been sanctioned; and, if so, to what amount?

SIR J. GORST: The Government cannot possibly at present say when the question of the increased grant will be considered.

TELEGRAPH STATION FOR FENIT, COUNTY KERRY.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General how soon the promised telegraph station will be opened at Fenit, County Kerry?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am sorry that no time can be fixed, as a difficulty about a wayleave has occurred.

THE COST OF THE POWIS COMMISSION.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Government would have any objection to furnish a Return showing the total cost of the Powis Commission?

SIR J. GORST: The right hon. Gentleman has asked me to answer this question. I beg to refer the hon. Baronet to pp. 24-25 of the Parliamentary Paper No. 426 for 1888, which shows that the total cost of the Powis Commission was £17,185.

THE REBELLION IN PAHANG.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies a question of which I have given him private notice. It is whether he is in possession of any further information respecting the rebellion in Pahang?

BARON H. DE WORMS: On Saturday the Secretary of State telegraphed to the Straits Settlement for full particulars as to the late events in Pahang. He telegraphed to Singapore; and meanwhile a telegram was received yesterday from the Governor, who was at Pahang, in the following words:—

"Two Englishmen, employees of Timber Company—Harris and Stewart—separately murdered at Pahang by petty chief from Pekan. No reason to think that murder was connected with other disturbances."

This morning a telegram was received from the Colonial Secretary at Singapore in answer to the Secretary of State's inquiry. It is dated yesterday, and runs as follows:—

"3rd April, British authorities at Pekan warned that Panglima Muda, River Jempul, intended mischief. Threat verified by murder Stewart, Harris, employees of Exploration Company, at work in forest. 6th April, Magistrate of Pahang in expectation of attack, all safe up to 9th April. Her Majesty's ship Hyacinth proceeds immediately for Pahang. Disquieting rumours from Raub. Possibility of hostilities there and Lepis. Rogers in safety with Sultan up country, 6th April. Officers' families arrived at Singapore."

I may add that Raub, one of the mining centres in Pahang, is in telegraphic communication with the colony.

THE GRESHAM UNIVERSITY.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury if he can now give us any information in reference to the composition of the Commission appointed to inquire with regard to the Gresham University?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I am not able to give my hon. Friend any information on the subject yet; but if possible I shall do so before the House rises.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON AND HOME RULE.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland a question of which I have given him private notice. It is whether his attention has been drawn to the report of a speech delivered by the hon. Member for North Armagh, in Belfast, in which, anticipating the establishment of an Irish Parliament, the hon. and gallant Gentleman is reported to have said—

"We intend to oppose by every means God has given us the creation of such an Authority in Ireland, and we intend to defy its authority; we intend to undermine and destroy it"?

I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Criminal Law Procedure (Ireland) Act does not contain a clause empowering the Crown to prosecute persons suspected of an intention to commit, or to induce others to commit, a crime; whether it is any crime to attempt to undermine or destroy by any means any institution by law established; and whether it is intended to institute any prosecution in this case; and, if not, are Irish Members at liberty to declare that they would refuse to obey the County Councils if by law established in Ireland, and thus to set the law at defiance?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): The hon. Member was good enough to give me private notice of this question, but I must point out that it is founded upon an erroneous assumption as to an essential matter of fact. There is not in Ireland a Parliament by law established, and, therefore, the question does not arise.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury if he intends to fulfil his promise to visit Belfast, and if he goes there will he endorse the statement of the Member for North Armagh?

PEERS AND THE ELECTION OF COMMONERS.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether there is any rule of etiquette which prevents the English Lord Chancellor from attending public meetings in favour of a candidate of any Party, and if such a rule exists why does it not apply to the Irish Lord Chancellor?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I was not aware that there was any such rule as that to which the hon. and learned Gentleman refers. If he will put a question on the Paper, I will make inquiries in the proper quarter, and ascertain if it is so.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Is there any rule preventing Peers from interfering with the election of Commoners?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Oh, yes, Sir. I thought the hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the Lord Chancellor.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if it has his sanction that this particular Peer has been intermeddling with the election of a Commoner?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is a fact that has to be proved yet.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I will have to call the attention of the Government to-morrow to a report in reference to this matter which appeared in the Times newspaper.

VICTUALLING STORES.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if a reply has been sent to the letter of the Comptroller General, dated 31st December last, re the "establishment" of stores at Sierra Leone and elsewhere; and whether he can give the House an assurance that such losses as have occurred at Sierra Leone will not be permitted in any of the victualling yards, by supplying them according to a fixed "establishment," without reference to "issues," seeing that £1,100 of stores sent to Sierra Leone have been condemned, on return in June, 1890, as only worth £105, and regarding which the Comptroller adds that

"Other condemnations of victualling stores returned from the same yard may be expected to be found in later accounts of the Royal Victoria Yard."

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. FORWOOD, Lancashire, Ormskirk): The letter referred to by the hon. Member for Sunderland has been answered. Stores at depôts are fixed on an "establishment" based on the estimated demands. This "establishment" has to be varied from time to time, and reductions were found possible at Sierra Leone, which accounts for an unusual amount of depreciation on the stores returned to this country. The condemnations and losses on account of victualling stores from all sources in the year 1890 barely exceeded $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the value of stocks in the depôts and on board ship, and this small loss on perishable stores exposed in trying climates is a satisfactory testimony to the care exercised as regards the extent of stock and its custody.

MR. GOURLEY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say anything about the figures?

MR. FORWOOD: Perhaps the hon. Member will repeat the question to the Financial Secretary.

MR. GOURLEY: I will repeat it.

ENGINE-ROOM ARTIFICERS.

SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, through dearth of engine-room artificers, the number of this class has been reduced in Her Majesty's ships recently commissioned and additional chief stokers are being employed?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No. The changes alluded to are the result of a careful investigation and revision of existing and past complements, and are not in any way influenced by the numbers of the existing lists.

THE HARBOUR OF SAN QUINTIN.

COLONEL HAMILTON (Southwark, Rotherhithe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to a telegram from San Diego, California, which appeared in the New York Herald of the 24th March, stating that there was a scheme on the part of Great Britain to secure the harbour of San Quintin for a coaling station, and that the Mexican International Company was being used as a cloak for the same; and whether there is any truth in these allegations?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: My attention has been called to the telegram in question. There is no truth whatever in either of the specific allegations referred to in the hon. Member's question.

MR. BARTLEY: Arising out of this answer, may I ask the hon. Gentleman whether he will send a copy of his reply to Her Majesty's Minister at Washington?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir; there is no objection to that course being taken.

THE PRISONER HANDLEY.

MR. T. J. HEALY (Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why the prisoner Handley, convicted at the recent Wicklow Assizes for a murder committed in the County Wicklow, is to be executed in Wexford; whether there is a county gaol in Wicklow where the execution could take place; and, if that gaol is not convenient for the purpose, why the execution should not be carried out in Dublin, or some other place nearer the scene of the murder than Wexford?

MR. JACKSON: The Lord Lieutenant's Order of 6th April, 1880, closing Wicklow Prison, directs that Wexford Prison shall be the legal place of detention for prisoners from the County Wicklow. His Excellency has been advised that the sentence referred to cannot legally be carried out in any prison other than Wexford.

JURORS AT CRIMINAL TRIALS.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, in view of the remarks made at the trial of the Walsall Anarchists on the hardship of criminal jurors having to wait during the hearing without remuneration, when he is reported to have promised to take note of the matter as a great hardship, he will consider the desirability of amending the law at an early date in order to give reasonable allowances for loss of time, and travelling, and other expenses to jurymen at Assizes, Quarter Sessions, and Coroner's inquests?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Her Majesty's Government are fully alive to the burden which is imposed upon jurors in criminal cases by the fact that no allowance is made for their expenses, and the matter is receiving consideration. It is, however, a question of considerable difficulty, and it is necessary that accurate information should be obtained as to the probable charge which the amendment of the law suggested by the hon. Member would entail upon the Exchequer.

MR. JUSTICE ROMER.

MR. DUNCAN (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, in the event of Mr. Justice Romer being unfortunately prevented by the continuance of illness from resuming work in Court immediately after the Easter Vacation, any, and what, arrangements will be made for the transaction of business in his Court?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I am not in a position to say what arrangements will be made if, unfortunately, Mr. Justice Romer should be unable to sit after the Easter Vacation. The Lord Chancellor and the Lord Chief Justice will, if necessary, take the matter under their consideration. I hope, however, that the speedy recovery of the learned Judge will prevent the necessity for any action being taken in the matter.

ROAD CONTRACTORS IN IRELAND.

MR. T. J. HEALY: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he is aware that, at the Wexford Spring Assizes, the tender of a man, named John Smith, who tendered to keep in repair a road in the Barony of Ballaghkeene North at the rate of 5d. per perch, was rejected, and the contract given to a man, named Tomkins, at 7d. per perch, although Smith and his sureties were perfectly solvent; and if he will explain why Smith's tender, which was the lowest, was not accepted, having regard to the provisions of the Irish Grand Jury Act and the cases decided thereon?

MR. MADDEN: The facts are substantially as stated in the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question. I do not know, and I have no means of ascertaining, why Smith's tender was not accepted.

THE INCIDENCE OF TAXATION.

VISCOUNT CURZON (Bucks, Wycombe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government would assent to the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the incidence of taxation generally, and especially of local taxation, with a view to ascertain whether there are certain classes of property now exempt which ought to contribute to such local taxation, and whether certain properties now rated are unduly burdened?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to my noble Friend, I have to say that the Government see great advantages in an inquiry into some of the points mentioned in his question. There is no doubt a great deal of ignorance prevailing upon the subject of the incidence of taxation, especially of local taxation, in the public mind; and an investigation by some competent body into the complicated facts of ownership in London, and problems arising therefrom, would, I think, be useful. It would be impossible to find the material for a Commission like that now inquiring into labour, even if the proposed investigation could conveniently be entrusted to such a body. Probably the best way will be to appoint a small body of experts with instructions to examine and analyse the facts, though not necessarily to make recommendations as to the public policy which ought to be based on the facts.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether by experts he means professional valuers and surveyors; and whether he is aware that a great number of expert witnesses on every side of the question have given evidence at great length on the subject before the Town Holdings Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: By experts I do not necessarily mean those professionally engaged in surveying or valuing land. I meant persons who have an acquaintance with practical economic investigation, which often lies at the root of all these matters. I am aware that a variety of evidence has been given on the subject before the Town Holdings Committee.

THE SCOTTISH SEA FISHERIES.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state in what manner it is the intention of the Government to give effect to the Resolution recently passed by the House with regard to Scottish sea fisheries; and whether the Government will consent to allow the Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Bill to be read a second time, and then to be referred to a Select Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand it is the intention of my noble Friend the Secretary for Scotland to bring forward a proposal in the House of Lords to carry out the Resolution of this House with regard to Scottish sea fisheries. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will find it convenient to await that proposal before he proceeds with the Bill mentioned in the final paragraph of his question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: When the Bill comes down here I shall oppose it, or any Bill of the kind, unless the same powers are applied to Ireland in accordance with the undertaking to abolish Irish trawling as well as to abolish Scotch trawling.

STATUTE LAW REVISION.

Lords Message [7th April] considered.

Ordered, That Mr. Howell be added to the Joint Committee on Statute Law Revision.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Lords to acquaint their Lordships that this House has added One of its Members to the Joint Committee on Statute Law Revision, as requested by their Lordships.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WAYS AND MEANS—COMMITTEE.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT, 1892-3.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

*(4.53.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Mr. Courtney: it frequently happens that when a traveller finds himself in a mountainous country and is ascending a slope he fancies that the point which he sees above him is the highest point of the hill, only to find when he reaches it that it is not the top, and that he has still further slopes to climb. We have had a similar experience during the last few years, as we have been ascending the curve of financial prosperity. For two or three years running we thought that the top was in sight; we thought that we should soon reach the table land, and have no further heights to scale, even if we did not actually find a decline; but still the curve led happily upwards. Time after time, Estimates framed on the theory that the top was in sight have been exceeded—happily exceeded I think for the benefit of the country. Last year we really thought that the top had been reached, and I think I may say, on the whole, that the forecast was justified. I am again, however, permitted by fortune to submit a surplus to the Committee—a surplus of £1,067,000, which I owe, as I say, to good fortune; partly also, I hope I may say, to the moderation of the spending Departments. That surplus is not due to any great extent to any expansion of Revenue. I do not think any of the great sources of Revenue show any considerable excess over the Estimates which I submitted to the Committee last year. Except with one striking fortuitous exception, the Estimates have been generally exactly realised. I will not conceal from the Committee that there have been times—aye, there have been months—when I have felt very considerable anxiety as to the final result.

It is a very anxious period for a Chancellor of the Exchequer when he finds that any of the great sources of Revenue are hanging fire, even for a few weeks. During January and February, I admit, the prospects did not look bright. March was a better month; and I am now able to submit what I hope, as regards the past year, will be a not unsatisfactory result to the Committee. I will, according to custom, deal, in the first instance, with the Expenditure of the last year. The Budget Estimate of Expenditure for that year was £90,264,000, and the actual Expenditure was £89,928,000—a saving of £336,000, which is a contribution to the surplus I have mentioned. The Committee will remember that there were not unimportant Supplementary Estimates submitted to them. Assisted Education, with the concomitant grants made to Scotland and Ireland, was put down in the Budget at £920,000; but ultimately £1,006,000 had to be voted, showing an additional charge of £86,000. When we come to the Estimates for this year, it will be seen that the excess of this charge over the original estimate is considerable, for the Committee will remember that during the progress of the Education Bill the age was lowered in one direction from five to three, and raised in the other from 13 to 15. It is, therefore, not unnatural, from a fiscal point of view, that as the result of that operation my Budget Estimate was exceeded. Well, then, with regard to the Post Office, there was a very considerable Supplementary Estimate. A sum of £362,000 additional was asked for the Post Office, including a tremendous haul, if I may say so, of £175,000 for the site of the Liverpool Post Office alone. I shall have some consolation during the course of my speech to give to those who think that the Revenue derived from the Post Office is too large. There are Members who think that the profit is excessive; but the expense, on the other hand, is rapidly diminishing the margin which hitherto the State has received. Of that £362,000 additional for the Post Office, increased salaries and wages accounted for a great deal. For Irish distress, and for some works connected with the Crofter districts, the Budget Estimate was £125,000, but £237,000 was voted, which gave an excess of £112,000. There were also further miscellaneous Estimates which amounted to £100,000. The total was £660,000 for Supplementary Estimates, which raised the total estimated Expenditure to £90,924,000. But there were savings on the other side. In the Budget it was estimated that the War Office would require £500,000 for the re-construction of barracks, but it was only able during the financial year to spend £325,000, so that there was a saving of £175,000 on that head. The other savings, which hon. Members will be able to trace if they look at the Paper in their hands, scattered over all the various Services, amounted to £821,000, so that the total savings on the total grants were £996,000; and deducting from that the Supplementary Estimates, amounting to £660,000, the saving compared with the Budget Estimate is £336,000. Again, I wish to call the attention of the Committee, as I have done once before, to the remarkably small difference there is in the final Expenditure compared with the Budget Estimate over such a mighty sum as £90,000,000 sterling. If I put the last three years together, on a total Budget Estimate of Expenditure of £264,000,000, the total difference between the Estimate and the Expenditure is only £137,000. There is much that may be said against our fiscal system, and I am not wishing now to claim for the Government or for myself one tittle of credit; but I doubt whether, not only in any State, but in any great financial concern, any similar results could be produced in dealing with that vast number of millions estimated to be spent—results showing so great a control over expenditure and so small a difference at the end of three years. There is only one point more which I will mention in connection with the Expenditure of last year. The £400,000 taken for restoring the gold currency has been, in accordance with the Act of Parliament, invested in Consols. The Proclamation for withdrawing the light gold coin has been issued, and is now in full working order; and though as yet we have not had a long experience, it appears as if the forecast of the loss on the sovereigns is not likely, on the whole, to be exceeded. I will now pass to what will probably interest the Committee more than the Expenditure. I pass to the Revenue of last year. Here, I think, it will be admitted, when I come to the conclusion of the story I have to tell, that there have been some remarkably close Estimates. I shall point out one or two exceptions, but I do not think they will mar the credit which should attach to those who are primarily responsible for framing the Estimates. The Customs were estimated to produce £19,700,000. The out-turn to the Exchequer was £19,736,000, being £36,000 more than the Estimate. What are called the net receipts were larger—they were £19,838,000. There cannot be exact correspondence between the approximate net receipts and the amount actually paid to the Exchequer, for the net receipts are the actual sums collected all over the country, part of which may be in transitu and part in the collectors' hands. I may say, in passing, that it has been a neck-and-neck race all the time between estimate and fact. It appeared sometimes as if the fact would fall short of the Estimate; but after a prolonged race, which I am bound to say filled the breast of the Chancellor of the Exchequer at times with some anxiety, the fact won by £36,000 over the Estimate. My calculation was made generally on the basis of allowing for an increase of 1 per cent. in the population, and 1 per cent. for the three extra days—due to Leap Year and to the fact that the last financial year had the peculiarity of containing no Easter. Therefore, I allowed 2 per cent., and that has been generally borne out in the result, though not, of course, in every detail. Spirits have sometimes been that item of Revenue which has saved the calculations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I have something to say that may not be quite uninteresting to the Committee about spirits. But this year tobacco has been the feature, not alcohol. The Committee will wish that I should pass rapidly over some of the smaller items of Revenue.

The coffee group has produced £331,000, being £2,000 less than the Estimate. There is a further decline in coffee, while cocoa, as usual, has gained to a slight extent. Dried fruit has done well. It has produced £347,000, an excess of £7,000 over the Estimate, and £23,000 over the receipts of the previous year. But that has not been due to the item of currants. They have been rather disappointing, though there has been a very large crop, and the price has fallen so considerably that the consumer has had the full benefit of the reduction that was made in the duty two or three years ago. It is held that currants would have done better but for the strong competition which fresh fruit made last year. Fresh fruit was extremely abundant, and was worked up in various shapes which competed with those articles of children's luxuries in which currants play so large a part. The House will remember the charge that (to adopt a phrase which was made use of at the time) I frittered away £200,000 in reducing the duty on currants from 7s. to 2s. per cwt.; but that reduction has borne good fruit, not only as regards the price of the article, but also as regards our trade with Greece. Though the Revenue last year was not so satisfactory as was anticipated, the importation of currants has increased 25 per cent.—certainly a satisfactory result from the reduction of duty. Comparing 1891 with the average of the three preceding years, we have an increase of 273,000 cwt., or 25 per cent. I only dwell on this small detail, because it shows how a small reduction of duty does tell upon the consumption and stimulate the trade. There are also substantial increases in the imports from Greece of silver ore, olive oil, and some other products; and our exports to Greece show a material increase. I think that is satisfactory evidence of the benefit which has resulted from the reduction of duty. But I pass to other and more substantial sources of Revenue. Tea has been extremely satisfactory. The receipts from tea were £3,424,000, against an Estimate of £3,400,000, and against the previous year's receipts of £3,412,000. But I must inform the Committee that the result is more satisfactory than it appears, because the receipts of the previous year were swollen by a considerable amount of duty paid at the beginning of the year in respect of tea that had been held back in consequence of the expectation of a reduction in the duty. The amount held back was pretty nearly known, and the real increase for last year is £150,000, which is nearly $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Of that increase 2 per cent. would be due to the increase of population and to there being more days in the year; but the remaining $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is a bona fide increase in consumption. I do not mean to say that, apart from fiscal considerations, our satisfaction with regard to the increase on tobacco ought to be so great as our satisfaction as regards tea, but from the fiscal point of view the receipts from tobacco are extremely good. They amounted to £9,952,000 against the estimate of £9,730,000, and against the previous year's receipts of £9,534,000—thus producing £222,000 more than my Estimate, and £418,000 more than the year before. That is, I estimated for an increase of 2 per cent., and, like tea, it has increased nearly $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Hon. Members will remember that it was said that wages had fallen, that there was a certain depression of trade, and that there was gloom in many directions; but in these two items of tea and tobacco, each of which has increased $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. clear, after making all deductions, hon. Members will see some reason to hope that wages have not fallen, and that there is still a widely diffused prosperity among the working classes of the country. I do not know whether I may start a theory as to one cause of increase which may not be so satisfactory as an increase of wages. Are our young men taking earlier to smoking? Is there a development of that precocity which we can see in so many directions in the civilisation of the present day—is that development showing itself also in tobacco? I am afraid that many of us in our villages see little urchins becoming taxpayers as regards tobacco at far too early an age. If we remember that in 1890-91 the increase on tobacco was more than 5 per cent. over the year before, the continued rapidity of growth will appear the more remarkable. The present amount of duty, £9,952,000, is nearly £600,000 higher than the highest point the duty reached before it was lowered a few years ago; so that, after making allowance for the whole loss of £600,000 due to that reduction of the duty, it yields now £1,200,000 more than it did at that time. I now approach with the awe which the subject always inspires in the breast of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the taxes upon alcohol—alcohol, which is so important to the Revenue that about £30,000,000 out of the total £90,000,000 of Revenue is paid by that one article. Let me make this one preliminary observation—that there has not been in the past year that general rush in the country to alcohol which characterised past years. Wine no longer shows that toasting of prosperity to which I have alluded in a former year. It seems that wine is the one article which first begins to feel the effect of commercial depression—I presume because during the times of extensive speculation gentlemen fill their wine cellars in advance, but when the bad times come they hold their hand for some time before they replenish their stores. Brandy and rum have not followed, as they did before, an identical course. The consumption of brandy has increased; that of rum has fallen. Hon. Members may possibly recollect that some time ago all spirits were rising together, and here we see some of the effects of the changing times. Beer has been hanging fire, I do not know quite for what reason, but I compare it with the movement which is taking place in regard to home spirits. The interest of the race of which I have spoken in former years between the various forms of alcohol has ceased. Home spirits have won easily with an increased percentage of $6\frac{1}{2}$. Brandy is a good second with $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. increase, but beer has lagged behind, while rum, and wine, and miscellaneous foreign spirits have been entirely driven out of the race. With regard to wine, I estimated £1,332,000, and the receipts were £1,291,000—a decrease of £41,000 as compared with my Estimate, and of £27,000 as compared with the receipts of the previous year. In foreign spirits there is a decline, for a very obvious reason, and that is through the high price of potatoes which followed upon the famine in Russia. Thus the foreign spirits have been dearer, and have not been able to compete with home spirits. I find that rum has given £2,334,000, which is £36,000 less than my estimate, while brandy, with a receipt of £1,423,000, has given £53,000 more than I estimated. I can give no explanation why brandy has been increasing in consumption, while rum and wine have fallen, except that it is said that the vine-growers in the Charente are getting over the troubles caused by the phylloxera, and are producing a better article. I give that explanation for what it is worth; otherwise I cannot account for the difference. In Geneva and other foreign spirits there was a large falling-off from my estimate, due to the Russian famine as I have pointed out; it is a deficiency of about £84,000. I add some unimportant items in the Customs Revenue—namely, £65,000 for other articles; and I sum up as I began, with regard to Customs, with a total of £19,838,000 net receipts, of which £19,736,000 has been paid into the Exchequer. I now pass to Excise, where I am met at once by British spirits. Here there is a very large increase—an increase of £922,000 over the year before, and of £543,000 over my Estimate;—yet it was thought at the time that the Estimate was somewhat sanguine. British spirits realised £15,693,000. Taking Customs and Excise together, I estimated a total Imperial Revenue from spirits of £19,645,000, an exact increase of 2 per cent. over the year before, and practically it will be seen that the total is £20,121,000—an excess of £476,000, which makes an increase of about $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. over and above the 2 per cent., which is an increase due to the normal growth of the population and to the increased number of days in last year. I wish to mention one point more with regard to spirits, because I think it is not uninteresting, and it is that the increase in the consumption of home spirits has taken place to a very much larger extent in England than in Scotland or in Ireland. For the calendar year ended 31st December, 1891, the increase in England is 6·53 per cent.; in Scotland 1·62 per cent.; and in Ireland it is only 1·05 per cent. Of course we must make allowance for the fact that the increase in population is not the same in all three parts of the United Kingdom, but still those percentages show that the real increase in the consumption of spirits has been due to the English, and not to the Scotch or Irish consumers. I asked myself whether possibly that may account to a certain extent for the fact that beer has not advanced with home spirits or other forms of alcohol. I wondered whether, owing to climatic or other considerations, possibly more spirits might have been consumed in England in the place of beer. I estimated that beer would give £9,580,000, but it only gave £9,459,000—a decrease of £121,000. It is an increase over the previous year of about £70,000, but that is less than 1 per cent., whereas the increase ought to have been 2 per cent. That concludes what I have to say with regard to alcohol for the past year. The total Revenue was £30,871,000, an increase of £900,000, or 3 per cent., on the year before, and of £314,000, or 1 per cent., on my Budget Estimate; and this latter figure represents the real addition due to increased average consumption. Before passing to the other forms of taxation, I hope the Committee will not think I am detaining them if I give them in conclusion—with regard to these articles of great consumption—the following contrast between what is now consumed per head of the population, and what was consumed per head 50 years ago, because it throws a very considerable light upon the spending powers of the population. In 1841 each individual of the population consumed, on the average, 13 oz. of tobacco in the year; in 1891 they were able to consume close upon 26 oz. each, which is double. Coffee and tea are often contrasted as regards their consumption in Great Britain to the disadvantage of the former, and here is this very curious fact. We are said not to be a coffee-drinking people; but if we look back half a century we shall see we were almost as much a coffee-drinking people then as we were a tea-drinking people. In 1840 we each consumed 17½ oz. of coffee against 19½ oz. of tea, so that the consumption of coffee at that time was almost as great as the consumption of tea. To-day we only use 12 oz. of coffee for each person against 87 oz. of tea. But the interest is when you put the two articles together. What an increase of comfort do we find ! In 1840 we could only afford 37 oz. of tea and coffee for each person ; whilst at the present day each person uses close upon 100 oz. of the same articles. That means that the great bulk of the population are able now to enjoy these non-alcoholic beverages to the extent of three times what they were able to do 50 years ago. I venture to think that while we survey the state of the Exchequer we also see side lights thrown by these figures upon the prosperity of the people and the comfort of different classes. Again, taking raisins and currants, we could only afford 1½ lbs. weight for each person in the year 1841, while in 1891 each person used very nearly 5 lbs. As regards spirits, they bring in an Imperial Revenue of 19½ millions now, as against 7½ millions half a century ago. But here the increase must not be set down to the increased use of the articles by individuals, as was the case with the non-alcoholic beverages. We used about seven-and-a-half pints of spirits per head in 1841 ; we now use a mere trifle over eight pints, so that the great increase of Revenue is not in consequence of any appreciably greater use of spirits per head ; it is due to the increase of population and higher Excise duties. But while we see that as regards tea and coffee we use 100 oz. compared with 37 oz. used half a century ago, in the case of spirits there is no corresponding increase in the consumption. Surely the reflection is most encouraging to us. Leaving these great articles of consumption and noting that the railway and other small duties gave £560,000 as against £563,000 in the year before, I put the total Excise receipts at £25,610,000, as against my estimate of £25,300,000. I pass now to the subject of the Death Duties, and here, as is well known, I come to one of those sources of Revenue which show a very considerable increase over the estimate which I submitted for the receipts of last year. The Probate Office was never, I believe, more active than it, unfortunately, was during the months of February and March. The influenza epidemic has told most severely upon the population, and the consequence is a very considerable excess under the head of Probate and of Estate Duty—not so much upon Legacy and Succession Duty, because there the effect generally takes place some months or sometimes even a year later. But as regards Probate Duty the effect is almost instantaneous. Probate Duty, one-half of which goes to the Imperial Exchequer, amounted to £2,808,000, which is £358,000 above my estimate and £395,000 over the receipts of the previous year. Estate Duty amounted to £1,398,000, which was £204,000 over the receipts of the previous year, and £178,000 above my estimate. Legacy and Succession Duty yielded £4,033,000, being £153,000 above my estimate, and £198,000 above the receipts of the previous year. The total of the Death Duties, therefore, was £8,239,000, an increase of £689,000 over my estimates. This general increase was due to a fortuitous circumstance which must modify any estimate ; but, speaking generally, the estimates of the Death Duties have been remarkably regular. I pass now to the General Stamp Duties, which are interesting from the point of view of what I may call commercial activity ; and if the story which I have had to tell with regard to articles of consumption points to the activity and employment of the working classes, so the Stamp Duties seem to afford some clue of what is going on in the City and other departments of business. On stamps there has been a considerable decline. Their total yield of £5,501,000 fell nearly £400,000 short of my estimate. Perhaps the Committee would like to know what light this result throws upon the present state of business. I should like to give just a few of the details to show where the Stamp Revenue has fallen off, because there are very significant facts to be learned from it. The total falling-off as compared with the year before is £470,000. That fall is mainly due to the transactions, I think I may say, on the Stock Exchange and in Lombard Street. Deeds and instruments, which I presume pass through the hands of lawyers, show a decline; so that the lawyers, in that particular, share to a certain extent in the depression of trade. The fall in stamps on these instruments amounted to £264,000. In stamps on Bonds to bearer there is an extraordinary falling-off. In the last half of 1890 the yield was £163,000, while for the last half of 1891 it was only £85,000; but there was a recovery in the March quarter. Then again in the transfers of Foreign Securities to Bearer—fugitive stamps—there is an immense falling-off. They started at £27,000 in the first quarter of 1890, but fell to £11,000 in the fourth quarter of 1891. Company promoters had a very bad time. I do not know whether they were on strike or whether there has been a lock out, but the amount received in respect of new companies has been extraordinarily small as compared with former years. The amount received for the first quarter of 1890-91 was £89,000, whilst for the quarter ending March, 1892, it was only £33,000. On contract notes there is not the same decline; there is, in fact, a much smaller fall than I anticipated. There is nothing particularly alarming in those facts which I have related with regard to stamps so far. Perhaps the more important question is, Is there a great falling-off in bills of exchange, which represent international business and a great portion of the home trade? I am glad to say there is no such corresponding decline in that item, which represents so much of what I may call the normal business of the country. It has only fallen from £755,000 to £717,000. Let the Committee therefore note this, which is important if we are going to take an estimate of the future: that the decline has mainly been—though we have heard so much about the depression of trade—the decline has mainly been in what may be called City transactions. The usual business of the country has not fallen off to the same extent. The receipts from 1d. stamps on receipts, drafts, &c., have not fallen, but give a small increase of £10,000. In the course of the year the total of stamps has, I have already said, fallen to the extent of £470,000, as compared with the year before. The Stamp and Death Duties together give a total of £13,740,000 approximate net receipts, of which £13,700,000 have been paid into the Exchequer. This total of £13,740,000 is £326,000 more than last year, and £290,000 more than my estimate. Land Tax and House Duty together have yielded £2,482,000, or £2,000 more than my estimates. Now I come to the Income Tax for the year, that mighty tax which accounts for so large a proportion of our Revenue. I confess that I have had my anxieties with regard to the outcome of that tax, because during a considerable portion of the year I could not see how the increase I had assumed and calculated upon, as compared with last year's Estimates, was going to be realised. But as the time passed by and the end of the year came, I am glad to say that my fiscal hopes were realised to the extent that, while we had estimated for an increase of £500,000, having hoped to get £13,750,000, the ultimate result was receipts of £13,810,000 paid into the Exchequer and £13,843,000 approximate receipts—again a very remarkable piece of estimating. Here I would say that, in the preparation of these Estimates, Sir Algernon West has been my most responsible adviser. He has now placed his resignation in my hands, after a period of service extending over 40 years; and I should not be doing my duty to a very eminent public servant if, in my place in this House, I did not heartily express to him the acknowledgment which I feel, and which I am sure my predecessors feel, for the valuable services he has rendered to successive Governments of this country and to the State. The total of the Inland Revenue net receipts for the year is £55,777,000, showing an excess of £800,000 over the Estimate and £1,940,000 over the receipts of the year before. The amount actually paid over to the Exchequer was not quite so large—£55,604,000, or an increase of £624,000 over the Estimates. I have still to deal with the Non-Tax Revenue. The Post Office and Telegraphs yielded a gross revenue of £12,630,000, which is £30,000 more than the Estimate. Again, that is a remarkably close Estimate. Crown lands yielded £430,000; interest on advances £222,000; and miscellaneous revenue yielded £2,373,000. The total of non-tax payments into the Exchequer during 1891-2 was £15,655,000 as compared with my estimate of £15,750,000—a decrease of £95,000. I deduct this decrease from the excess of the Customs and Excise, which together is £660,000, and I find that £565,000 has been contributed by the Revenue as a whole to the surplus which I have in hand. The total Estimate of Revenue was £90,430,000, and my Estimate of Expenditure £90,264,000, which left a margin of £166,000. To that I add a saving on Expenditure of £336,000 and the amount by which the Revenue has exceeded the Estimate—namely, £565,000, and I arrive at the realised surplus of £1,067,000. I cannot complete my history of the past year without stating what Expenditure has been incurred under the head of borrowed money in connection with the Naval and Imperial Defence Acts. As the Committee is aware, we have borrowed nothing under the Barracks Act during the last year. In respect of the Imperial Defence Act, we have borrowed £440,000, and under the Naval Defence Act £1,300,000, making altogether £1,740,000, which is the limit of our borrowing during last year. As regards the total borrowed up to date during the last four years, since the Imperial Defence Act was passed we have borrowed in round figures for the Australasian Squadron £800,000; for ports and coaling stations we have borrowed £2,170,000, and under the Naval Defence Act we have borrowed £2,000,000—altogether £4,970,000, or, in round figures, £5,000,000. I do not wish in the present statement to be argumentative to any extent, but I do venture to point out to some of my more ardent critics, who said that millions and millions would be borrowed under these Acts—£20,000,000 was once suggested—that the transaction is one of far smaller dimensions than they could ever have imagined. If they had looked carefully into the matter they would have been differently advised; at all events, Sir, the sum of £4,970,000 is the total sum that we have borrowed up to the present. But I will not pass into an argumentative mood, when my intention is to be historical and explanatory. Now, Sir, as regards the Naval Defence Act, on ships built by contract we have spent up to date £6,800,000. We have raised from taxation three instalments of annuity amounting to £1,429,000 each, which together gave £4,300,000, and £500,000 we transferred from the ordinary Estimates for the Dockyard work, which gave £4,800,000. The remainder—namely, £2,000,000—is the total borrowed for contract-built ships. As regards dockyard-built ships we have borrowed nothing. We have spent seven millions on our Dockyard ships and armaments out of the programme of 11½ millions. Towards that not only have we not borrowed anything, but we have raised sufficient Revenue to enable us to transfer £500,000 temporarily from the Dockyards to the contract ships, so that the whole case stands thus—we have spent 14 millions on this Naval Defence Programme, and out of that sum twelve millions have been raised by Revenue, and only £2,000,000 have been borrowed. We shall have to borrow, perhaps, £1,000,000 in the coming year, and the amount borrowed under the Naval Defence Act will then stand at £3,000,000, the highest point, I believe, that will be reached. Well, now, right hon. Gentlemen opposite wish to know what figures I mean to present to the Committee as regards future borrowing. I have asked my right hon. Friends at the Admiralty and the War Office to give me as precise and definite figures as they could. The Admiralty placed certain figures in their Estimates in November last, but the labour troubles which so constantly interfere with the progress of ships that are being built under contract have again prevented the payment of the instalments which were expected to be paid, and now the prospect of utilising as much money as was originally anticipated has declined. Accordingly all we shall require in the coming financial year will be about £900,000 instead of £1,400,000, which at one time was expected. That is under the Naval Defence Act. Under that part of the Imperial Defence Act which deals with ports and coaling stations we expect to borrow and spend £320,000. Under the Barracks Act we expect to spend £650,000, and this sum we shall borrow, according to the precedent of the Military Forces Localisation Act. The total we may have to borrow will be something under £2,000,000 in the present financial year under all three Acts together. As regards the Naval Defence Act, I have stated to the House the highest point of loans will have been reached. I may now state to the House, as to the expenditure under the Imperial Defence Act upon ports and coaling stations, that the day is not so far distant when we shall have begun to pay off what has been borrowed by the dividends on the Suez Canal Shares. After the 1st July, 1894, that splendid asset of the nation will assume a tangible shape, and the Committee will be interested to know how that asset stands. It cost this country £4,000,000; it has brought in £200,000 or 5 per cent. up to date. The 176,000 shares which belong to the State will from the 1st July, 1894, carry interest and dividends, if the present rate be maintained, to the amount of £625,000; or, if we take the present value of the shares in the market, the value of the asset of these shares will be £19,000,000 sterling on the 1st July, 1894. I envy the Chancellor of the Exchequer on that day if I should not be here. I should envy the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who then will be able to enter this asset not as £4,000,000, where it modestly stands now, but as £19,000,000, and who will be able to say that he has reduced the national liabilities by no less a sum than £15,000,000 sterling. I should like to do it now. I should like to anticipate some right hon. Gentleman perhaps on the other side of the House, but I am too modest to make this entry at the present moment. I hope the right hon. Gentleman opposite will not think I am wrong in placing before the country the existence of this valuable asset, which, if it were realised, would far more than cover all the loans under the Imperial Defence Act, the Naval Defence Act, and the Barracks Act. This one asset would pay for the whole of these.

Mr. Goschen

I must ask the Committee now to follow me for a few moments into what is always considered the driest part of the Budget Statement—namely, as regards the Debt. Approaching the question of the Debt, I think the Committee would like to know exactly how we stand; and, in the first place, how we stand as regards winding up the Conversion operation, which has left, to a certain extent, a legacy of Floating Debt. I had first of all to meet an expenditure amounting to £3,052,000, due in part to our having to pay a fifth dividend, and in part due to the payment of a bonus of 5s. to the holders of a portion of the Consols, and to commission and Bank remuneration. That was a sum of £3,052,000. Then I had to pay off in cash £24,378,000 to holders of Consols who did not convert. Thus I had to find cash amounting to £27,430,000. I charged against Revenue £2,052,000; I took out of balances £1,837,000, and I borrowed £23,541,000. Of the sum borrowed £4,711,000 has been repaid, leaving £18,830,000 outstanding. Of that sum, however, the State owes to the public only £5,830,000. The National Debt Commissioners have assisted me to an extent of £13,000,000, and therefore £5,830,000 only remains owing to the public. But out of this sum £530,000 represents Consols, leaving £5,300,000 as the real increase of Floating Debt in the hands of the public due to Conversion operations. I will say a word or two presently upon that sum of £13,000,000 owing to the National Debt Commissioners, as I have a proposal to submit with regard to it; but now I must pass from the subject of conversion to the question of the general Debt. The reduction of capital liabilities under the heads, “Funded Debt,” “Terminable Annuities,” and “Unfunded Debt,” has been £6,463,000, the respective reductions being £1,527,000, £4,109,000, and £827,000. As regards other liabilities, the Imperial Defence Loan annuity has been reduced by £57,000, so that I should show a diminution of our gross national liabilities under these heads of £6,520,000. But owing to the Conversion operations there is an increase of nominal liability to the Savings Banks of £1,000,000. This increased liability I have to deduct from my diminution of liabilities, and the diminution therefore stands at £5,520,000. But there is a decrease of assets amounting to £73,000, and of balances amounting to £116,000—about £190,000 in all—so that the net reduction of capital liabilities, counting balances, is £5,330,000. Out of the taxation of the country we have devoted during the past year £7,400,000 to the reduction of Debt. I need say nothing more to the Committee on the reduction of the Terminable Annuities and the Funded Debt, but I should like to say one word more upon the subject of the amount of the Unfunded Debt. The total Unfunded Debt has decreased by £827,000, the figures being £35,313,000 as against £36,140,000 on the 31st March last year. Out of this sum of £35,313,000 there is due to the National Debt Commissioners £18,323,000, and the amount in the hands of the public is £16,990,000. Last year the total amount of Floating Debt in the hands of the public was £22,239,000. As on the 1st April this year the amount stood at £16,990,000, there has been a diminution of £5,249,000. I would call attention to the various forms in which the Floating Debt is in the hands of the public. On 31st March, 1887—that is, before the Conversion brought its attendant increase of the Floating Debt—the amount of Treasury Bills in the hands of the public stood at £8,681,000, and I have reduced it to £8,350,000, so that there are now fewer Treasury Bills in the market than before the Conversion operations took place. The reduction in respect of Exchequer Bills has been from £5,061,000 to £3,340,000. But, on the other hand, there are Exchequer Bonds—a new security—in the hands of the public to the amount of £5,300,000. The total increase of Floating Debt in the hands of the public, comparing the present time with the year 1887, is only £3,248,000, and this notwithstanding the payment in cash of £24,000,000 of the Funded Debt and all the borrowing under the Defence Acts. I will now state what we owe to the National Debt Commissioners. The total amount they hold on short securities is £18,323,000. They have provided me with £13,000,000 of this amount for the purpose of carrying out the Conversion scheme, and with regard to that sum I intend to follow the precedent set by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian when—I think it was in the year 1863 or 1864—he converted 24 millions of securities belonging to the Savings Banks into a permanent Book Debt. I propose to turn the floating securities now held by the National Debt Commissioners in connection with the Conversion operations into a Book Debt, or, as the right hon. Gentleman called it, “a passive charge,” carrying, of course, $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest. That will not only simplify the general transactions between the State and the National Debt Commissioners, but will render the accounts more intelligible. There is another fact concerning the Unfunded Debt to which I must allude. During the past year the average rate of interest at which we borrowed money on Treasury Bills was considerably less than we pay on Consols—namely, £2 9s. 6d. I have only one more announcement to make on the subject of the National Debt to the Committee. It is this: I have been able to come to an agreement with the authorities of the Bank of England with regard to the remuneration of that establishment and the interest on its Book Debt of £11,000,000, by which a saving of about £50,000 a year will accrue to the State. It is a considerable sum, and it will go, not in diminution of Estimates, but to increasing the new Sinking Fund. The Book Debt will bear $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest instead of 3 per cent., and other arrangements will be made reducing the remuneration for the management of the Debt, and securing other advantages to the Exchequer. I am confident that, when I submit my proposals to the House, it will be seen that I have carefully safeguarded the interests of the State, while fixing on equitable terms the remuneration of that great institution, the Bank of England, to which at all times in our financial history we have owed so much. I shall take the earliest opportunity to submit a Bill to the House to carry out this matter. One word more as regards the past year, and I shall then be free to approach the consideration of the figures of the present financial year. Those Members of the Committee who take an interest in the ratepayers' point of view and in the share which Local Authorities derive from Imperial finance would like to know how these Local Authorities have fared during the past year; and perhaps they will have thought, when they heard of the increase in the Probate Duty, that the result to the Local Authorities would not be unfavourable. The figures are as follows:—They will receive in the present financial year £2,808,000 from Probate Duty; £1,400,000 from beer and spirits; £3,390,000 from licences—a total of £7,598,000; and if you add the special contribution to Ireland of £40,000, you find a total relief of rather more than £7,600,000. I hope I have not been led away by the interest with which the history of the past financial year has inspired me personally to detain the Committee longer than I probably should have done upon matters which I venture to think are of considerable financial and national importance. I feel relieved at coming to the second and more important part of my task—namely, the forecast for the future of my Expenditure and my Revenue at a time which I think all will admit to be one of considerable importance, looking to the doubt which exists with regard to the continuance of our commercial and manufacturing prosperity. The Committee is acquainted through the Estimates which have been laid on the Table with the total requirements for the Supply Services, including the Scotch and Irish Equivalent Grants. The amount is £61,941,000. The Committee are further acquainted with the recurring items under the Consolidated Fund Service—£25,000,000 within the fixed charge; £200,000 outside the fixed charge. Then there is the Naval Defence Fund, £1,429,000, and the other Consolidated Fund Services, £1,683,000. That will bring the total of the Consolidated Fund Services to £28,312,000. Adding the total Supply Services, the total estimated Expenditure is £90,253,000. Curiously enough, though I shall show in a moment that it is only a coincidence, and that the amount is differently constituted, this sum is almost identical with the Budget provision of 1891-92, which was £90,264,000. But in order to place a fair Estimate before the Committee, I have to take into account the additional cash receipts which are now appropriated in aid of Votes, and which, of course, I ought to add to my Expenditure, in order to show a fair comparison with the Expenditure of last year. These cash receipts were £925,000, which, if treated as they were last year, and paid directly into the Exchequer, would have swollen the Expenditure. If I add that sum to the £90,253,000, it brings up the total Estimate to £91,178,000, an increase of £914,000 over last year. That will not be the Budget Estimate for this year, but that is a comparison which I think it right to make with the Expenditure of last year. I would say at this point that while we (so to speak) gain £925,000 on the Expenditure, we do not lose the whole of that amount on miscellaneous Revenue, because the system has been this—that the receipts of one quarter are not paid over till the next quarter, so that we lose only three-quarters of that amount of miscellaneous Revenue, the loss being a little under £700,000. Now I would analyse very briefly the increase of £914,000 in the Expenditure. Under the Civil Services there is an increase for Assisted Education of £1,477,000. Here I am met, of course, with this large increase over last year, when we only had to provide £900,000. This year we have to meet a full year, and not only a full year as originally estimated, but a full year with those additions to the charge which were introduced into the Bill in the course of its passage through Committee. Knowing the uncertainty of Revenue, I took care last year not so to dispose of the surplus as to have to find the whole of that increased charge this year by means of increased Revenue; and I have to the good £500,000 provided for barracks last year; and £400,000 for gold coinage, which gives £900,000 charged last year upon Revenue, but which will now be dropped. I am relieved by these items, so that I have only £577,000 as the increase I really have to find as regards assisted education. But the ordinary Estimates for Education continue to rise, and they account for another £233,000. There are other services for which increased provision has to be made—Miscellaneous Consolidated Fund Services, £18,000; Army and Navy, £111,000; Miscellaneous Services, Customs and Inland Revenue, £86,000, all not very heavy increases in one year. Lastly, but certainly not least, there is a tremendous increase in the Postal Services of £611,000. That is balanced to a certain extent, of course, by increased Revenue; but the increased Revenue does not make up for that enormous increase. These items together amount to a total of £1,636,000. On the other hand, I have some advantages. We have paid for Irish railways so far out of Revenue. We took £600,000, which we were going to pay in cash out of Revenue. Of that £600,000 we have spent £510,000, and the remaining £90,000 we shall spend this year. But last year we spent a great deal more than £90,000 out of cash, and so this year I have less to provide for Irish railways by £355,000. For the remainder we shall borrow money on Terminable Annuities, as provided for by the Act of last Session. This is a modification of the principle introduced by the Act of 1883, from which we inherit a portion of the sums we apply to Irish railways. I have £130,000 less to provide for Census expenses; and, owing to the administrative vigour of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Agriculture as regards pleuro-pneumonia, it has been possible to take this year £70,000 less for that Estimate. There is less for Scotch and Irish relief by £85,000, and on sundries £82,000, so that I am relieved of £722,000 to set against the £1,636,000, giving a net increase of £914,000. I trust that the Committee will see that in these increases there is nothing wasteful. The increase is not in the Army and Navy Estimates, nor the Civil Service Estimates generally, and not in the civil government of the country. Where is it? It is in two directions, both of which will commend themselves to the House. It is in the direction of education and of the Postal Services of the country. Education and the Postal Services account for an increase of £2,000,000 in the Expenditure of this year. As for free education (in which I include, for the sake of brevity, the Scotch and Irish Equivalent Grants), my last year's estimate of the additional cost was £1,100,000; but the additions made to the Bill in its passage through the House have raised the amount to £1,420,000. And it is not only free education, but education all round which, to the satisfaction of the country, but of course somewhat to the despair of the Exchequer, continues to swell our Estimates; for, as I mentioned, there is a further increase of almost £250,000 on the ordinary Estimates for education. The Post Office increase is £611,000, of which £490,000 is due to the increase of salaries and wages, including increase of establishments. That is how our Estimates are swollen; and, while the Government have been anxious to meet the fair and equitable claims of those who are employed in those services, we have endeavoured to deal with the subject at the same time in a spirit of proper economy. As regards the telegraph service, one observation I would commend to some of the postal reformers. The average profit on every £1 of telegraph receipts during the last five years has been 3d. The expenses have been 19s. 9d., and the profit 3d. But during the five years from 1880-81 to 1884-85 the expenses swallowed only 18s. 6d., and the profits were 1s. 6d. There is already a deficit of some £90,000 on the net telegraph revenue for last year, and of some £60,000 expected for this year. In fact, we have now come down to this: that the increase of telegraphic communication and the further facilities as to addresses, so eagerly pressed by postal reformers, must all be given at the expense of the general taxpayer. The increase of postal revenue, which may be called £350,000, is far more than balanced by the increase of the expenses, and the margin of revenue for the Exchequer is rapidly being diminished. One figure more about the Estimates of Expenditure, and that is that the total amount now spent on elementary education amounts to £8,000,000. That is a large item which no one will grudge; but when we talk about our expanding Expenditure, it must be remembered that it is not an expenditure due to extravagance, but to the appreciation by Parliament and the country of the expanding wants of the children of the country. I come now to the Revenue with which we propose to meet the Expenditure. And, first, this year will be a peculiar year. Last year we had no Easter, and we had Leap Year. This year, of course, we lose Leap Year, and we have an Easter; and we have half of another Easter, because Good Friday in this financial year will fall on the 31st March, a most inconvenient and despairing day for Revenue purposes. Let me put this point to the Committee. We may calculate on an increase of one per cent. due to the normal increase in the population, and we ought to take off one per cent. for the loss of those days, which I count as equivalent to three days for Revenue purposes. It has been estimated by careful observers that we ought to take off £900,000 from the Revenue for the loss of those three days, but I think they have made two mistakes. They have taken that loss on the whole of the Revenue, whereas it is not the whole, but, roughly speaking, only two-thirds of the Revenue which is affected by the longer or shorter number of days in the year, and they do not allow for the normal increase of population. These two items will balance themselves. We must count upon the normal progress of the population as one per cent., and allow one per cent. for the loss of the three days. I start with the view that we must compare with last year without any addition for increase of population, and without any deduction for the loss of the number of days—the two factors mutually correspond. I think the Committee will agree that, looking to the general situation, the framing of the Estimates for the present year is a matter surrounded with considerable difficulties. The Bankers' Clearing House Returns for 1891 have been very unsatisfactory—they are not only less than 1890, but they are less than 1888—a significant symptom. The exports, again, have fallen. Many hon. Members in this House will know to what extent trade profits have fallen. I believe there are many painful experiences on that subject. On the other hand, Railway Returns are not unsatisfactory. There was an increase in the Railway Returns as regards passengers, parcels, goods, live stock—in fact upon every head. Their expenditure, however, was higher, and consequently their net profits were not greater; but in their gross receipts under every head there was progress. I have shown that the consumption by the people of duty-paying articles during the past year has been at an increased rate, but that is not enough for the Committee to know. The Committee will want to know whether that increase took place during the commencement or the second part of the year. Has it been declining during the year or not? I am happy to say the second part has not fallen off as compared with the first part. I am told that in the manufacturing districts the banking transactions have not been unsatisfactory; and, looking at the situation as carefully as I can, I see ground for caution, but I see no ground for alarm. I have examined some most interesting diagrams to see in what order the articles of consumption began to fall off in a former period of declining prosperity, and I find this—wine and spirits are the first to fall, tobacco holds out longer than spirits, and tea has never materially gone back. The working man it seems, if his wages should diminish, first reduces the amount of his beer and spirits, he clings longer to his tobacco, and as regards the tea for himself and his family, he does not reduce it at all. That is an interesting social fact which I believe to be absolutely proved by the statistics which I have carefully considered. We had a great time of prosperity in 1874 and again in 1890. We must study the events which followed 1874 to see on what articles we must expect a fall in consumption if we are really entering upon the descending curve after 1890. In 1875, I think it was, the Clearing House Returns began to fall as in 1891. Probably the highest point of prosperity we have ever reached was in 1874, and not long after there was a rapid decline. No great article of consumption showed an immediate decline, but rum topped first with extraordinary rapidity in 1876; wine and brandy followed in 1877, and descended a precipitous curve, full three years after the Clearing House Returns had begun to fall, and after the commercial and manufacturing world had entered upon a period of gloom. But the non-alcoholic beverages, such as tea, steadily progressed with hardly a check. Tobacco, too, continued to rise, up to and during 1877, and though it descended during 1878 and 1879, this may be chiefly attributed to the increase of duty made in the former year. Not only this, but there is an enormous difference in the amount of the fall. Tobacco only fell six per cent. altogether, while wine and rum fell 36 per cent., and brandy 51 per cent. The Committee will see the bearing of this upon the Estimates of the present year. Taking the Customs Revenue first, I put the coffee group at £330,000, or £1,000 less than last year, and dried fruits at £350,000, or £3,000 more than last year. Wine I put at £1,270,000, or £21,000 less than last year. When I come to foreign spirits—rum, brandy, and Geneva alike—I estimate for a decline, and I put the total at £4,350,000, or £78,000 less than last year. As regards tea, the article which I have shown does not decline, even if wages fall off, I put the total at £3,470,000, an increase of £46,000, or one-and-a-half per cent. I will not allow, because I wish to be cautious, for progress at the same rate as last year, but I believe that tea will follow the same upward course as heretofore. As regards tobacco, I have shown that it is not one of the sensitive articles—it is not an article which begins early to fall. Except tea, it is the least sensitive of all the articles on the list. Looking to the fact that for the last 30 years there has never been a fall in tobacco except in 1878 (when the duty was raised), and then only to a small extent, and looking to the percentage of increase, which after making every allowance for increase of population and extra days was two-and-a-half per cent. during the last financial year and five per cent. in the year before, I believe we are justified in assuming a further increase not at the same rate, but still some increase, and I put tobacco at £10,065,000, or £113,000 over the receipts of the past year. That is only one per cent. instead of the more rapid increase which has hitherto taken place. Other articles I put at £65,000, the same as last year. The total Estimate for Customs receipts is therefore £19,900,000, or £164,000 more than the Exchequer receipts of last year, and £62,000 more than the approximate net receipts. I pass to the Excise. Disappointed in beer during the past year, I feel bound to allow for some decrease in that item, which I set at £9,400,000—£59,000 less than last year's receipts. On British spirits I have more to say. I approach them with considerable caution. I put them at £15,500,000, or £193,000 less than last year's receipts, but in reality I allow for a much larger fall in their consumption, owing to a small administrative change on which I will detain the Committee for a few minutes. I have endeavoured to put a stop—and have put a stop in fact—to a system called "grogging," by which the Revenue is supposed to have lost some £200,000 a year. We have stopped the practice, and so we gain to that extent. The practice consisted in extracting spirit which had been absorbed by casks after those casks had left the bonded warehouse. It is a very interesting process. By filling those casks with water and letting the water stand for a certain time, the spirit left in the cask was drawn out by the water with which it became fused, and so an alcoholic liquid was produced on which no duty had been paid, and which was used for mixing with other spirits. In this manner it is calculated that a puncheon which had held 100 gallons of spirit yielded, through the process of "grogging," one and a-half, and sometimes as much as three, gallons of proof spirit. The Committee, therefore, will see that, as a member of the trade put it to me, this was a system of legalised smuggling. Over and over again these imbibing casks might pass out of the warehouse, carrying away gallons of spirits on which no duty had been paid, absorbed in their wooden sides and to be extracted afterwards by "grogging." They went in and out just as ladies used to pass in and out of the country with lace hidden under their petticoats. I say nothing with regard to the practice, because it was not illegal, but it did put some traders who did not practise "grogging" on an unfair footing as compared with those who resorted to this method. We have now taken steps to prevent those casks from leaving the warehouse except under proper supervision, and we have taken the trade into council on the subject. There have been some complaints, but I believe there will not be much friction, as everybody will now be on an entirely fair footing, one as regards the other, and the Revenue will gain the pleasant sum of £200,000 a year. I may calculate, then, on an increase of £200,000 a year from this source, but as I am anxious with regard to the fiscal future of spirits, I have put the decrease at £193,000 as compared with last year's receipts; and, therefore, with the explanations I have made, it will be seen that the actual diminution in my Estimate as compared with last year is £393,000—£200,000 for "grogging," besides the £193,000. There are some small items which I pass over—chicory and coffee, labels, licences, and Railway Duty. These I put at £552,000, £8,000 less than last year. The total Excise I put at £25,452,000, or less by £260,000 than last year. I now pass to the Death Duties. I shall not, of course, allow in this coming year for the same amount of Death Duty as in last year, as that owing to the influenza. I take £208,000 from the Probate Duty, putting it at £2,600,000, and £98,000 from the Estate Duty, putting it at £1,300,000; but, on the other hand, there is some compensation in Legacy and Succession Duty, which have not yet felt the full effect of the wills that have recently been proved, and for those increases I put £140,000 to Legacy Duty, making it £3,000,000, and £87,000 to the Succession Duty, making it £1,260,000. Upon the Death Duties as a whole I expect to lose £79,000. I again allow for a decline on general stamps, and reduce last year's Revenue by £101,000, putting them at £5,400,000. I am bound to say I consider that an extremely prudent Estimate, for during the last few weeks there has been distinctly a revival in some of the important sources of stamps. On the other hand, there is a possibility that in the general transactions there may be a decline, and that bills of exchange and other documents which are stamped, which have hitherto not yet felt the full fall, may continue to show some falling-off. I shall be prudent in this, as in my other Estimates. The total for stamps, including the Death Duties, I put at £13,560,000, a decrease of £180,000. House Tax and Land Tax I put at £2,450,000, a decrease of £32,000 as compared with last year. There remains under the head of Inland Revenue one great item on which I have still to speak—perhaps it is the most important of all. I have to tell the Committee how I propose to deal with the Income Tax, because it is upon the Income Tax that some persons may think great uncertainty might arise. If I were to judge simply by the statistical Returns, by the gossip of the City, by complaints, in Lancashire, or by the position of Yorkshire; and if I were to listen to, and the Committee were to be influenced by, the general feeling, they might come to the conclusion that there would be a very large gap in the Income Tax Returns of the year. I do not say there ought not to be such a gap, but we must look a little to the details as regards Income Tax, and what we have to ask ourselves is this—what are the proportions in which different classes contribute to the Income Tax, and what are the constituent factors of that tax? And again we have to inquire not only what might be the profits of 1891 assessed to Income Tax under Schedule D, but how the average of the profits will have to be calculated, because that is most important. Let me deal with the first of these two questions. The Committee must not forget that while, on the one hand, we are naturally influenced by the more striking industries of the country, while we see the great cotton industry, or the great coal industry, or generally the great manufacturing or productive industries of the country, yet apart from these there is a mighty trade going on; there is wealth being rolled up like a veritable river of Pactolus—wealth of which no published statistics exist, but which is, nevertheless, accumulating and adding to the wealth of the country. There is the great retail trade which permeates every village of the country—the great home trade which does not always strike our attention so much as the more important and visible trades—we have to bear that in mind. Our imaginations are so stirred by the sight of some industries which stand before us in all the activity of their enormous proportions, that we forget a great many of the constituent parts of our business community. I am not going to be so indiscreet as to place before the Committee figures as to the aggregate profits of the various trades and professions; but I have examined some of their relative proportions, and they are most interesting. These I think I may put before the Committee without indiscretion. I find this—it is astonishing how many quiet callings keep up the average, and how large a proportion is contributed under Schedule D by persons and professions who do not figure as bloated monopolists or rich men in the ordinary acceptance of the word, but who, nevertheless, have earnings which are very material to the general prosperity of the State. Take the cotton manufacture and productive industry, including spinning and weaving; the total profit of those engaged in that vast industry—I am not speaking of wages, but of profits—the total profit of the cotton lords and the cotton companies is less than the aggregate profit made by the medical profession. If I look at the profits of the coal mines—notwithstanding the enormous fortunes made therein—the Committee may be surprised to learn that the total profit from coal mines is less than the profits of the legal profession. The lawyer in his quiet office and the physician in his sombre consulting room are rolling up taxable material almost at the same pace—at a faster pace—than those engaged in the great industries I have named; and it appears to me that it is the ubiquity and steadiness of these professions which compensate for the lower scale on which their profits may be earned. Again, it is easy to leave out of account the immense profits of the distributors of the manufacturing and productive industries. If I take the total of these latter industries, including cotton, wool, silk, ready-made clothing, metals, and hardware of all kinds, shipbuilding, sugar refining, tanning, chemicals, brewing, distilling, and so forth; if I take the whole of these industries, which together cover so vast an area of our national prosperity, the profits only amount to one-half of the profits which fall under the head of distribution and transport. That is to say, that those who distribute and transport merchandise and the products of industry make, on the whole, twice as much profit as the manufacturers and producers of the articles. Of course, I must remind the Committee and the public that I am not alluding to the cost of manufacture or to wages, but dealing exclusively with profits assessed under Schedule D. I thought it my duty to go into these details and see what constituted the vast wealth of this country, and find out, in view of possible adverse times, who it is that keep up that steady flow of profit on which so largely the material prosperity of this country depends. One more illustration of this and I have done. The profits, if they may be called so, or rather the salaries, of employees of every kind, which are assessed under Schedule E and part of Schedule D, form an immense total, far beyond what the public would imagine, and a period of depression may easily pass without diminishing to any extent the productiveness of those heads. There are 350,000 employees assessed to Income Tax under these two Schedules; their aggregate salaries amount to £50,000,000 sterling. Reductions of establishment no doubt occur in bad times, but I doubt whether they more than counterbalance that constant tendency to increase salaries which is the general rule. I believe on no occasion has it been found that there was any backward movement under Schedule E. Now, Mr. Courtney, I pass to the other point I have mentioned—namely, the industries themselves under Schedule D. We have not only to look to 1891, but we have to see what year it replaces in the three or five years' average on which the profits are estimated. In commerce and manufactures the average is three years, and in the case of mines five years. Well, then, 1891 was a most unsatisfactory year in the City as compared with its predecessor. But it takes the place not of 1890 but of 1888 in commercial and industrial profits, and of 1886 in mining profits. The Committee will see that we must not be guided entirely by the impressions derived from 1891. As regards mining profits, 1891 does not show such phenomenal profits as 1890, but its profits are far beyond those of 1886. Thus, though 1891 shows a large decline as compared with 1890, the profits assessable to Income Tax for the coming year will be greater, because, though 1891 comes in, it replaces a year which was worse than itself. As regards iron and steel, those industries were far less profitable than in 1890, but far more profitable than in 1888; and so on these industries, too, there is an increase. The case is otherwise in the great Lancashire industry. Here 1891, speaking broadly, is much worse than 1888, and the average has to be put down. For wool, jute, silk, and other industries, 1891 was a distinctly worse year than 1888, and there is, therefore, a worse average to go on. But I must not survey any more of these great industries. I have gone through most of them in order to be able to form a reasonable estimate for the assessment of the Income Tax for the coming year; and, on a general review of the whole case, I am advised that the actual average of the three preceding years, upon which profits under Schedule D will be mainly assessed, will not fall very much below that on which the Income Tax was based last year. Some decline there may be; in some cases there is increase, and in some decrease; but, on the whole, I am informed—and this is confirmed by my own examination—that there is scarcely any serious decrease in the assessment of profits. Looking at all these considerations, I ask myself if I should be justified in putting down the Income Tax for the present financial year as likely to give the same amount as in the last financial year. I am distinctly of opinion that it would not be safe for me to assume the same amount. I have given many reasons on the one side and some on the other. I do not know that I should make much allowance for the following reason, but I am told it is one which should inspire caution. There is a tendency which is said to be implanted in human nature that when profits are bad, and are lower than the average profits of the three preceding years, there is not in the breast of the taxpayer such absolute impartiality in settling accounts between the Exchequer and himself as there may be under more normal circumstances; that a man's inclination on these occasions is to settle doubts in his own favour; that men are more ready to be generous in their estimate of what they ought to pay when they are making higher profits than the average. Then there is another consideration which inspires caution, and that is the point I have already mentioned—namely, that Good Friday is the last day of the financial year. I hope and believe that most taxpayers will wish to clear their minds and consciences by paying the last demands of the Income Tax collector before they go for their Easter holiday. But the last days of the year are very important, and it is possible, on account of the last day being Good Friday, we shall have to carry over more arrears into the next financial year. Looking into the whole case, I feel compelled largely to diminish my estimate of the Income Tax, and I put it at £13,400,000, or £443,000 less than the approximate receipts of last year. The total Inland Revenue I put down at £54,862,000, a decrease of £915,000 as compared with the approximate net receipts of last year, and of £742,000 as compared with the Exchequer receipts of last year. With regard to Non-Tax Revenue, I put the Post Office at £10,400,000, or £250,000 more than last year; telegraphs, £2,560,000, or £80,000 more than last year; Crown lands, £435,000; interest on advances, £220,000; miscellaneous receipts, £2,100,000. The last item I have to reduce by £700,000, owing to a transfer of receipts which I mentioned before; but, on the other hand, there have to be added several windfalls which accrue this year. The total Non-Tax Revenue is £15,715,000, to which I add the proceeds of taxes, £74,762,000, and I arrive at a total Revenue of £90,477,000. I deduct my Expenditure of £90,253,000, and I arrive at a margin of £224,000, a sufficient margin to make me think I am fortunate in not having to impose taxation, but unfortunate in that it will not place me in a position of being able to make any remission. The Committee will kindly bear in mind that last year and this year the sum—including the Scotch and Irish Grants—of £2,500,000 has been given for assisted education. This outlay has, of course, rendered it difficult to make any prominent reduction of taxation to any other class of the community; but, so far as the recipients of that boon are concerned, it is almost equal to, and is, in fact, a more palpable advantage than, any reduction of indirect taxes. With a margin of only £224,000 at my disposal, it would be unwise, especially looking at the circumstances of the time, to attempt any re-construction of our finances. There are two minor changes, however, which I shall propose to the Committee. The Committee will remember that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade informed the House of his wish to see the heavy fees charged for the renewal of patents reduced in the interests of the poorer patentees, and with the view of giving the fullest scope to the development of inventions, and small as my margin is, this is a reform which the Government do not wish to delay, and which they think they can afford. The primary fee of £4 for the first four years will remain, and from the end of the fourth year onwards large reductions will take place. At present the fees for the next four years are £10 a year; they will be reduced to £5, £6, £7, and £8 in the several years. In the ninth and tenth years the fee is £15, and it will be reduced to £9 and £10. In the next four years, the last before the patent expires, the fee is £20 a year; it will be reduced to £11, £12, £13, and £14. These reductions will, I believe, give extreme satisfaction to a very large class. They will ultimately involve a loss of £50,000 a year, but we should not ask that the new scale should come into operation before the 25th September, and on that period the loss would be £24,000 or £25,000, which will reduce my margin to £200,000. The other minor change I propose will not affect the Revenue—it is in connection with the tax on sparkling wines. Hon. Members may be aware that great pressure has been put on me to change the system on which that duty is levied. At present it is 2s. 6d. per gallon on wines above the value of 30s., and 1s. per gallon for wines below that value. I understand that even the importers of cheap wines themselves would prefer to pay a higher duty rather than go through what they declare to be an impediment to business—the discussions with the Customs as to the value of their wines. I have thought the friction has been exaggerated, and that, as a matter of fact, it would only arise in the case of that small portion of wines imported at the border line; and I may point out that the experiment of two rates of duty varying with value has not failed in respect of the continuance of the proportion of wine of higher quality to the lower quality. The champagnes above the value of 30s., which constituted two-thirds before the tax was imposed, still constitute substantially the same proportion; there has been no fraud, and the Customs have been extremely watchful. I prefer, I admit, the duty as assessed at the present moment; but if there is, as I am informed, considerable unanimity on the part of the trade in favour of a uniform scale I do not wish to be obstinate, and I shall be prepared to submit a Resolution that the duty be 2s. 1d. round instead of 2s. 6d. and 1s. as at present. This will give a small addition to the Revenue. I do not do it with that object, but I am not prepared under present circumstances to have any loss whatever fall on the Exchequer by any change in the Wine Duties. Before I part with the Wine Duties let me note one point—it is not entirely of a fiscal nature and does not affect the present Budget immediately. The right hon. Gentleman opposite will remember the Spanish Treaty we made in 1886. The duty was then reduced in favour of the Spaniards, with a result which, I believe, has been beneficial to both nations. Spain improved its tariff in favour of this country and we improved our alcoholic scale in favour of Spain. Now, the Spaniards have denounced the Treaty which we obtained by the concessions we made in 1886. All I wish to say on the point is this—that there must not be the impression, either in Spain or elsewhere, that if the concessions which were given to this country in 1886 should be withdrawn, it will be certain that they will retain the fiscal advantages that were given with regard to their wines in 1886. There are strong fiscal reasons why we should put the higher duty on wine of alcoholic strength between 26 and 30 degrees. I do not propose this in the Budget, because I do not wish to force the hand, so to speak, prematurely of our Spanish friends, or put the wine trade into the excitement there would be if we were to impose a scale now which would not come into force for some months, because we could not change our duty before the end of June. But I think it is right, in the most friendly spirit, to say that if the concessions given for a certain quid pro quo are withdrawn, this country will have an open hand with regard to withdrawing the advantages given before. I sincerely trust that these negotiations may come to a satisfactory termination as regards both countries. Now, Mr. Courtney, I have finished my annual discourse. I hope that there may have been some interest in what I have had to tell; because, as I have said, there are many side lights thrown by these fiscal results on the habits and consuming powers of the people. I have had no startling facts to tell; I have had no surprises to reveal. Prudence seems to me to demand moderate Estimates, and I hope the Committee will think I have framed these Estimates with such prudence as was justified by the fiscal situation. I trust that when next year I stand at this Table—(Ministerial cheers, and counter Opposition cheers and laughter)—I do not say on which side—(laughter)—for, on whichever side of the Table I stand, I shall be responsible for the prudence of the Estimates—I hope when I stand at the Table next year these Estimates may prove to have been justified by the facts. The mighty river of our national prosperity, though it may not have been overflowing its banks, though it may have been running on at a more sluggish pace, still remains broad and full; and I trust that all the various watersheds of our national well-being may still continue to pour out their thousand streams with undiminished volume into a grand and mighty flood.

TEA.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, towards raising the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the Duties of Customs now chargeable on Tea shall continue to be levied and charged on and after the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-two, until the first day of August, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three, on the importation thereof into Great Britain or Ireland (that is to say) on—

Tea . . . the pound . . . Four Pence.”—
(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): The Chancellor of the Exchequer has not yet acquainted us on what day he will ask the House to go into Committee for the purpose of considering the nature of the proposals he has made. I, of course, cannot undertake to control the discretion of individual Members, but the ancient practice of this House has been to refrain from detailed discussion of the finances of the country on the evening the Budget was proposed; and to that custom it is my intention to adhere on the present occasion. But I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give us a proper and convenient opportunity shortly after the Recess of making such observations as his very interesting and comprehensive statement would appear to call for. If that old custom was justified in the circumstances of the country 20 or even 10 years ago, most certainly the reasons in its favour are fortified by the changes that have since taken place in our arrangements with regard to many portions of our system of finance. The right hon. Gentleman, who has had a serious task before him this evening, must be sensible that a greater degree of complication has been introduced into that system in consequence of much that has taken place in recent legislation; and the bearing of these changes on one another has to be carefully considered by the House, independently of the fact that it is far more difficult now than it would have been in previous times for Members to draw their knowledge of the subject entirely from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman has entered into a very interesting statement with respect to the basis on which he has framed his Estimates of the coming Revenue from various branches of taxation in Customs and Excise, and from the various schedules of the Income Tax. I do not think that I have ever known that particular department of the statement of the Finance Minister so much expanded as it has been on this occasion by the right hon. Gentleman. Undoubtedly it was not too much expanded for the interest of the House, which was entirely sustained, and would have been sustained probably even if the right hon. Gentleman had entered into still further details. And when I speak of the complicated statement, I do not in the slightest degree intend to convey that that complication was due to any want of care or accuracy or lucidity on the part of the right hon. Gentleman himself. But the facts and materials of the statement have been greatly enlarged, and the opportunity of considering them is one that ought to be carefully made use of. I am not quite certain whether I entirely understood what was said by the right hon. Gentleman at the close of his speech with regard to the Wine Duties. I understood him to say that a change was to take place at once with regard to sparkling wines which was to have no effect on the Revenue, but if it did have an effect it would rather be in its favour. The effect of this change would justify particular notice. After describing the change he meditates in the duty on sparkling wines the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to refer more generally and vaguely to some other changes in the Wine Duties, and to the possibility of a connection between the change in the Wine Duty and the communications that have taken place, or that may take place, with Spain, as to certain proceedings adopted by Spain in regard to its commercial relations with this country. It would not be right for me to touch on this subject, and even if I did attempt to touch upon it I should be likely to do more harm than good. I shall wait until there is a fuller exposition of the views of the right hon. Gentleman, which we may probably have on a future occasion; and all I will do now is to express the hope that in making any of these changes in the Wine Duty he will not confine his consideration to the effects of what may take place in Spain, but will also take into view any consequences that may be produced in other countries with which our commercial relations are in some cases still more extended. In the present state of opinion and sentiment on the Continent of Europe, with regard to questions of protection and freedom of trade, it is evident that the greatest caution ought to be observed in any measures of the British Government which may possibly cause any alarm amongst those interests abroad to whose improved and more enlightened opinions we have chiefly to trust—I do not say for preventing the introduction of changes in foreign countries in the wrong direction, but, at all events, for confining those changes within narrow limits, and for promoting, on the whole, an enlightened policy. The right hon. Gentleman said one word in the course of his speech which I am very desirous to echo. It was prudent as well as generous on the part of the right hon. Gentleman to refer to the services of the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, who has just retired. For 20 years I have enjoyed the intimate friendship of that distinguished gentleman. For the larger part of these 20 years I have been in close personal or official relations with him. I have had ample opportunity of estimating the justice of the right hon. Gentleman's appreciation of his services, and I can thoroughly concur in the expression which he has used. I am only sorry that those services are brought to their public or official termination. I hope that the vigour which my hon.

Friend the late Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue has applied to the discharge of his official duties at Somerset House may remain available for the service of the country in some useful and valuable capacity. It is the great happiness of this country—a happiness in which I will not say it exceeds all other countries, but certainly a happiness in which it is very remarkable—that we have so many public servants possessed of great ability and unsparing diligence, and even an enthusiasm for the public welfare. I do not believe there has been any occasion on which it was more warrantable and becoming to record the fact that we have enjoyed in the person of the late Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue the services of a public officer who was alike able, upright, and indefatigable in promoting every interest connected with this gigantic Department.

(7.15.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): The right hon. Gentleman says the money devoted to elementary education now amounts to £8,000,000. That is a sum in which we ought to take pride. At the same time I think we ought to take warning from the growth even of the most beneficent expenditure. It is an expenditure for the advance of civilisation, but if it grows at the present rate we shall have to reduce the expenditure on war, or the country cannot bear the cost.

*(7.17.) MR. BARTLEY: Considering that one-third of our taxation is now derived from alcoholic liquors—the great staple drink of the people—the incidence of taxation on the working classes is calculated to be in excess of what it ought to be. I hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will arrange that there shall be some definite systematic investigation, so as to put the whole subject of taxation upon a fairer basis. Another question to which I desire to call attention is the subject of the Income Tax. The Chancellor of the Exchequer made the very remarkable statement that £50,000,000 income was distributed over 350,000 persons. This fact he said showed the enormous growth of this branch of our income. This £50,000,000, distributed over these 350,000 persons, represented incomes averaging only £130 each.

The enormous development of the Income Tax was a result of the increase in the number of those at the bottom of the scale coming into the Income Tax category, and that fact required very careful consideration with regard to the fiscal burdens of the people.

MR. GOSCHEN: They do not pay on £130.

*MR. BARTLEY: I know there is a deduction of £120, but still the fact remains that the enormous proportion of the Income Tax payers are those who pay on incomes below £200 under Schedule D. There is no doubt that more than half the payers in that Schedule pay on incomes of an average of £3 a week. Of course they get a small rebate, but the burden of the tax upon the trading community is very great. I am glad that a larger number of persons are coming into the Income Tax class, but it shows that the time has come when we should make a difference between the rate of payment on the incomes of those who earn it by their labour, as compared with those whose incomes are on accumulations. There ought to be two different Schedules. I go so far as to believe in the French system, under which industrial incomes are not taxed. I believe that would be a wise step in this country. It would add to the amount of taxation upon the richer class, and put it upon the spontaneous income from past savings. I hope some complete change will be made in our system of levying Income Tax, enlarging the payment of those who have large incomes derived without industry. Although a graduated system of Income Tax could not be introduced, still we might do something to relieve those who make their incomes by their industry. I hope next year the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have a more successful Budget, and be able to take this subject into consideration.

(7.25.) MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): As a humble agricultural Member, and not a financial expert, I wish to say that although we are very grateful to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the reduction he has made in local taxation, yet I regret he has not been able to go further. We in the Eastern Counties are working out a precarious existence, as land is going out of cultivation owing to foreign competition and the incidence of local taxation. I should like to indicate two methods by which you might relieve local taxation without putting a heavy burden on any other class of the community, and that is by taxing British wines, and by putting a tax on transfers of shares, to show the amount of money which actually passed on the completed transaction. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will remember that gratitude in agricultural industry, as in others, is only in anticipation of favours to come.

MR. BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman when the arrangement as to new patents will come into operation?

MR. S. BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the whole of the year's extra receipts have gone in the reduction of gross expenditure?

(7.28.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Will the right hon. Gentleman lay on the Table before we come to the consideration of the Budget a tabulated statement showing the receipts and expenditure of the Post Office during the last ten years? Although a portion of this Revenue has been spent on increased postal facilities, on improvements of the Public Service, and on important additions to salaries, still there is a large surplus, much larger than was the case six years ago, when the right hon. Gentleman came into office. The surplus Revenue in 1885 was £3,119,000; in 1886 it was £3,008,000; whereas so far as I can make it out for the past year it was £3,316,000, after considerably increasing the salaries; and in the present year it will be £3,420,000. There has already been improvement, but there is room for more, and I think the surplus Revenue might be still further utilised. What I have to ask is, will the right hon. Gentleman give a tabulated statement showing for the last few years the surplus Revenue in each year, so that we may have the actual figures and be enabled to make comparisons?

(7.30.) MR. BIGWOOD (Middlesex, Brentford): I should like to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, finding that his Revenue has increased by so large an amount, he will be inclined to entertain a proposal which I shall make later on when the Budget is discussed, for reducing the cost in some degree, or bringing some funds to the assistance of the County of Middlesex, who are paying so much more for their police than is the case in any other county in England. Having such a large sum at his disposal in the shape of the windfall to which he has referred, I hope he will be generously inclined.

(7.31.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): There is one other question to which, perhaps, the Chancellor of the Exchequer will give an answer when he replies. In his interesting and lucid statement he has not said whether the amount put at the disposal of the County Council by the Wine and Spirit Duties will be retained. Several County Councils are about to hold their meetings, and will, no doubt, be glad to know whether any change is proposed. I presume that such is not the case, but perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will say a word on the subject.

(7.32.) MR. GOSCHEN: In reference to the remarks of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), I find his own Return gives the best statistics on the subject of the Post Office that can be procured, and all I say is that the statement shall be brought up to date as far as possible. That would show the right hon. Gentleman what he desires; but, if not, I will give him the figures in manuscript. With reference to the increase in the Post Office Revenue, I think the figures he has dealt with only touch Post Office Revenue and Expenditure, without taking into consideration sites and buildings, and I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that sites are a large amount.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: The sites are provided out of the Post Office grant, and the buildings out of another fund.

*MR. GOSCHEN: Speaking from memory, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the Revenue of the Post Office will be £200,000 less than it was in the previous year because of the increased expenditure. With respect to the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for London University, I know of no change proposed in the allocation of the Wine and Spirit Duties. I think it is highly desirable that the County Council should devote that money to the purposes of technical education; but that is a matter which is entirely in the discretion of the Council, and I do not propose to legislate on that point. The matter for the present will remain precisely where it now stands. With respect to the question of the hon. Member for Poplar, I think I stated clearly that in the present year the whole of the cash receipts appropriated in aid of Votes are not lost to the Miscellaneous Revenue, owing to the fact that the receipts for each quarter are paid in after the end of the quarter. It is the case that, by a statistical coincidence, the amount of a quarter's receipts is about the same as the amount of my margin; but I must tell the hon. Gentleman that the change to which he referred was made long before the Estimates arrived at such a point that I was able to foresee what the final balance would be. With reference to the remarks of the hon. Member for North Islington, it is a large scheme that he suggests, and I admit that no subject is more interesting than the general question of the incidence of taxation. The reconstruction of the Income Tax, which I know is an ideal of the hon. Member's, is a work of the most stupendous character, and it is certainly not a task to be taken up at the close of a Parliament. I was asked a question with respect to patents, and what was meant was that new patents taken out after the 25th September should enjoy the diminution in fees. It is now under consideration whether the diminution can be made in the case of those taken out before that day, and I shall be prepared to make a statement later on. I have now only to thank the Committee for the words they have used with respect to the statement of the Budget. Of course, we perfectly recognise that it is impossible to discuss the very large issues which are involved without full time being given to hon. Members to study the proposals when they appear in printed form. I have had a conference with the First Lord of the Treasury, and I think it is possible that the first Thursday after we meet again may be set aside for the further discussion of the Budget proposals. However, I will consider that point with the Leader of the House, and will make a communication on the subject to right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen who are interested in the matter. With respect to the Wine Duties, I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Gladstone) would wish me to enlarge upon that point at present; but I will not forget the recommendations which he has made, nor have they been absent from our minds during the preparation of our proposals. I will take into consideration the other points that have been mentioned to me; and I would suggest that we should now take the Resolution with regard to sparkling wines, as that is a definite change on a definite date. I would also suggest that the Resolutions dealing with Tea and Income Tax should be put off till the Thursday after the Easter holidays at all events.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Resolved, That, instead of the Duty on Wine imposed by "The Customs (Wine Duty) Act, 1888," there shall be charged and paid the Duty following (that is to say):—

Sparkling Wine imported in bottle . the gallon . two shillings.

This Duty is to be paid in addition to the Duty in respect of alcoholic strength payable under "The Customs Amendment Act, 1886," and without reduction.—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

Resolution to be reported To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

Committee to sit again upon Monday 25th April.

SMALL AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.—(No. 183.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 8th April.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, after the last word "Act," to insert the words "lease, hire, or."—(Mr. T. E. Ellis.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(7.43.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): When the Committee adjourned the other night I was explaining that I was willing in Sub-section 2 of Clause 3—I was prepared—to accept the Amendment which stands on the Paper in the name of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre). This Amendment would omit from the clause the words:—"But will be so able, if they are permitted, to occupy small holdings in the first instance as tenants." There are several reasons which I have already given why it is desirable, on the whole, to maintain as the first principle of this Bill that the new holders shall acquire their holdings by purchase rather than as tenants. There are three parties to be considered—the owners of the land, the new holders, and the ratepayers and the interests they represent. As regards the owners of the land, I may say at once that I see no objection whatever to the Local Authority acquiring land from them by hire as well as by purchase. They would have ample security, and I should not be disposed to interfere with what they might voluntarily wish to do. Then with respect to the new holders, again I see no objection—provided they have not the means of acquiring the land by purchase—I see no objection to their obtaining it by hire, subject to those reservations which I have already stated, and if they can find the money which will convert them into freeholders that they shall do so. But when I come to the third party, the ratepayers and the interests they represent, there are more serious considerations which deserve the attention of the Committee. In the first place, if the new holder is to be a tenant, the Local Authority loses at once the security of the deposit which is to be paid down in the first instance, and that is a condition to which I attach very considerable importance. This is probably the best security contained in the Bill. In the second place, if the new holders are merely tenants, it is obvious to the Committee that the Local Authorities will be converted into landlords, and I have very grave doubts whether they are best fitted to occupy such a position. The holdings will either be held upon lease or upon yearly tenure—

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is now discussing Clause 3, which is not before the Committee, and if we continue the discussion in this way we shall get into considerable confusion. The question now is the acquisition of the land by purchase.

MR. CHAPLIN: I was endeavouring to explain the grounds upon which I am prepared to make certain concessions, but if you rule it to be out of order I bow entirely to your decision. Perhaps it was premature on my part to make the announcement, but I desired to facilitate the discussion. With respect to the Amendment which is actually before us, I do not propose to accept it for the reasons I have stated. I wish the general principle to be maintained that the Bill is one for the creation of small holders who shall be purchasers rather than tenants, and perhaps I have said enough to induce the Committee to agree with me to retain that part of the clause in its present form.

(7.49.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): I see the difficulty of reconciling the forms of the Committee with the purpose of the right hon. Gentleman, and it is only fair to him that I should also acknowledge that I perfectly understand his purpose. I would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should place upon the Paper the proposal as it will stand amended according to his views, and put it down for discussion, and we shall then see whether it falls short of the views entertained on this side of the House. That will be better than making an arrangement beforehand, and it will give us an opportunity of discussing the matter fully in its proper place.

(7.50.) MR. CHAPLIN: I think the purpose will be attained by the omission of certain words in Clause 3, and that it will not require any words to be inserted.

(7.51.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that he was prepared to accede to the proposition that the Local Authority should have power in future to hire land on a long lease as well as to buy it out. I rather gathered from him, by his using the word "feu" that he intended that the Local Authority should have the power of taking perpetuity leases, paying the rent in the nature of a rent-charge upon the land. I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would explain what it is that he really intends in that respect.

(7.51.) MR. CHAPLIN: What I intended to convey was that under the clause as it stands now the Local Authorities have the power of acquiring land by "feu"—that is, by the payment of a perpetual rent-charge—under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1844, Section 10, I think—I am speaking from memory. I cannot doubt, that being the effect of the Bill as it stands now, that no alteration in the Bill would be required for the purpose of getting rid of one of the main objections taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, namely, that for the purpose of additional purchase the Local Authority would be compelled to borrow and pay down a capital sum; the effect of the Bill being that they can acquire land by the payment of a perpetual rent-charge instead of by the payment of a capital sum. That objection is therefore removed, and it is unnecessary, so far as I know, to alter the Bill in any respect at all. I am unable to accept the Amendment for the reason I have already stated, and which I shall be able to enter on more fully when we come to Clause 3.

(7.54.) MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I am sure hon. Members on both sides of the House must be gratified with the right hon. Gentleman's declaration that he will vary and multiply the forms and methods of letting land to labourers and others. That I consider a concession of very great value and importance; but I should like to urge upon the right hon. Gentleman whether, in the interests of the working of the Bill, it would not be well to go one step further? The right hon. Gentleman must recognise, more especially after the rejection of the Amendment on Friday with regard to compulsion, that there are still difficulties, and great difficulties, in the way of any appreciable increase in the number of small holdings. The right hon. Gentleman would find that County Councils, with a choice of methods, would be able, in many localities, to make comparatively favourable terms with landowners, by which a farm, for example, that became vacant, could be taken on a long lease, and could then be let out in small agricultural tenancies varying, say, from 3 to 50 acres, thus carrying out the object at which the right hon. Gentleman is ultimately aiming—namely, the increase of small holdings. I rather agree with some of my hon. Friends on this side that the increase of small holders would be very much promoted by increasing in the first place the numbers having an interest in the soil—by having small tenants. These small tenancies being largely increased, there would be a desire on the part of the tenants of these holdings to acquire the land on some more permanent basis. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give us a promise that he will accept this Amendment, or some Amendment drafted on the same lines.

*(7.58.) MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): It seems to me that the County Councils might be very unwilling to run the risk of raising money for the purposes of land speculation, though they might be willing to hire estates for a term of years. I sincerely trust that the right hon. Gentleman will make a concession in the direction of this Amendment. I think the landlords might be very willing, especially at the present time, to let their estates to the County Councils at an easy rental, that land might be cut up into small holdings, and let again to small holders at an easy rent, and this tentative proceeding would be entirely in accordance with principles which the right hon. Gentleman laid down when he introduced this Bill.

(7.59.) COMMANDER BETHELI (York, E.R., Holderness): At first I was inclined to support this Amendment, but I am bound to say that I have come round to the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman. In discussing this Amendment I think we may put aside entirely the question of future tenancies. It does not affect them one way or the other. I would be disposed to say that under the circumstances it would be better for the County Councils to acquire the fee-simple of the land outright. I do not see that land-owners would be more likely to let land on lease than to part with it in fee-simple. There is one class of land-owner, no doubt, which would be prepared to lease land—the owner of limited estates; but these are the exception. I think hon. Gentlemen opposite have failed to make out a sufficiently strong case to induce the right hon. Gentleman to accept this Amendment. As I have said, I had been originally in favour of the Amendment, but I have come to the conclusion that the right hon. Gentleman is right, and if hon. Gentlemen go to a Division I shall support the right hon. Gentleman in opposing the Amendment.

(8.5.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I take this opportunity of saying that the right hon. Gentleman has made a concession in regard to feuing or quit rent-charge which is sufficient for the purpose of my Amendment; and therefore it will not be necessary, for my part, to move the Amendment standing in my name. In regard to the present Amendment before the Committee I cannot help thinking that there is some confusion in the minds of hon. Members. We are not dealing now with the question as to how the County Councils are to let or hire land to those who apply to them. It seems to me there is all the difference in the world between the two Amendments, and they do not appear to me to have any connection whatever. I am rather surprised, after all that has taken place in regard to the position of leaseholders, that the right hon. Gentleman should be asked to re-introduce the system into this Bill. I want my hon. Friends to consider what difficulties will arise when the leases come to an end; and when you begin to deal with the proprietors respecting the improvements that have been made upon these holdings, I regret to say that I should have to go into a different Lobby, should this Amendment be pressed to a Division, from many hon. Members on this side. I shall support the right hon. Gentleman and the Government in leaving out leaseholders. As regards County Councils, I think it would be objectionable in the last degree that the County Council, after a term of 30 years, or any other number of years, should have to enter into a controversy with the proprietor of the ground as to the conditions on which a lease was to be renewed, or the purchase of the fee-simple effected. In Scotland for many years we have been seeking for fixity of tenure, and now, if we are to abolish that fixity of tenure, it will be impossible for the holders to hold their own with the proprietors. I think, therefore, it would be very much more useful to remove the difficulties which exist in regard to the sale of estates. If a remedy is to be applied, I think it ought to be by so altering the law as to render it permissible under any circumstances for a person in this country to sell any estate under an Act of Parliament. If tenants are to put up their own buildings there would be enormous difficulties as to compensation for improvements when the leases fell in. I shall support the Government against the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The true remedy is to make it non-permissible to sell any estate bought under the Bill. If a quit rent were provided for, the landlord would be able to retain his sense of proprietorship in the land.

Commander Bethell

*(8.15.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): The whole question is whether you will bind the hands of the County Council by shutting them out from one particular method of acquiring land for the use of smaller tenants. It is difficult to argue this question and yet to keep within the bounds of the ruling which has just been laid down. What we want is small quantities of land, say up to 10 acres, at a fair rent for the labouring classes. The greater the variety of tenure introduced into the Bill the greater will be the facilities for the County Council to provide small holdings for labourers. It has been said very truly that there is a good deal of sentiment connected with the ownership of land. There are many owners who, I am sure, will be very much more willing to let to the County Council any vacant land on fair terms than to sell one farm, or a part of a farm, out of their estates. I am not dealing now with the curmudgeon—the unreasonable landlord—I do not want to use strong language—but with the philanthropic, good landlord—and there are many of that description—who may be unwilling to sell a part of an estate which has been in his family for years. Besides, the landowner may reasonably hold the view that the experiment may not answer, for it is an experiment after all. He may say to the County Council, “Here is a farm of 50, or 60, or 100 acres. If the villagers in the neighbourhood of it come to you and wish to take it in small holdings, I am willing to let you have it for 20 years at a moderate rental, and at the end of that time it shall be valued. If it is then found to have deteriorated you shall pay me for the extent to which it has deteriorated, but if it has been improved, and I decide not to renew the lease on the old terms, I will pay for any improvements that have been made upon it.” I think that in that way we are much more likely to obtain land in many villages of England than by being confined to buying it. Then, again, I hardly think the hon. Gentleman opposite appreciates the number of men who have mortgages and life charges on their land, who may be willing to let it, but not to let the public know the extent to which it is encumbered by attempting to sell it. There is also the important question of law costs in connection with the purchase of the land to be considered. I will now call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the advice given by one of his most powerful colleagues in this House. In a speech on this subject, delivered on 25th January, 1885, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham used these words:—

“You cannot expect every landlord to do what should be done. It is not every one who has the capital to make the experiment. Well, then, they must give place to those who have. That is why I am anxious to call in the Local Authority of every district, and to give them power to take land with this object.”

He goes on to say:—

“I do not think that the Local Authorities will go too fast in this matter, or that they will be likely to incur risk to any considerable extent; but I think that the experiments should be made in many districts, and under very many conditions.”

Now, this is one of the most important Amendments to the Bill, and what the Government are really saying in refusing to accept it is this: “We do not trust the County Councils sufficiently to let them take farms on lease to supply the requirements of the labourers.” Compulsion has been, unfortunately, ruled out of the Bill, and the leasing advocated in the Amendment is a voluntary and not a compulsory one. By tying their hands in this manner the Government is preventing this Bill from being used by the County Council in the one way in which labourers want it to be used.

*(8.23.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I would point out that now that compulsion has been struck out of the Bill there will be a very large number of persons who will be unable to obtain land under it. Attention has frequently been called to the fact that land is wanted locally, in parishes scattered about the country, rather than in large blocks. I know it is perfectly possible for the County Council in the part of the country with which I am acquainted to obtain farms in the neighbourhood of towns and villages if they had the power to hire them for short periods. Therefore, I hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture will see his way to accept the Amendment which has been placed on the Paper. It is essentially a practical Amendment, and it would assist the right hon. Gentleman to meet the vast and increasing demand for land in this country.

(8.25.) MR. WHITBREAD (Bedford): I would venture very respectfully to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the desirability of considering whether, with regard to land where no buildings would be required, a system of leasing might not possibly be adopted. Where buildings will be required I see the difficulty as regards the proprietor at the expiration of the lease. Are you going to compel him to take over at the valuation houses and buildings in the construction of which he has not had any voice? It is because the Bill contemplates such a widely different object that this difficulty arises. I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman will consider the suggestion; but it seems to me that the plan might answer well enough for large allotments, in preference to small holdings. As to the word "feus," I do not quite understand what the meaning of it is; I believe it is a perpetual rent, and I hope we shall not put the landlord in the position of being the receiver of a perpetual rent.

MR. CHAPLIN: It is voluntary.

MR. WHITBREAD: Yes, but I think it would be a bad tenure; in fact, I cannot imagine a worse tenure than for a man to draw a perpetual rent, he being at the same time divorced from all connection with the tenants, having no responsibility for improvements, discharging no duties, and being, as it were, a mere parasite eating up the value of the land. Whether it is voluntary or not, I sincerely hope that a large number of landlords will not be found willing to put themselves in that position.

(9.5.) MR. CORNWALLIS (Maidstone): Hon. Members who have moved and supported this Amendment have not, in my opinion, followed it out to its legitimate conclusion. If the County Councils have either the power to lease or hire land for the purposes of this Bill, and if they do lease a farm from a landowner, they have power to re-let it, they will be only able either to lease it or to let it on a yearly tenancy. The effect of that will be that they will become nothing more or less than landowners, which, from a County Council point of view, I would very much deprecate. I will not go into the evils of this system, because it is not necessary to do so, and they are generally admitted on both sides of the House. But there is another point we might bear in mind as well. Supposing the County Council lease a farm of 100 or 120 acres and divide it into small holdings of a lesser quantity; and supposing the tenant of one of those plots dies and they are unable to find another tenant, the County Council must be placed in a very ridiculous position, because, having taken a lease from the landowner, the County Council cannot expect the landowner to take the ground back again before the expiration of the lease. And in that way not only shall we have the County Council resolving itself into a landowner, but into a farmer as well, and that last-named alternative is even more to be deprecated than the other. And not only would the County Council become a farmer, but it would become the farmer of the very worst part of the farm. More than that, they could not expect any cottar, in one of these small holdings to erect any buildings whatever on the land taken from the County Council when he would have no security whatever for the capital he has laid out, and which would probably be his whole available capital. The value of his own labour diminishes every year as he grows older, and therefore a small holder would be very unwilling to take a small holding on a farm leased by the County Council. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture will not in any way accept this Amendment which has been proposed. I believe it will not only not advance the prospects of the Bill, but that it will land us in a course of procedure which would be very dangerous and unacceptable to County Councils.

Mr. Whitbread

(9.10.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I have previously endeavoured to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman what his intentions really were when he proposes to give the Local Authorities power to lease land; whether it is to be a perpetuity lease or a lease for a short period. I did not then express any opinion on the subject, and I should, therefore, like to express my view now. The Amendment is a very wide one, applicable to all holdings, and apparently contemplates the possibility of Local Authorities hiring land for a short period, and then letting it out in large quantities, and I am obliged, therefore, to vote with the Government on the matter. I agree that Local Authorities should be empowered to let for short terms, but there should be behind that the possibility of the tenants being converted into perpetuity owners, either leasehold or freehold, and if that possibility were not open, I think that a great deal of the advantage which might be derived under the Bill might be lost. I understand that it is the sense of perpetuity of tenure which the right hon. Gentleman desires to encourage, and it is most desirable; but if the Local Authority leased land for 21 years, and let it out in lots of from one to 20 or 30 acres, it would be impossible for the tenants to erect buildings, and they would lose all sense of ownership. If the proposal were confined to small holdings it might be another matter, but to extend it to all holdings would not be a desirable course, and, therefore, I cannot support the Amendment.

(9.13.)* SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): My right hon. Friend objects to the Amendment because it extends to large holdings, and, therefore, he would preclude its application to the smaller holdings. I think the most important part of the Bill is that which proposes to extend the Allotment Acts, and give to industrious and hard-working labourers, who have shown their skill on one acre, the opportunity to get possession of larger pieces of land up to ten acres, and I hope even beyond that limit. It is for their benefit that I want these leasing powers; to them it would be invaluable. We can understand the County Council buying land and cutting it up into large holdings and small ownerships, but we want them to go further in order to give that ladder to the labourers which the Select Committee intended, by which they might rise from one acre plots to larger holdings, and, finally, become the possessors of small holdings themselves. I take it that the prime object of the Bill is to prevent the depopulation of rural districts, but why should we restrict the County Councils in carrying out that object? They are to create small yeomen, but I would beg the right hon. Gentleman not to put obstacles in the way of the creation of hired holdings up to ten acres, which I believe could be better done under the leasehold system than under the purchase system. Land acquired by purchase would probably be of a higher price, and could not be let to pay in one or two acre lots, whereas land acquired on lease could probably be let out at £1, £1 10s, or £2 an acre. We do not want the system of small holdings to be confined to remote rural districts. Outside many of the small boroughs which came under the Bill, of 20,000 or 25,000 inhabitants, where land is of considerable value in view of prospective building, it would be out of the power of the County Council to purchase, as the land would be too dear. But they might be trusted to lease 100 or more acres, and let it in ten, 20, or 30 acre lots. During the period of the lease the tenants would have security of tenure, and would use the land not only to their own advantage, but also to the advantage of the town to which they were contiguous. We want that kind of tenant in the neighbourhood of small towns. I think the Bill would be better if we extended its provisions so as to trust the County Councils to do what is best in the circumstances of each case. No County Council is likely to use the Bill for a wasteful or injurious purpose. We can trust them to take advantage of the purchasing clauses, and of leasing clauses, if inserted, and in that way to do the greatest amount of good to the greatest number of people in the district.

(9.18.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I am surprised that my hon. Friend should propose to perpetuate the system of land tenure which has broken down in Ireland, and is breaking down in Scotland and England. It would be objectionable for the County Council to take land for a limited period, and also for them to let it for a limited period. I am entirely in favour of the County Council disposing of the land on a perpetual tenure, which would induce the agricultural labourer to make the most of the land, which he would not do if he knew the landlord would retake possession at the end of 21 years. I hope the Government will not give any countenance to the proposal to take land on lease. It would be all very well for the County Council to let by the year land which they cannot sell or let on perpetual tenure. Some provision should be made for this, but it should only apply to such land as I have indicated. The labourer will only settle himself down to improve the land and make the most of it if he has it on perpetual lease or in fee-simple.

(9.20.) DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I agree with a good deal that the hon. Member for Forfarshire has just said, but I cannot go quite so far as he did. I have not been able to find out exactly what the tenants are to gain by this Amendment. A perpetual tenure is the only inducement for an agricultural labourer to put his money, enterprise, and labour into the soil. Under the Amendment he only changes a private landlord—who may be good, and generally is good—for a corporate body, which is the worst kind of landlord possible, because they have to make their profit out of the land, and have no bowels of compassion; they are harsh and very often cruel, living as they do at a distance. If you are going to bring the people back to the soil, and make it worth their while to put their energy into the land, you can only do it by giving them some idea of fixity of tenure, so that everything they put into the soil will come back to them, and that there will be no possibility of their being turned out, or of the rent being raised on their own improvements.

(9.24.) MR. CHAPLIN: I appeal to the Committee and to the hon. Member whether the time has not come when we can go to a Division on the Amendment, if it is intended to press it to a Division? I think I have shown that I have not been unwilling or backward in trying to meet the views of hon. Members. I quite admit that more than one argument has been advanced from that side which is deserving of consideration. It has been suggested that the Amendment might be made to apply to those cases where no buildings are required. It is also suggested that it might apply to cases where the landlord might agree to let land for a period, but might be unwilling to sell. On these two points I am quite willing, without committing myself to any pledge, to consider the question when we arrive at the point where I think they ought to be inserted, in Clause 3. I shall then have an opportunity of explaining to the Committee the great objections I have to making the Local Authorities great landlords.

Mr. Barclay

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): The right hon. Gentleman proposes to deal with the question on Clause 3. That clause deals not with the relations of the County Council and the persons from whom the land is to be obtained, but with the relations of the County Council and the persons by whom the land is to be obtained. I do not wish to anticipate the discussion on that clause, but I would submit these points to the right hon. Gentleman. He said that one of his reasons for objecting to this Amendment is that it is possible for the County Council to feu land under the Bill. Perhaps it would be more satisfactory if the Attorney General would tell us that it is possible under Clause 1 for the County Council to feu land. I would also point out that this Amendment does not propose to introduce the leasing tenure as an alternative proposal, it only proposes that in certain cases in which it is impossible for land to be bought by the County Council, the system of leasing should be adopted. It is an unsatisfactory and inferior mode of obtaining land, but in certain cases, and especially on the outskirts of small towns where it is impossible for land to be got on any other system, it might be adopted. As compulsory has been left out, I think the Amendment should be adopted to meet such cases as those I have referred to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I can only say what my right hon. Friend has said, which I believe would be accepted by any lawyer. Under Sub-section 1 of Clause 2, in which the Lands Clauses Acts are incorporated, and the amending Acts of 1863 and 1864, land can be purchased and acquired under a perpetual rent charge, and there is not the slightest doubt that under the Bill as it stands these Authorities can buy land and sell it under a perpetual rent charge.

MR. WHITBREAD: I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give us an assurance that, in the event of the Amendment being withdrawn, the question can be again raised on another clause.

(9.31.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): This Amendment simply refers to the method in which the County Councils shall acquire land. I cannot see the advantage of the County Council hiring land, because the rent would be much the same as the interest on the purchase money they would have to pay in acquiring it. This opens up a large number of difficult questions, such as the question of buildings. The County Council cannot put up buildings on land simply acquired under lease. The only case in which County Councils should be permitted to hire land would be in the vicinity of large towns, where the land was absolutely too high for anyone to purchase for agricultural purposes. I have put an Amendment down to Clause 3 to carry out that object. I think in such cases it would be an advantage if County Councils were allowed to hire land either on lease or in any other way in lieu of purchase. I hope the Amendment will not be pressed to a Division, or, if pressed, that it will not be carried.

*(9.35.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM: (Gloucester, Cirencester): I would join in the appeal to my hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment, on the understanding that the assurance asked for by the hon. Member for Bedford will be given by the right hon. Gentleman. I think the Minister for Agriculture has intimated clearly enough that he is willing to consider the matter. I think it is a fair compromise. My hon. Friend the Member for Bedford has shown that there are cases in which the powers of the County Council to hire land may be very useful. The compromise sketched by the right hon. Gentleman, as I understand it, is this: that it must be land where there are no buildings; land which is practically limited to Sub-section 2 of Clause 3; land for letting in lots of not more than ten acres. I think, in these circumstances, we might very well be saved a Division, and I appeal to my hon. Friend to withdraw his Amendment.

(9.37.) MR. SEALE - HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I am afraid the subject could not appropriately be raised on Clause 3.

(9.38.) MR. CHAPLIN: I think I can give that assurance. It is in Clause 3, in the first instance, that letting under any circumstances is provided for. The questions that have been raised by the hon. Member for Bedford and other hon. Members are questions as to limitations in the power of letting. The Amendment of the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division raises the question of the power of the Local Authority to take land on lease. It is perfectly clear, I think, that these questions can be raised again; and under these circumstances, I would ask the Committee to postpone further discussion until we have arrived at Clause 3 of the Bill. The hon. Member for Bedford, in his opening statement on this question, rather sympathised, as I understood him, with the proposal to introduce leasing powers where no buildings were required, but he said it was impossible to go beyond that. Then the question has been raised whether these leasing powers can extend to holdings over ten acres. These two proposals, I may point out, are rather inconsistent in themselves. On many holdings of ten acres it might be desirable that buildings should be erected. I take it to be the general understanding of the Committee that leasing powers should be included in the Bill in respect of holdings where no buildings are necessary. I shall be perfectly willing to fairly and fully consider that point without absolutely pledging myself upon it.

(9.40.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be better to accept the Amendment.

(9.41.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I moved this Amendment in the hope that it might lead to an enlargement of the scope of the Bill. It has been shown to-night by several speakers who have disagreed with the Amendment that there is need of some such provision as this. The hon. Member for Bedford thinks it would be well that the Government should accept some such provision. But after the appeal of the Minister for Agriculture, I will withdraw the Amendment in the hope that he will bring forward some provision to meet the various demands that have been made from this side of the House.

(9.42.) THE CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. Member that the most appropriate occasion on which to bring the question up again would not be on Clause 3, but in the form of a new clause. Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn?

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: Can it be brought up in any way, or can it be discussed before we come to Clause 3? It is important we should know the mind of the Government before we come to the discussion of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn?

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(9.43.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I beg to move, in page 1, line 12, to leave out the words "for persons who are resident in the county and desire to buy and will themselves cultivate the holdings." I think these words would be rather an embarrassment to the County Council, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consent to strike them out of the clause. I do not think we ought to confine purchasers to those resident in the county. I think the County Council ought to have an opportunity of bringing in persons from outside the particular county where small holdings are provided; and I appeal to the Government not to take the narrow parochial view of confining purchasers to those resident in the county. I agree that the owners of these holdings should cultivate themselves, but I do not think this is the clause in which these words should be inserted. I would propose, when we come to the proper clause, that land acquired for small holdings should be cultivated by the holders themselves.

Mr. Chaplin

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, to leave out the words from "for persons," to "holdings," in line 13.—(Mr. Barclay.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

(9.45.) MR. CHAPLIN: My difficulty in accepting the Amendment is this: that unless there is some limitation to the power of a Local Authority to provide small holdings within their own area, they may be called upon to provide them anywhere. It is obvious that the operations of every Local Authority should be limited to their own district, and that they should not be called upon to buy small holdings in all parts of the country. The limitations are these: residents in the county, who desire to buy, and who will themselves cultivate the holdings. About the last proposition there is, I believe, no difference of opinion. So far as the Government are concerned, we have never concealed our opinion that we are anxious to put in the forefront of this Bill that the holdings should be for purchasers rather than tenants, subject to those limitations which I have undertaken to consider at a later period of this Bill. With regard to the question whether the purchaser should be resident in the county, I do not take so much objection if that is omitted; but as to the other provisions I must retain them.

(9.48.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I quite agree that the benefits of this Act ought to be confined to the people who are cultivators themselves, and that there is no reason why the taxation of the country should be applied to acquiring holdings for any others except the real cultivators. We are specially anxious to bring back to the land the people not only who want small holdings, but the people who want to have small holdings and also to hire their labour out in the district. There is great need for bringing back people to the land who will get a home on the land near the labour at which they are engaged. If this is to be done, I see no reason why it should be limited to the county, and therefore I will support the view of the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay). I see no advantage that there could possibly be in confining the benefits of the clause to those who are resident in the county. I think one of the objects of the Bill is to keep the agricultural labourers on the land, to stop the depopulation of the counties and the aggregation of labour in the centres where it is not wanted. I think it would be better for us to consider this matter fairly before we tie the hands of the County Councils.

(9.51.) COMMANDER BETHELL: Clause 4 deals with this matter to some extent. If the right hon. Gentleman leaves out the words suggested, the position will be that the County Councils, if they have land to spare, may let it to a person from outside, but the person from outside would not in any way be able to compel the action of the County Council.

(9.52.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I think if the words "resident in the county" were left out that would meet the views of hon. Gentlemen.

MR. BARCLAY: As the clause at present stands it is necessary that the demand should be in the county itself before the County Council can acquire land. I think it would be better that the Council should acquire the land and be free to dispose of it to any comer. I can easily see that in many counties this would be a great advantage to farmers and small cultivators.

Amendment amended, and agreed to.

*(9.55.) SIR W. FOSTER: In view of the conditions that have been made by the President of the Board of Agriculture, I do not wish the County Councils to be limited entirely in their proceedings to persons who desire to buy, and with that object I move to leave out the word "buy," and put in the word "occupy." We want the people to occupy the land. We do not want this Bill to be limited simply to persons who are in a position to buy, because there are a large number of people who are not in such a position, but whom we desire, nevertheless, to benefit under this Bill. If the purchase money is kept at a high figure it will exclude large numbers, and we wish to recognise that others beside purchasers are contemplated by the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, to leave out the word "buy," and insert the word "occupy."—(Sir W. Foster.)

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): Do I understand that the words, "resident in the county," are in the Bill, or are they struck out?

THE CHAIRMAN: They are struck out.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I rose three times to speak in favour of those words.

THE CHAIRMAN: I put the Question and the Committee agreed.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: There are several Members round me who desired to vote against it.

(9.56.) MR. CHAPLIN: I desire to point out that if the words remain in the Bill they will not prevent the attainment of the object which the hon. Gentleman wishes to secure, because at a later period of the Bill the consideration of the facilities to small holders will be taken. But for reasons which I have before explained we are anxious to retain the principle of purchase as what I may call the first principle of the Bill. It will not in the least interfere with the desire of hon. Members who are anxious about letting, upon which, I may say, we have already come to a general understanding; but it will retain the principle in the interests of the rate-payers, and on no other grounds, that purchase should be the first principle rather than a secondary principle. The power of letting, to a considerable extent, will not be prevented, and I hope the hon. Member will allow the clause to remain as it is.

(9.58.) SIR W. HARCOURT: I am not sure that the right hon. Gentleman is right. This is the only clause which enables the County Council to buy, which, of course, is the preliminary proceeding. The County Council by this clause are to buy subject to certain limitations. They are to buy for a limited class. I understand that the words "resident in the county" have been knocked out, and it now remains that the only power the County Councils will have to acquire land is for persons who desire to buy. It is quite clear that there is no other power. They will have no power to acquire land for people who desire to occupy but do not desire to buy. The power to acquire land is in the 1st clause, and I say that if we pass this clause as it is the power will be limited. [MR. CHAPLIN: No, no!] It is limited in this clause, which says that they may buy suitable land for persons who desire to buy, and thus cultivate the land. That cannot be for everyone, and it does not fulfil the conditions which my hon. Friends desire. It is perfectly clear and plain. If these words are not altered it will be perfectly idle for us afterwards to introduce provisions which the 1st clause has formally prohibited. You must use some larger and more general words.

(10.2.) MR. CHAPLIN: The right hon. Gentleman labours under the disadvantage that he has only this moment come into the House, and has not been able to hear the previous discussion.

SIR W. HARCOURT: That has nothing to do with it. I have read the Bill.

Mr. Chaplin

MR. CHAPLIN: We have been discussing the matter now for the best part of an hour, and I am happy to think that the Committee have come to a general understanding. The right hon. Gentleman will pardon me for stating this fact, of which he was in ignorance. The right hon. Gentleman is labouring under a mistake. He is confusing those persons who desire to buy with those who are unable to buy. It is laid down in the Bill that the Local Authorities shall buy these small holdings for those who desire to buy. If the people who desire to buy are unable to buy, which I imagine will be a very common thing, when the Bill comes into operation the Local Authorities may let to these persons. But for reasons which I have stated over and over again in Committee, we do desire—and I hope we shall retain the confidence of the Committee—to retain in the Bill as its first principle rather than as a secondary principle that the land shall be provided for those who are able to buy, so as to make them owners of the land rather than tenants. I have been prevented by the very proper ruling of the Chair from stating all my arguments on this point; but if the right hon. Gentleman will look fully into the question, he will see that there are very grave and serious considerations, which can be advanced chiefly in the interests of the rate-payers—not the least in the interest of the landlords or of the holders—which make it extremely desirable that people who are in a position to do so should purchase rather than hire the land.

(10.5.) SIR W. HARCOURT: The explanation which the right hon. Gentleman has given has made it more obvious than before that the alteration should be made, and I am more confirmed than ever in my view that these words are not the proper words to have here. Now, what is proposed in reference to this matter? That people should go through the preliminary process of desiring to buy; that though they have got no money to buy, yet they should appear in the character of people desirous to buy land. I do not think anybody could fail to see the absurdity of a clause framed in such a manner as that. If it means that there are people who desire to hire, and that the people who desire to hire are those people who have got no money to buy if they did desire to buy, I think the expression of that desire would be a farce, and I might say an imposture, under the circumstances. If it means to furnish a declaration that people who are desirous of holding land should be enabled to hire land, it would be just as well to say so. Surely it would be much better at first to make the first enacting clause enable the Councils to buy for all purposes for which they shall desire to buy.

*(10.7.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I think that this Bill, as it stands now, ought to be entitled "A Bill to Enable Landlords to Dispose of their Estates in Small Farms with the Guarantee of the County Councils." That, I think, would be an accurate description of it. An incursion of hungry Scotch farmers are to be allowed to come down upon any county to buy the estates of impecunious noblemen in 50 acre lots, with the guarantee of the unhappy ratepayers on whose behalf you say that you have brought forward this Bill. I thought this was a Bill for providing poor labourers with a chance of getting a bit of land in their own county on fair terms. I object to the word "buy." The object of the Bill is to "provide" small holdings for the agricultural population, and to keep them on the land. If that is not the object, let us understand it at once; but it has been stated over and over again that that is the main and primary object of the Bill. Well, then, this word "buy" has no right to be put in the 1st clause of the Bill. If this word "buy" is put into the Bill it will certainly convey to the mind of any authority that has to construe it that the primary and chief and main object of the Bill is to buy the holdings. If the right hon. Gentleman will allow the phrase "buy or hire" to be inserted then I am content, or if he will leave out "buy" I am content; but I object to his putting into that 1st clause the word "buy," to the exclusion of "hire."

*(10.10.) SIR W. B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North-West): I have read most carefully this Bill, and I find it has been very considerably altered lately. I am afraid that after what has happened we could not leave the word "buy" in. If we are to have letting in an extended form as well as selling, that will make a great difference in the Bill. Then we must conform in the 1st clause to what we are going to do afterwards. I venture to hope, therefore, my right hon. Friend will consent to leave out the word "buy," or add, in addition to the word "buy," the words "for letting purposes," or any other words which may be more suitable. As the Bill stands now, I think it would not be workable in the way intended.

(10.12.) MR. T. ELLIS: The right hon. Gentleman has made a concession to the House—namely, that he is willing that the County Council should let land as well as sell it; and yet, in objecting to this Amendment, he shirks the logical consequence of his own concession. It is quite clear, if these words are allowed to remain in the Bill without the addition of the words "or hire," the clause will be completely inconsistent with, or contradictory of, Clause 3, as it will stand after the Amendment, which the right hon. Gentleman says he is willing to accept, has been made. I trust he will not take away the value or grace of his own concession, which he will do by sticking to these words.

(10.13.) COMMANDER BTHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): If my right hon. Friend gives way on this point it is quite clear it will not in the least benefit the Bill. My right hon. Friend's object is to assert the principle in the 1st clause of the Bill, that land shall be bought and not let. I do not presume to say that the words he uses are the most strictly logical words he might use; but, still, I am quite sure that it cannot affect in any way the 2nd clause, or any other clause, even if the alteration is made. If my right hon. Friend sticks to the words I shall support him.

(10.15.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): It seems to me that these words are totally inconsistent with the concession which the right hon. Gentleman has made. If the right hon. Gentleman consents, as he says he does, to amend Clause 3 by omitting the words which I have given notice to omit, and these few words are permitted to remain, it will prevent the Local Authorities from letting land in any way. I think he should omit these words which are now objected to, as they appear to me to be wholly out of place.

(10.16.) MR. POWELL WILLIAMS (Birmingham, S.): If the House agrees to insert the words "desire to buy," I think it should also agree to insert after them the words "or otherwise to become tenants under this Act." That is the suggestion I venture to make. The words "desire to buy" should thus remain, as indicating the spirit of the Bill, and immediately following would come the words "or otherwise to become tenants under this Act."

*(10.18.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I object to putting words in a Bill which are, as it is said, to indicate its spirit. This is not only an enabling clause; but under this clause they are to acquire compulsory powers, and upon this clause the powers under this Bill will depend. This is rather a difficult question to be argued by laymen. I do not desire to submit it to the right hon. Gentleman—I would rather submit it to his Legal Advisers; and I submit that, whatever we insert in Clause 1, it will refer to the case of acquiring land for the purpose of small holdings. Even if Clause 3 is altered as suggested, I do not think that would help the right hon. Gentleman out of the difficulty at all. It means a litigation to settle the question. I think the Amendment to be made should be either the Amendment suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Ilkerton, "who desire to buy or to occupy," or to leave out the words "to buy or to occupy"; but I think the best course is to leave out the words altogether, thus simply leaving out all reference to either buying or hiring, and confining it entirely to the cultivation. I am unable to reconcile the clauses in the Bill as they at present stand. If this Amendment is rejected, the Bill will be practically confined to buying, and subsequently we shall have to go all over this question again.

(10.21.) MR. HOBHOUSE (Somerset, E.): I would join in the appeal which has been made to the right hon. Gentleman that these words should be left out. No one has the slightest affection for them except himself, and surely the right hon. Gentleman must see that if they are retained they will undoubtedly prejudice the question when it comes to be discussed on a future occasion. Moreover, there was a general understanding in a previous discussion that these words should be withdrawn.

(10.22.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I will also join in the appeal which has been made to the right hon. Gentleman that the words in question should be omitted. I hope he will not insist upon retaining them, for they are not necessary in any way.

*(10.23.) MR. CHANNING: There is an anxious desire on this side of the House to facilitate progress in giving effect to the concession which the right hon. Gentleman has indicated in reference to Clause 3. I think it might be desirable to meet him half way by retaining, as he wishes to retain it, the word "buy," and by adding the words "or hire." I hope the right hon. Gentleman will consent to this suggestion being carried out.

(10.24.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): I hope, in connection with Clause 4, that County Councils will pay no attention to the petition of anyone to take land unless it is shown that he has sufficient money for the purpose.

(10.25.) MR. CHAPLIN: I have been advised by my right hon. Friend the Attorney General that it is incorrect to assert that these words are inconsistent with the other clauses of the Bill. The Government desire persons to buy, if possible, rather than become tenants; but in the case of many who would undoubtedly be found unable to purchase, provision for hiring is made by Clause 3. Nothing can be more simple or more consistent with the double object which the Government wish to promote—namely, the primary object of the creation of small owners of land, and the further desire to meet a want which has been expressed on the opposite side of the House, and which is shared by myself and my friends, that where persons are not in a position to buy, facilities should be given them to acquire land otherwise than by purchase. I would, therefore, ask the Committee to sanction the retention of the clause.

(10.28.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): As the right hon. Gentleman is so anxious that these words should be retained, I would suggest that the hon. Member should withdraw his Amendment, and permit the hon. Member for Northamptonshire to move that the words "or hire" should be added to the word "buy." Then we shall be able to take a Division on the question whether or not persons who desire to hire should or should not have a place in the enacting and empowering clause of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that the persons who will not be able to buy will be the majority, and, therefore, the Bill can be said to meet only the wishes of the minority. It is impossible to reduce it to a greater absurdity. The primary object of the Bill—that of buying—will be availed of but by few, whilst the secondary object—that of hiring—would be availed of by many. Why should those who desire to hire be excluded from the empowering clause of the Bill? If we take a Division, as I have suggested, we shall come to an intelligible issue on the question.

*(10.35.) SIR W. FOSTER: I shall be happy to fall in with the suggestion of my right hon. Friend. I do not want the word "buy" to be put in to the exclusion of other words such as "hire." I will, therefore, withdraw my Amendment, in the hope that the words "or hire" may be added afterwards.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to move the addition of the words "to rent or buy," in order to enable those who do not wish, or are unable, to buy land to rent it. If the right hon. Gentleman is going to concede to the County Councils power to acquire land for the purpose of letting it and not merely for the purpose of selling it, this is the place to insert the word "rent" so that those desirous of cultivating may have the power to do so.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, after the word "to," to insert the words "rent or."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I hope my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness will not persevere with his Amendment. We are all agreed upon the principle of hiring or letting under this clause, but we attach great importance to the prominence given to buying, therefore let us keep the word "buy." In any case the matter can be better raised on the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Northamptonshire.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 12, after the word "buy," to insert the words "or hire."—(Mr. Channing.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

VISCOUNT GRIMSTON (Herts, St. Albans): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not listen to any Amendments of this class, which are a distinct danger. The object of this Bill is to provide, if possible, for the replacing of yeomen farmers on the land, and the acceptance of this Amendment could only have the effect of restricting that operation. If the County Council, having to find capital to buy land, retained that capital as landowners they would be very greatly hampered and restricted, owing to their capital being locked up in their efforts to place a large number of yeomen farmers on the soil. I, therefore, hope that the Government will not listen to this Amendment, which is proposed under a total misapprehension of the object of the Bill.

*MR. F. S. STEVENSON: If the right hon. Gentleman does not accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend the position will be this—it will be a preliminary condition that any applicant for land should come with the desire to buy, a desire which he probably shares with 99 out of 100 persons, but which, in common with 99 out of 100 persons, he is unable to carry out. Not only are the words apparently inconsistent with Sub-section 2 of Clause 3, but they are absolutely inconsistent and incompatible if the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford is accepted by the Government. No reply has been made by the Attorney General on that point.

SIR R. WEBSTER: It seems to me the words are right as they stand now. The object of the Bill is to enable County Councils to buy land in order that persons desirous of buying land should be able to purchase it, and under certain circumstances and conditions to hire it from them. Sub-section 2 of Clause 3 provides that the County Council may let the land if persons are unable to buy. I can see no inconsistency in the Bill. There is the fullest latitude and power given to the County Council, and anybody accustomed to dealing with language of this kind will know that the Bill is framed in the right language.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I do not see why the Attorney General should object to the words "or hire." It is only by a curious construction—by importing the words in Sub-section 2 of Clause 3, and bringing them to bear on the construction of Section 1, that he applies the section to hiring at all. The fact is, Clause 3 cannot be used for such a purpose at all. It has nothing to do with the powers under which the County Council is enabled to hire land. Therefore, the attempt to bring in Clause 3 to interpret Clause 1 is a contention that no Court of Law would entertain for one moment. The County Council is to acquire the land. For whom? For persons desirous to buy. These poor people are not desirous to buy. They cannot do it. They are desirous to hire. The right hon. Gentleman has, by the concessions he has already made, admitted that the majority of persons who will come under the Bill are small men who would wish to hire because unable to buy, and we want the Bill accommodated to meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman. But when the right hon. Gentleman is asked to accommodate his Bill to his concessions he declines to do so. The Attorney General has not pretended that these words "or hire" will do any harm, and if it is really meant that when the land is acquired it may be let on hire, then these words ought to be inserted.

Viscount Grimston

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I have already said that if these words are put in they will indicate an intention by the Bill to make the County Councils simply landlords, to let land to people who never had any intention to buy their land at all. We are all agreed that when a labourer desires to buy he should be enabled to do so. It is not simply a question of a person desiring to hire land from a fresh landlord. The intention of the Bill is that there should be an intention to buy and an inability to pay. It is in that instance that the power of the County Council to hire should come in. My objection to the insertion of the words is, that they would indicate an intention that the County Council should let land to tenants who never had the slightest intention of buying.

*MR. CHANNING: The position in which the Government find themselves is absolutely incomprehensible and absolutely absurd. What does the hon. and learned Gentleman mean by saying "an intention to buy," and how and in what manner are the class of men to whom he refers to signify their intention to buy? The County Council, by the concession which the right hon. Gentleman has announced, binds itself not to look into any security that these men will be in a position to buy later on; it is simply an expression of a desire to buy. There is no guarantee or practical security that these men will ever buy, or ever attempt to buy. The whole thing is absurd. A man may express his desire to go to the moon, and that also would be absurd. What the concession amounts to is that the Government are prepared to admit that County Councils should have the power to acquire small farms, and re-let them to persons who are not in a position to buy. Many labourers who are not in a position to buy may have a vague desire to buy, but it is simply monstrous to insist on their stating that desire as a condition of having land let to them when by your concession you have removed the only security that that desire is bona fide. Either we should do one thing or the other. Are we to append to this Bill a clause which will enable County Councils to carry on the Allotments Bill on a somewhat larger scale, or are we not to do so? I venture to say that, unless these words "rent or hire" are inserted, our position is simply reduced to legislating on the most absurd, ridiculous, and unjustifiable lines. Either we mean free holders, or we mean to append—and I understand the right hon. Gentleman means to append—powers to give somewhat larger allotments to those who are not in a position to buy.

(10.55.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be better to omit the words in question altogether. I hope, however, that the Government will make it clear that this is really a Small Holdings Bill for the creation of yeomen proprietors throughout the country, and I would further ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he could not make that perfectly clear by the nature and scope of the clauses which come afterwards rather than by the adoption of the words referred to? For, while there is no doubt that the main object of the Bill is to create a class of peasant proprietors, yet it is generally admitted that there will be many men who will want to rent land under the Bill.

*(10.57.) LORD F. HERVEY (Bury St. Edmunds): So far as the question submitted to the Committee is one of drafting it seems to me of very little importance. I do not think, if the proposed words are inserted, that the scope of the third clause will be extended. Nor, if they are omitted, will that clause be restricted. The real question before us is whether it is to be made a necessary condition that any person applying for the benefit of this Act should come forward with an already-formed desire to purchase the land. I know something of the agricultural labourers in Suffolk. They are very reserved, and they do not form their conclusions in a hurry. I am perfectly certain that, if this condition which the right hon. Gentleman seems determined to insist upon is imposed, the agricultural labourers of Suffolk will have no advantage out of this Bill. There are many of them who would be willing and desirous to hire land in order to see if they can make it pay; and, if so, they will afterwards have a desire to purchase the land. Is it not within the knowledge of the right hon. Gentleman that what we are asking people to do is a thing which the late Sir James Caird declared that nobody but a fool would do? Sir James Caird's view was that a man could make a profit of 10 per cent. on his capital as a cultivating occupier, but only two per cent. as an agricultural owner. Why, then, deny agricultural labourers the opportunity of hiring small portions of land which they may be able to cultivate with advantage and insist that they should come to the County Council with a formed desire to buy the land before they know whether they can make it pay?

(11.0.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the question is one of considerable importance, and it is possible that some Members of the Committee do not see the full bearing of the proposal which has been made. I do not at all dissent from the view of the noble Lord who has just spoken with regard to agricultural labourers first hiring the land to see if they can make it pay, and, if so, then to endeavour to purchase; but I do not think that is an argument against the position taken up by the Government. The real question is, with what object did the Government introduce the Bill? The object they have in view is as far as possible to produce a body of prosperous cultivators of the soil which they own. Now, if the words proposed are inserted, you will make it clear on the face of the Bill that there is a second purpose in view wholly different, and in some respects radically inconsistent, with that object. What is that object? It is to make the County Council for all time an owner of land and landlord at a quit rent over a large body of tenants, and it appears to me that such a course as that would be disastrous to the County Council and most injurious to the tenants you are going to create. It must be borne in mind that the County Councils, if placed in the position of landlords, could not possibly make the concessions to their tenants that an ordinary English landlord could make. They will be bound by rigid rules, and must evict their tenants if the rent is not paid to the day. The noble Lord the Member for Bury St. Edmunds has admitted that it would be the desire of the labourer who acquired a holding on terms of hiring to become the owner of his land when opportunity offers. Let the Committee consider what hardship is imposed upon the labourer by the Bill as it stands. The labourer will take a holding with the desire of rising upon the ladder that is offered to him, and so attaining to some higher position in the social scale, and the main principle of the Bill is to enable such a man to use the power that is given him of becoming the freeholder of his holding independent of the County Council or anybody else. Is not that an ideal which should be on the face of the Bill? Is not that the ideal which the House has set itself to accomplish, and are we going to interfere with that by deliberately introducing words into the Bill which would make it appear as if one of the objects, and one of the chief objects, we had in view was to turn County Councils in this country not merely into instruments for the creation of small holdings, but into gigantic landlords of large districts of small holders holding at a rack rent? I cannot conceive that anybody would desire to see such a proposal as that carried out. For these reasons I hope the Committee will not adopt the Amendment which has been moved.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

SIR W. HARCOURT: Now we have a distinct avowal on the part of the Government that the acquiring of land for the purpose of hiring is not even a secondary object of the Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not admit the right hon. Gentleman's interpretation. I say hiring land is an essential part of the Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then I cannot understand what the argument of the right hon. Gentleman is. The right hon. Gentleman said the purpose of the Bill was to buy, and that if you admit the word "hire" it becomes a secondary object.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A co-equal object.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Very well, co-equal object. But he will not admit the word hire. Therefore, to obtain the co-equal quality, you put in one equal and leave out the other.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Either I must have failed to express myself with lucidity or the right hon. Gentleman cannot have exercised that discriminating criticism on this occasion which he usually gives to his opponents. We say that we regard hiring as a means towards small holders becoming freeholders. If you admit these words, that object would not appear on the face of the Bill, and we desire that it should do so.

SIR W. HARCOURT: We believe that if this Bill is to be of use, it must apply in the multitude of cases where there is no possibility of buying at all. The right hon. Gentleman has put a very plain issue before the House. I will tell him what we are afraid of. If a County Council did not wish to exercise the powers under the Bill, it could say that the majority of the applicants were not people in a position to buy, and those who could buy were so few that it would not be desirable for the Council to acquire land at all for the purposes of the Bill. What, then, becomes of the small people who only desire to hire, knowing perfectly well that that is all they can possibly accomplish? The noble Lord gave the Minister of Agriculture a fair warning as to the result of insisting that this is a Bill for buyers and not hirers of land. That is exactly the issue between us. The speech of the First Lord of the Treasury is a distinct condemnation of the clause as it stands. He wishes to make it clearly understood that the primary and almost exclusive object of the Bill is the purchase of freeholds, and if there is to be any hiring at all it is to be a very secondary object, and only to be regarded so far as it contributes to the primary object. That is a fair issue on which the view of the Committee can be taken.

MR. CHAPLIN: I hope the Committee will now come to a decision on the matter. I regret that after the discussion had been conducted with such good humour, the right hon. Gentleman should have intervened at the time when the Committee were about to arrive at a decision. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that the County Council might take the clause as it stands as an excuse for taking no action. How is it possible for the Council to do anything of the kind, when Clause 4 distinctly lays down that one or more county electors may petition the County Council, alleging that there is a demand for small holdings in the county—it does not say whether for purchase or hire—but, that petition being presented, the clause lays it down as the positive duty of the Council to forthwith appoint a Committee to inquire into the matter, and report to the Council? My right hon. Friend stated, as I have stated over and over again, without objection being taken to it, that the primary object of the Government has been, if possible, to create freeholders instead of tenants. When the proper time comes there are numberless reasons which will be given—reasons which led the Select Committee to agree unanimously with the view that on the whole ownership, however qualified, is preferable to any form of tenancy.

That is the opinion which any body of gentlemen, which has made a full investigation of the question, must unanimously arrive at, if they have any regards for the interests of the Local Authority, and, above all, for the interests of the ratepayers.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I want to tell the Committee what the Minister of Agriculture told the labourers was the object of the Bill. The fact that the Government will not allow the words "or hire" to go into the Bill shows that they have reverted to the Exeter speech of the Prime Minister, that this was a Bill to create yeomen farmers, and that it was to be admitted that it would not do much good to the labourers. The question is, whether words shall be inserted which will enable the Bill to be used for the benefit of poor agricultural labourers, and whether the ladder which has been spoken of shall be the one they desire, or some lofty ideal set up by the First Lord of the Treasury? When the Minister of Agriculture was at Shrewsbury he used these words to the labourers—

"The object of the Bill was to bring about by legislation a wider distribution of land among the people; to attach, if possible, more closely to the land the man who actually worked upon the land and extracted from it the produce which it grew, and to whose exertions the wealth it was made to render was actually primarily owing. It was an honest and genuine attempt to give the labouring classes greater facilities for access to the land than they had hitherto had."

And then the Minister of Agriculture finished by saying—

"It provided for those who had not been able to save money by enabling the Local Authority to procure the land and let it out in small holdings of ten acres at a time."

There was not one word to these labourers about yeomen farmers. The object of the Amendment is that agricultural labourers, in whose interests the Bill is avowedly introduced, should have, at all events, a place in the Bill.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: The peaceful state of the Committee arose from the statement that the right hon. Gentleman was prepared to accept in a broad and liberal spirit the principle of letting. But it was pointed out in dealing with the phraseology of the Bill that Clause 1, the acquiring clause of the Bill, is restricted to buying, and the Committee asked that that restriction should be removed and the clause made to agree with the promise and intentions of the right hon. Gentleman. The Attorney General admitted that the acquiring clause of the Bill, under which alone the County Council can acquire land, was for the purpose of buying. "But," said the Attorney General, "you can get in people who desire to let by a back door." They are to say "We desire to buy;" then, "We are unable to buy;" and then, "We desire to hire," and possibly under that they may come in. Then the First Lord of the Treasury comes in and smashes the whole thing at once. He says, "Our object is primarily, almost exclusively, to sell land to yeoman farmers."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Labourers.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: Yeomen labourers. He maintained that it was to create proprietors, and he would not admit as a secondary purpose the hiring of land except the persons meant ultimately to acquire it. We do not want that. It is an admirable Bill for creating yeoman farmers, but we want it to meet the case of those who wish to hire without the intention of purchasing. The first clause of the Bill is confined to buying the land; we want it to be extended to include the hiring of land, and that is what we are going to divide on.

(11.18.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): It appears to me there is some misunderstanding on one side or the other, but I cannot see any principle involved. If I understand the position of my right hon. Friend and the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), they approve of the proposal to facilitate the creation of peasant proprietors, but they desire that in addition facilities should be given for the creation of small tenancies. I do not understand that they propose that these small tenancies should be encouraged to the same extent as is suggested in connection with small holdings. When the matter was before the Select Committee—and I think the general sense of the House will be with us—we came to the conclusion that nothing could be worse or more injurious to any proposal of this kind than to put the County Council in the position of landlords. This is an important question, and when it was before the Select Committee we thought that nothing could be worse or more injurious than any proposal which would put County Councils in the position of landlords on a large scale. When bad times came they would be put under pressure to reduce rents, and they would not be in the same position as private landlords. It was, therefore, a risky undertaking for County Councils to enter into speculations of that kind. As I understand, it is the desire of hon. and right hon. Members on this side of the House to confine the small tenancies to tenancies of not less than ten acres. This was the recommendation of the Committee of which I had the honour to be Chairman, and it is really only an extension of the Allotments Act. It was felt that it was impossible that labourers could in any numbers avail themselves of a Bill for the creation of small holders, and it was therefore desirable to create tenancies of from one to ten acres. That is what is aimed at on both sides of the House, and in that case there is no question of principle to divide upon. It is a mere question of drafting, and whether the Bill carries out intentions on which both sides of the House are agreed.

Mr. H. H. Fowler

SIR R. WEBSTER: I would point out to hon. Members that to insert the words "or hire" in this clause, without any limit at all, would be to lay it open to the objection that there would be no limit to the tenancies let on hire. The question of hiring only comes in when men are unable to purchase, and consequently the limitation has not to be considered with reference to the larger holdings. Therefore the draftsmanship of the Bill is quite correct. If there is anything that is not clear it can be corrected in the later clause; but to put letting in the forefront of the first clause would be to indicate the desire to let equally with the desire to sell, and would give the idea of the County Council being general landlords. The Bill expresses the general desire to limit letting and hiring to persons who could not purchase, and also to holdings of less than ten acres. If the word "hire" were inserted in this clause it must be immediately followed by limitations, whose proper place is in a later part of the Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I infer from what has just been said by the right hon. Gentleman that if you do not put the words "or hire" into the clause, it will not give County Councils power to acquire land for the purpose of letting holdings of less than ten acres. If the words are inserted, County Councils will then have the power which it is desired to give to them. A more obvious fallacy than the argument of the Attorney General it is impossible to conceive; and as to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, he could hardly have listened to the speech of the First Lord of the Treasury, who put it entirely as a matter of principle. I fail to see why these words should not be put in the Bill.

MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I submit that the Amendment would not be in conflict with the provisions of the Bill.

*MR. HALDANE (Haddington): The Government desire to create a class which we on this side of the House have no desire to establish. The Government desire to create unrestricted freeholds, but we are anxious to create either restricted freeholds, or, if not, leasehold tenures. It seems to me we on this side of the House, including my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chamberlain), do not desire to create the kind of freeholds the Government desire to create. The Government desire to create an absolute freehold tenure under which at the end of ten years, or when the purchase money is paid off, the small holder will be in a position of absolute ownership, free to sell to the neighbouring squire or created limitations in tail male with remainders over. Well, that is not the kind of freehold we desire to create, that is not the kind of freehold my right hon. Friend desires to create. We wish to keep some control in the interest of the public over the land. If we are not to have that control in this case of the new freeholds, at least let us leave the alternative of power to the County Councils to let unrestrictedly. I recognise the difficulty of a County Council having to bear the brunt of bad times and to meet the difficulty of letting, but that is a lesser evil with less risk than attends the plan of the Government to create nothing but absolute freehold tenure. That is not the tenure at which we aim, and at which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham aims. It is because we view with great apprehension the proposal in the Bill to create absolute freehold tenure that we lay great stress on this leasehold alternative. It is not a question of drafting but of principle, even from the point of view of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chamberlain), and it seems to me we must divide on the proposition.

*(11.38.) MR. LAWSON: I cannot be included in those on this side whom the hon. and learned Gentleman says look upon leasehold tenure as the great advantage to be established by the Bill. I have read the evidence given before the Committee, and I am bound to say that every witness deprecated leasehold tenure, except as a necessary evil where small holdings could not otherwise be provided.

MR. HALDANE: I do not say the creation of leaseholds; I say a tenure, subject to conditions restricting the freehold such as was proposed by the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings).

*MR. LAWSON: In voting for the Amendment I support an alternative to purchase which may be necessary for the labourers, but that is not the main object the Bill seeks to promote. I cannot suppose that a County Council will be much better than any other Corporation as a landlord, and it is universal experience that no landlord is so bad as a Corporation, and I do not think it is a public object to establish by Statute in this way.

(11.39.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I just want to say a word on the issue to be decided. This Bill is for the creation of peasant proprietors in all the independence and freedom which cultivating ownership alone can give, and the object, as I take it, of those who support this Amendment is to curtail that principle as much as possible and to create throughout the country a large number of tenants dependent, as the hon. Member below me (Mr. Lawson) has just said, on the very worst class of landlords that can be created. Therefore, it is not an issue of supplying land to the labourer who cannot afford to buy, for that is amply provided for further on in the Bill. The principle upon which we are going to divide is whether we shall maintain the primary object of the Bill to create an independent class of peasant proprietors throughout the country, and at the same time to help those who are not just now in a position to become owners by assisting them to hire a limited amount of land, in order that such land may become what has been termed a ladder upon which they may mount to the position of owners.

Question put.

(11.43.) The Committee divided :—
Ayes 72; Noes 152. — (Div. List, No. 79.)

(11.53.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir W. Foster.)

MR. CHAPLIN : There remain a few minutes we might utilise.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR W. FOSTER : After the decision we have had I do not think the word "occupy" is necessary, and I therefore shall not move my Amendment.

*(11.54.) MR. SEALE-HAYNE : The Amendment I have to propose is similar to that I proposed in the Allotments Bill, to give to the Local Government Board power by Provisional Order to take land compulsorily. I admit at once it is a modified form of compulsory purchase, but the power is not placed directly with the County Council but with the Local Government Board. I believe that a provision of this kind would add very largely to the utility of the Bill. I perfectly agree with the argument of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Chaplin), who said, on introducing the Bill, he wished to add to the number of small freeholders and yeoman farmers, and that he looked with disfavour on the accumulation of land in a few hands. Now, we on this side of the House have frequently advocated measures for remedying this evil, but none of the measures we have advocated have found a place in this Bill. There is no doubt that the custom of primogeniture in this country is one which has led to the accumulation of land in the hands of the few. Then we have the custom of tying up land in settled estates, and that is another great cause of the accumulation of landed property among the few, yet this Bill in no way purposes to deal with such points as these. Then the dearth of transfer makes landed property only suitable for men of large means, another cause of the accumulation of which I speak. We have also on this side of the House advocated the simplification of title, and that does not find a place in the Bill. Instead of removing these anomalies and abuses of the law which have brought the land of this country into its present position and have led to the necessity for introducing a Bill of this kind, the right hon. Gentleman proposes to remedy this evil by what is really a Socialistic measure, a measure for raising money on the security of the rates, and applying it to the purpose of the purchase of land to remedy abuses which have crept in, owing to bad laws, during a long course of years.

Mr. Jesse Collings

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Thursday 28th April.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL [Lords].

(No. 232.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I object.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I hope the hon. Member will not press his objection. Though a small matter in itself, the Bill is of much importance to Scotland.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I withdraw my objection.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (PURCHASE) BILL.—(No. 257.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I object.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I hope the House will allow this Bill to be read a second time. Its only object is to authorise County and Borough Councils to enter into agreement with the lord of the manor for the purchase of the franchise of weights and measures, thus avoiding duplication of authority. I have received very urgent representations in favour of the Bill in reference to the Manor of Wakefield from the West Riding of Yorkshire. I hope we may be allowed to take the Second Reading.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The right hon. Baronet will have ample time to proceed with the Bill as soon as the Irish Local Government Bill is withdrawn.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

ACCESS TO MOUNTAINS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 213.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I object.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I merely rise for the purpose of asking the Lord Advocate to give me information—

MR. KELLY: I object.

DR. FARQUHARSON: The hon. Gentleman is premature; his zeal out-runs his discretion. I am not about to move the Second Reading. I believe I am at liberty to ask a question. I merely wish to ask the Lord Advocate to be good enough to define the position of the Government in regard to the Bill. Are the Government, having accepted the principle, inclined to look with a sympathetic eye upon the Bill as a means of carrying out that principle?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): It may be a question how far the Bill carries out the spirit of the Resolution agreed to by the House, and certainly the Bill cannot pass its Second Reading without discussion.

Second Reading deferred till Monday, 25th April.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 229.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): May I appeal to hon. Members who have objections on points of detail to allow the Bill a Second Reading now?

SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I object.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I hope I may induce my hon. Friend not to press his opposition at this stage. I think the principle of the Bill is a right one, but I think it is carried out in an impracticable manner. I have Amendments to propose, and should not allow the Bill to become law in its present shape; and in order that sufficient time shall be afforded for the consideration of Amendments by those interested in the matter, I hope the hon. Member in charge will not object to placing the Committee for a distant date, when I believe we can put the Bill into such a shape as will avoid those evils of which shipowners are afraid.

SIR E. HARLAND: I am sorry, but I must press my objection to the Second Reading.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS (ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND IRELAND) COMMITTEE.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): It is scarcely carrying out the intention with which the House agreed to a Resolution to appoint this Committee that the Motion should be set down night after night at a time when it cannot be taken. It is two years since it was sanctioned, and it is of vital importance to proceed with the inquiry. Will the right hon. Gentleman agree to take the Motion at a time when the Amendment can be discussed and a decision taken?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I thought I had made a statement which would have been considered satisfactory—to the effect that soon after Easter I would ask my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to arrange that the Motion should come on, say, about eleven o'clock, giving an opportunity to Welsh Members to make their speeches and their protest. I hope an hour or a little longer may be considered sufficient for the purpose, and then I hope the Committee may at once proceed to business.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid) May I ask do the Government propose to keep a House to-morrow evening for the measures standing on the Order Book?

MR. SPEAKER: It is not the opportunity to ask the question now the House is engaged with Unopposed Motions.

MAIL SERVICE (IRELAND) CORRESPONDENCE.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman state the grounds of his opposition to the publication of this correspondence?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): I am not in a position now to state my objection. Should the Motion be brought on earlier in the evening I would be quite prepared to do so.

PRIVATE BILL LEGISLATION (EXPENSES).

Address for Return (Mr. T. M. Healy for Mr. Crilly).

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I must oppose this, so far as it relates to railways; I do not know that it can be given.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I was informed that the Motion was unopposed. Does the right hon. Gentleman observe that in part it is a continuation of Parliamentary Papers already issued, 1886? I can understand the right hon. Baronet desires to score off me, because I opposed his Bill just now; he is welcome to that satisfaction.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The hon. and learned Gentleman should understand that it is my business that only such Returns in which my Department is concerned are given which are proper to be granted.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): Many Members have found these Returns for 1886 very valuable and useful, and I hope, on consideration, this Return will be given.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I must object.

CIVIL SERVANTS (TENURE OF OFFICE BEYOND 65).

Moved for—

"Return of Permanent Civil Servants whose tenure of office has been prolonged beyond the age of 65 years, under the discretionary power vested in the Treasury by Clause 10 of the Order in Council of the 15th day of August, 1890, together with the reasons of such prolongation in each case."—(Sir J. Gorst.)

MR. T. M. HEALY: This, I presume, is the Return granted at my request. I do not know whether it fulfils the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I think it is inconvenient that the Return should be moved, we not seeing the terms of it upon the Paper. It is not possible to follow the terms exactly when we hear them read out for the first time.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): If the hon. Member wishes, I shall be very happy to put it down for the first day after the Recess.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Oh, but I want it. I do not object, but I complain that the terms were not put on the Paper to-day.

Return ordered—

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. [No. 141.]

ADMINISTRATION OF SMALL ESTATES IN CHANCERY.

Order [22nd March] for a Return relative thereto read, and discharged; and, instead thereof,—

ADMINISTRATION OF SMALL ESTATES IN CHANCERY.

Address for—

“Return of all Estates of the gross value of £3,000 and under administered in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice from the 24th day of October 1883 to the 31st day of December 1891, showing (1) the title of the Suit; (2) the date of the Order for administration; (3) the date of final Judgment; (4) the gross value of the Estate, real and personal, dealt with by the Court; (5) the total amount of Debts paid out of the Estate; (6) the total amount of specific Legacies; (7) the total amount of the taxed Costs paid out of the Estate, including Costs of both litigation and administration; (8) the total amount distributed out of the Estate to residuary Legatees, Trustees, personal Representatives, and others entitled.”—(Mr. Duncan.)

RAILWAY RATES AND CHARGES PROVISIONAL ORDER [FESTINIOG, &c.] BILL (by Order).

As amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT (1861) AMEND- MENT BILL [Lords].—(No. 182.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday 25th April.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOT- LAND) BILL.—(No. 230.)

Read a second time, and committed for To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SHERIFF COURTS (SCOTLAND) EX- TRACTS BILL.—(No. 119.)

Considered in Committee, and re-ported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MARRIED WOMEN BILL.—(No. 81.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday 25th April.

GENERAL POLICE AND IMPROVE- MENT (SCOTLAND) ACT (1862) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 183.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday 25th April.

MOTIONS.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDER (NO. 1) BILL.

■ On Motion of Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 to 1890, relating to the Burgh of Govan, ordered to be brought in by Sir M. Hicks Beach and Sir John Gorst.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 271.]

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, relating to Aberystwyth, Ashton-under-Lyne, Halifax, Harwich, Limerick, and Maidstone, ordered to be brought in by Sir M. Hicks Beach and Sir John Gorst.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 272.]

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 3) BILL.

On Motion of Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under the Electric Lighting Acts, 1882 and 1888, relating to Kil-kenny, Newbury, Sutton (Surrey), West Ham, and Woking (Horsell and Chertsey), ordered to be brought in by Sir M. Hicks Beach and Sir John Gorst.

Bill presented, and read first time: [Bill 273.]

METROPOLITAN POLICE PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Stuart-Wortley, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State under "The Metropolitan Police Act, 1836," relating to lands in the parishes of St. Mary-lebone, St. Mary Abbots, Kensington, and All Saints, Poplar, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Stuart-Wortley and Mr. Secretary Matthews.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 274.]

SUPERANNUATION ACTS AMENDMENT (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Sir J. Gorst, Bill to amend the Acts relating to Superannuation Allowances and Gratuities to persons in the Public Service, so far as respects the computation of successive service in different offices, where not all subject to the Superannuation Acts, 1834 to 1887, and as respects the application of section six of "The Superannuation Act, 1887," to employments of profit under the Government of India, ordered to be brought in by Sir John Gorst and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 275.]

POOR LAW SCHOOLS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to provide for expenses incurred by Members of Boards of Management of Poor Law District Schools in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 276.]

ACCUMULATIONS BILL.

On Motion of The Attorney General, Bill to amend the Law respecting Accumulations, ordered to be brought in by the Attorney General and Mr. Solicitor General.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 277.]

CHARITY INQUIRIES BILL.

On Motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Bill to authorise the Councils of Counties and County Boroughs to contribute to the Expenses of Inquiries into certain Charities, ordered to be brought in by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir J. Gorst, and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 278.]

MERCHANT SHIPPING (FISHING BOATS) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Fenwick, Bill to amend the Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Acts, 1883 and 1887, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Fenwick, Mr. Heneage, Mr. Rowntree, and Mr. Burt.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 279.]

CLERGY (WEST INDIES).

Copy presented,—of Return of the Amount payable on the 5th January, 1892, out of the Consolidated Fund for Ecclesiastical Purposes in the West Indies [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

MARRIAGES, BIRTHS, AND DEATHS (ENGLAND).

General Abstract presented,—of Marriages, Births, and Deaths registered in England in 1891 [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACTS, 1873 AND 1888.

Copy presented,—of Third Annual Report of the Railway and Canal Commission, with Appendix [by Command]; to lie upon the Table.

ARMY GUNS (RIFLED, IRON, AND STEEL).

Return presented,—relative thereto [Address 10th March; Mr. Duff]; to lie upon the Table.

EQUIVALENT GRANT (SCOTLAND) DISTRIBUTION.

Return presented,—relative thereto [ordered 6th April; Mr. Hunter]; to lie upon the Table.

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. THOMAS ELLIS: May I ask what will be the Business to-morrow at two o'clock?

SIR J. GORST: The Report of Ways and Means, the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill, the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, the Weights and Measures (Purchase) Bill, the Short Titles Bill, and then the Motion for Adjournment.

DR. TANNER: Is it the intention of the Government to keep a House to-morrow evening? Is there any intention of putting Members to the inconvenience of attending to no purpose?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Certainly not, Sir.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 12th April, 1892.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

FARM SERVANTS WAGES.

MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been directed to recent decisions given in the Sheriff Courts of Forfarshire and neighbouring counties in regard to the administration of the law as between farmers and farm servants on the question of forfeiture of wages; whether any custom entitling farmers without express agreement to retain a portion of the wages agreed to be paid to farm servants during the first six months of a year of service, and to forfeit such portion in the event of the farm servant leaving at the end of the six months, must be immemorial, certain, and invariable both as regards the question of a right on the part of the farmers to retain a part of the wages, but also as to the amount or proportion of the wages so to be retained; and whether, in the present uncertainty of the law, he is prepared, in the interest of agriculture, to introduce any legislation on the subject?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): My attention has only been directed to the decisions referred to by the question of the hon. Member. I do not understand them to have involved any question of forfeiting wages. As I understand it, the farm servants were engaged for twelve months from Martinmas, but no stipulation was made as to paying their wages half-yearly; and I am not aware of any rule of law in such cases that they are to be so paid. It depends on practice or custom. The law as to custom affecting contracts is not uncertain; it is laid down quite clearly in the ordinary text-books. The uncertainty arises in its application to the facts; and if this causes hardship, the parties have the remedy in their own hands by either stipulating when the wages are to be paid or by making the engagement a half-yearly one.

MR. SHIRESS WILL: I think the right hon. Gentleman has not apprehended the second part of my question, as to the custom being certain and invariable?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: That is a pure question of law, upon which I would refer the hon. Member to the text-books.

EDINBURGH AND DUNDEE MAILS.

MR. SHIRESS WILL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will consider whether the Post Office sorting van at present attached to the train leaving Edinburgh at 7 a.m. for Dundee, thus serving Fifeshire and Dundee only, and laying idle at Dundee from about 9 a.m. till about 3.30 p.m., might be continued further to the north, so as to serve Broughty Ferry, Monifieth, Carnoustie, Arbroath, Montrose, and Bervie, or some of these towns?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Although the sorting carriage referred to stops at Dundee, bags are made up in it for places beyond that station—namely, for Broughty Ferry, Carnoustie, and Aberdeen. There will be no objection to bags being made up for Arbroath, Montrose, &c. The letters forwarded in them will not reach Arbroath and Montrose until after the morning delivery has begun, as those towns are served with their principal mails by earlier trains, but will, of course, be available for callers and for subsequent deliveries. The expense involved in running the sorting carriage beyond Dundee would be considerable, and the arrangement would not really be of any practical value.

MERCANTILE MARINE OFFICERS.

MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.) (for Mr. P. O'BRIEN, Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has any objection to give the names of ports in Great Britain and Ireland in which the officers of the Mercantile Marine are required to work seven hours per day, and those in which the hours are six per day; what are the special grounds for the two sets of working hours; and are the officers who work seven hours paid better, and how much; and, if not, whether he can arrange for an all round six hours per day?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The whole question of the hours of attendance at the Mercantile Marine Offices is now under consideration, and I am endeavouring to assimilate as far as possible the conditions of service at all the ports.

POST OFFICE COUNTER DUTIES.

MR. BLANE (for Mr. P. O'BRIEN): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain on what grounds officers employed on counter duties in the Metropolitan post offices are allowed 3s. per week to cover risks of mistakes in cash transactions, while officers in the provinces, whose risks are quite as great, and whose salaries, out of which losses have to be made good, are smaller, are not given any risk allowance; and whether he will see that all officers employed on counter duties are treated alike?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Attendance at the public counter is a recognised part of the duties of a sorting clerk and telegraphist at a provincial office, and the pecuniary risk attaching to this duty has been taken into account in fixing the wages of the class. In London the force employed on counter work is quite distinct from the force employed on sorting duties, and the rates of pay are different. Moreover counter duties in London, as a rule, are performed under much greater pressure than in provincial offices.

VIENNA POSTAL CONFERENCE.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when the proceedings of the Vienna Postal Conference of last year will be laid upon the Table of the House; whether he is aware that these proceedings have been presented to the German Parliament; and whether the record of the proceedings will include a statement of the concessions obtained at Vienna, and referred to by the late Postmaster General as giving this country "a freer hand" in communicating with the British Colonies, apart from the Postal Union; if not, whether he has any objection to append such a statement to the proceedings in question?

Mr. Blane

SIR J. FERGUSSON: It has not been customary to lay before Parliament the proceedings of Postal Congresses. The abridged Report of the proceedings of the Vienna Congress, which is the sole record of these proceedings, is written in the French language, and fills nearly a thousand large pages. It is not thought that this great mass of technical matter and administrative detail would interest the House of Commons. The Convention of Vienna, which was signed on behalf of this country, will doubtless be presented to Parliament in due course by the Treasury, but presumably not till after ratification. This Department has no knowledge of the proceedings having been presented to the German Parliament. The revised Conventions and agreements which were the outcome of the Vienna Congress have been presented. The third paragraph of the question relates to my predecessor's answer to a question on 17th July last on the results of the Vienna Congress. Mr. Raikes said nothing about a "freer hand." He said the Congress had "signed a new Convention, under which Her Majesty's Government will be free in important particulars relative to foreign and colonial postage." If that is the main purport of the question, my hon. Friend may understand that is so.

PARLIAMENTARY REGISTRATION.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why it is the rule in Ireland that working men in boroughs who are duly entitled to be put upon the Parliamentary registers, under the qualification for successive occupation, are compelled to send in a claim, and to attend the Revision Court and prove the said claim, whereas in English boroughs it is usual for the overseers to put on the register persons who are qualified by successive occupation; whether he is aware that the law on this subject was discussed by the Court of Appeal in Ireland in 1889, in the case of "Lyons v. Chambers," when it was decided that the law was the same in Ireland as in England; and whether the 1st sub-section of the 7th section and the 5th sub-section of the 8th section of "The Representation of the People Act, 1884," and the 3rd section of "The Parliamentary Registration Act, 1885," have been, as regards working men changing houses, put into operation in Ireland at all?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): So far as I am aware, there is no rule in Ireland under which working men in boroughs are compelled to send in a claim and attend at the Revision Court, and I may add there is no difference in the registration law between the case of working men and any other class of persons entitled to the franchise. The case of "Lyons v. Chambers" decided that a claim was unnecessary in the case of persons whose qualification depended upon successive occupation. I have no reason to suppose that the persons who are entrusted with the duty of administering or interpreting the Acts mentioned have been neglecting those duties.

MR. BLANE: Does the right hon. Gentleman imply that in the case of qualification by successive occupation persons giving notice to the Town Clerk or Clerk of the Peace get on the register in the same way as in England when notice is given to the overseer?

MR. JACKSON: I understand there is no difference in the law.

MR. BLANE: It is entirely different in practice. I know from 20 years' experience.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Do the authorities carry out the law in the same manner?

MR. JACKSON: As I have said, I have no reason to believe they neglect their duties.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): In the case of "Lyon v. Chambers," did the Court of Appeal intimate that it was not a proper thing to put the person on the register without a claim?

MR. JACKSON: I am advised that the decision was contrary to that.

MR. BLANE: Will the right hon. Gentleman state whether the Statute and practice is not entirely different in England and Ireland?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot answer a general question of that kind. If the hon. Member will give me information as to any specific case I will make inquiries.

"CORDITE" POWDER.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether "Cordite" powder has been patented in any foreign country; and, if so, by whom?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Patents in connection with "Cordite" powder have been taken out abroad by Sir Frederick Abel and Professor Dewar, the inventors, to protect the invention.

MR. BAUMANN, rising later, said: I wish to ask my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether any arrangement has been made between the Secretary of State for War and Sir Frederick Abel as to the profits to be derived from the patent for "Cordite" powder, which, he tells me, has been taken out abroad; whether any agreement has been made as to who is to receive those profits, or whether Sir Frederick Abel himself is to be allowed to take those profits?

MR. BRODRICK: In reply to my hon. Friend, I am not aware of any such arrangement as he suggests. As regards Great Britain the patent is in the hands of the Secretary of State, and I assume that the vendor would be in the same position abroad as any other vendor.

FRANCE AND ENGLAND IN WEST AFRICA.

MR. BAUMANN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state in what month of 1885 Sahnadoo's messenger made the statement to Major Festing, asking, on his master's behalf, that the Queen should take his territories under Her protection; whether Major Festing, in his private Report, alluded to this offer; and when this Report was received in London?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The statement was made to Major Festing on 25th August, 1885, at Freetown. I do not know to what Report my hon. Friend refers in the second paragraph of his question; but, as I stated yesterday in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for the Abercromby Division, the statement was not reported to Her Majesty's Government by Sir S. Rowe until June, 1886.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in any official Papers accessible to the public, there is any account of the late Major Festing's journey or journeys to the interior of the Sierra Leone district; what are the dates of Major Festing's departure or conclusion of his Mission or Missions; and whether the time has arrived when his Report may be published; and, if not, whether the Foreign Office will permit of the publication of such parts of his itinerary as are of general interest?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The reply to the first paragraph of the question is in the negative. Major Festing left Freetown on his first Mission on 8th March, 1887, and arrived there on his return on 22nd April. On the second occasion he left Freetown on 18th January, 1888, and died at Sininkoro in the Sangara country on 17th August. There will be no objection to present to Parliament extracts from his Report on his first journey. Major Festing died before making a Report on his second journey.

THE MURDER OF INSPECTOR MARTIN.

MR. BLANE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can give the names of the prisoners from Donegal who were sentenced at the Special Commission held at Maryborough in 1889, and the names of those now in prison or penal servitude; whether any arrangement was made between prisoners' counsel and the counsel for the Crown; and, if so, what was the nature of it; if he is aware that some of those Donegal peasants did not understand in the English language the nature of the charge to which they were invited to plead guilty, or the likely consequences of such pleading; and whether, in view of the whole circumstances of the trial of those Donegal peasants at the Special Commission at Maryborough, Her Majesty's Government would terminate, after more than three years, the imprisonment of those men?

MR. JACKSON: Fifteen persons were sentenced at Maryborough in 1889, in connection with the trial arising out of the murder of District-Inspector Martin, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, County Donegal. Of the accused, eleven were sentenced to terms of imprisonment ranging from two to six calendar months, which sentences have long since expired; and four are still in custody, as follows:—William Coll, ten years' penal servitude; Patrick Roarty, seven years' penal servitude; Dominick Rogers, seven years' penal servitude; Connell Magee, five years' penal servitude. The Government are not aware of any arrangement being made between the prisoners and the counsel for the Crown; nor are they aware whether any of the convicted persons were unable to speak English; but, as a matter of fact, an interpreter was employed in Court who interpreted the evidence of the witnesses. The cases of these convicts have been recently under the consideration of the Lord Lieutenant, who sees no reason to interfere with the due course of the law.

MR. BLANE: Am I to understand that counsel made no arrangement with the counsel for the Crown similar to that which is made every day at the Old Bailey and Sessions in England?

MR. JACKSON: The Government have no information on that subject.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say was not William Coll, a Catholic peasant, not being able to speak a word of English, brought from Donegal to Maryborough, when he was tried by a special jury constituted from a panel of 117, of which 44 were asked to stand aside by the Crown, and is he aware that these 44 were all Catholics, and was not this Catholic peasant Coll tried by an exclusively Protestant jury?

MR. JACKSON: I have no knowledge on these points.

MR. MAC NEILL: I have actual knowledge.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Is it not a fact that an arrangement was made by the then Attorney General and now Lord Chief Justice? What was the nature of this arrangement under which the liberties of these men were bargained away? Yes, unquestionably bargained away. Every honest man in Donegal believes it at this day. If the right hon. Gentleman will not give me an answer now I must press this in discussion on the Estimates.

MR. JACKSON: I have given all the information I have on the subject.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: From the Lord Chief Justice?

MR. MAC NEILL: With a view to the consideration of all the circumstances, may I call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that before the Court of Appeal it was decided by the vote of one Judge that evidence brought against William Coll was not illegal?

MR. JACKSON: I understand that the Court of Appeal decided against the prisoner, and if that is so I cannot go behind that decision.

NATIONAL GALLERY REPORT.

MR. JAMES (Gateshead): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury why the Report of the Directors of the National Gallery for 1891 has not been presented; and how soon it will be laid upon the Table?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): This Report was laid on the Table on 21st of last month and is now being printed.

RIFLE RANGES.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he will consider whether a suitable rifle range could be found on Salisbury Plain, where the land is exceedingly cheap and sparsely populated, instead of taking the proposed 800 acres for that purpose in the New Forest?

MR. BRODRICK: Sites on Salisbury Plain have been examined, but pending the result of the inquiry into the proposed New Forest range, which will be resumed next week, we are not in a position to enter into the discussion of other sites.

THE CONVICT EGAN.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet re-considered the circumstances of the conviction of Mr. Egan, now confined in Portland Prison; and whether he has decided to order his release?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have re-considered this case. The time has not yet arrived when it would be possible to advise any mitigation of the sentence.

SECONDARY EDUCATION GRANT, SCOTLAND.

MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if before the Easter Recess he will lay upon the Table a Memorandum setting forth in general terms the principles on which it is proposed to distribute the grant for secondary education in Scotland; whether in reducing the average fee of £3 it will be permissible to include children under 13; and whether it is expected that most of the schools now examined as secondary schools could afford so to reduce their fees as a necessary condition for receiving any share of the grant?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I will to-day lay on the Table a Memorandum setting forth in general terms the principles on which it is proposed to distribute any grant which may be allowed for secondary education in Scotland. This will be placed in the printer's hands at once for distribution on the earliest day possible. In these circumstances, it is perhaps better that I should refrain from any further statement at present as to the proposals.

SMALL ARMS FACTORY, ENFIELD.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he will state what amount was paid in wages at the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield, day work and piece work respectively, on the last pay day in March and first pay day in April, 1891, and what amounts for the corresponding periods this year, and the number of men engaged piece and day work on these dates respectively?

MR. BRODRICK: On the last pay day in March, 1891, the number of men engaged on day work at the factory was 1,029, and the amount paid in wages was £2,566; the number of men engaged on piece work for the same date was 1,765, and the amount paid in wages £2,779. On the first pay day in April, 1891, the number of men engaged on day work was 1,023, and the amount paid in wages £1,068; on piece work for the same date the number of men engaged was 1,759, and the wages paid amounted to £1,000. On the last pay day in March, 1892, the number of men engaged on day work was 990, and the amount paid in wages £1,916; on piece work, number of men engaged 1,268, and amount paid in wages £2,139. On the first pay day in April, 1892, the number of men engaged on day work was 988, and amount of wages paid £1,324; on piece work, number of men engaged 1,157, and amount paid in wages £1,598. Some disturbance was caused in the figures for 1891 by the Easter holidays.

EXCISE OFFICERS.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what reply has been made to the petition of the Excise officers sent in May last to the Board of Inland Revenue for transmission to the Treasury?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Treasury in 1890 improved the Excise service at a large cost to the public. They did not, however, think it right to grant the request of the Excise officers that classification should be abolished, not so much on financial grounds, as because they are convinced of the great importance of classification for the proper discipline and regulation of this and other great branches of the Service, and for the due carrying out of the system of promotion by merit—which has always been pursued by the Board of Inland Revenue. The Memorial to which the hon. Member refers repeats this request for the abolition of classification, and, after considering the matter further with the Board of Inland Revenue, the Treasury is unable to modify the previous decision.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH JAMAICA.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, before agreeing to grant an annual subsidy to the Halifax and Bermuda Cable Company for laying a cable to Jamaica, this House will be given an opportunity to express its views on this matter? I may mention that I ask this question of the right hon. Gentleman at the desire expressed by the Under Secretary for the Colonies.

SIR J. GORST: My right hon. Friend has asked me to reply to this question. He is not aware of any proposal having been made to the Treasury for any such subsidy.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Well, Sir, I am sent from "pillar to post." The Under Secretary to the Colonies told me yesterday he was aware of such a proposal, and advised me to apply to the First Lord for information about it.

SIR J. GORST: No such proposal has reached the Treasury.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): Will the right hon. Gentleman say, can such a subsidy be given without a contract being laid on the Table for the assent of the House?

SIR J. GORST: I do not like to answer a legal question, but I should say it could not without the contract being laid on the Table, as all such contracts are.

THE MANORHAMILTON GUARDIANS ELECTION.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Local Government Board for Ireland has been called to the decisions given by the Returning Officer of the Manorhamilton Union at two of the recent Poor Law elections in that Union; whether he is aware that the Returning Officer recorded votes in favour of the Nationalist candidates on informal statements of claim; whether he is aware that the Returning Officer omitted to issue voting papers to voters entitled to same, and, in the absence of the police, employed an inexperienced person to distribute and collect voting papers in the town of Manorhamilton, in consequence whereof voting papers were in some cases mislaid; and that the Returning Officer permitted certain persons interested in the elections to have access to the proxy papers, statements of claim, and other documents of a private nature lodged by various persons, without their first having obtained permission of the Board of Guardians in the usual way; and whether the Irish Local Government Board will, under the circumstances, declare the said elections void, and will, in the event of new elections being held, appoint an experienced Returning Officer?

MR. SEXTON: In connection with this question, before the right hon. Gentleman answers, I would ask him is it a fact that, after the elections were over, one of the defeated Conservative candidates moved, and his solicitor seconded, a vote of thanks to the Returning Officer for his conduct in this election, commending him in particular for his ability and impartiality in conducting the election?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member will see that it is quite impossible for me to answer that question. As regards the question on the Paper, the Local Government Board have received communications containing the objections to the return of Guardians for the Manorhamilton Union. The Returning Officer states that he did not act in the manner indicated in the second paragraph of the question; that he omitted to issue voting papers in four cases, but the persons subsequently claimed them, and duly voted. The services of the police not being available the Returning Officer was employed in accordance with the general instructions laid down in such cases. No voting paper was mislaid, nor did he permit persons interested to act as alleged. The objections made to the Local Government Board are still under consideration.

DESTITUTE IRISH POOR.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of the resolution passed by the Board of Guardians of Newtownards Union, in which they protest against the law of Scotland which enables the Scottish authorities to return the destitute Irish poor to Ireland who have worked all their lives in Scotland, and whether he proposes to take any, and, if so what, steps in the matter?

MR. JACKSON: A copy of the resolution referred to has been received by the Local Government Board. In regard to the general subject I fear I can add nothing to my reply to a similar question put to me on the 4th March last.

MR. McCARTAN (Down, S.): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that this poor Irishman was deported from Scotland to the workhouse at Newtownards, where he has since died; and whether, after spending a lifetime in Scotland, he was not at the time of his deportment in a dangerous state of health; and whether the Guardians did not concur that his death was caused by his removal; and whether steps will be taken to prevent a recurrence of this incident?

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid that no steps can be taken which would prevent a recurrence. The man though he had lived in Scotland some years had not obtained a settlement, and, therefore, he could not be admitted into a Scotch workhouse.

ENGINEERS IN THE NAVY.

MR. PENN (Lewisham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, as reported in the Times newspaper of 6th April, it is true that the engine-room complements are being reduced at the rate of 30 per cent.; whether it is intended to deprive the whole of the cruisers of the Pallas class of the services of an assistant engineer; whether the artificers in the Bellona and Barham have been reduced from six to three, the difference being made good by chief stokers; whether in the Phæbe the number of engineer officers has been decreased from four to two, and the artificers from nine to seven; whether the number of artificers in the Royal Sovereign has been reduced from 18 to 12; and whether these reductions are made by reason of the dearth of officers and artificers?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The statement that engine-room complements have been generally reduced by 30 per cent. is wholly untrue. A recent investigation of the requirements of this branch of the Service has resulted in a net reduction over the whole Fleet of 4 per cent.; but this reduction has been generally confined to the older ships, there being an increase in the complements of the modern ships. The reduction proposed in certain grades are approximately as stated, it being the intention to substitute chief stokers for engine-room artificers where experience shows that the alteration can be beneficially effected. The general scheme of engine-room complements has not been thoroughly revised for some time. The present suggestions are entirely based on their own intrinsic merit and the most recent experience, and have been in no way influenced by the supposed deficiency or redundancy of any of the existing lists of officers, artificers, or stokers.

THE IRISH MAILS.

MR. T. J. HEALY (Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General why the Postal Authorities consider the morning mail train from Dublin to Wexford the less important, seeing that all the English letters are carried by that train; whether he is aware that the only other mail train from Dublin to Wexford takes nine hours to perform a journey of 92 miles; and whether he is prepared to advise any increase towards the acceleration of the mail train which carries the English mails?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The morning mail train from Dublin to Wexford conveys about half the volume of correspondence conveyed by the evening mail train, and for that reason was referred to as the less important of the two. It is true that the night mail is about nine hours on the road, there being a break in the journey, but the train reaches Wexford at the conveniently early hour of 5 a.m. It is feared that it would be useless to reopen negotiations for an acceleration of the day mail train.

MR. T. J. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the paragraph which refers to the contribution?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I have answered that several times already, to the effect that unfortunately the service is carried on at a loss, and, therefore, I cannot ask the Treasury to make any contribution.

POLICE DUTY IN IRELAND.

MR. T. J. HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, at the fair held in the town of Gorey on the 2nd instant, ten policemen in plain clothes were guarding the planters who have taken the evicted farms in Coolgreany; why the police were guarding these men; and what was the cost of the extra police required for this duty?

MR. JACKSON: The Constabulary authorities report that it is the case that policemen in plain clothes were on duty at the fair mentioned, but it is not the case that they were watching the tenant farmers referred to. There was no extra cost involved by the duty beyond the subsistence allowance and travelling expenses, amounting in all to the sum of £1 16s.

MR. T. J. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what was the necessity for guarding these men?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir, I cannot say that.

MR. T. J. HEALY: Are we to understand that these men were boycotted?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member must understand nothing but what I have said.

OUTRAGES ON WOMEN IN TRAINS.

MR. ERNEST SPENCER (West Bromwich): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the attempted outrages upon women whilst travelling by railway, he will take steps to compel Railway Companies to provide all classes of trains with compartments exclusively for the use of women, and also a method of communication with the guard in all local and stopping trains as well as expresses?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not think I can usefully add anything to the reply I gave to a question put to me on this subject on the 4th of last month by the hon. Member for West Waterford. I then stated that I was not aware of any general deficiency in the accommodation for women travelling alone, and that none such was disclosed in the correspondence presented to Parliament in 1888. It often happens that women prefer not to travel in the carriages specially reserved for them. Efficient means of communication are now required by Statute to be provided in the case of all passenger trains which travel more than 20 miles without stopping, and, as at present advised, I am not prepared to propose an extension of the law.

SOUTH KENSINGTON MUSEUM.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can now state to the House what arrangements the Government intend to make to meet the urgent necessities of science teachers at South Kensington; and whether he will appoint an Inter-Departmental Committee, including the Professors of Science at South Kensington, to consider the plans of the future buildings and the best means of utilising the available space?

MR. GOSCHEN: The first part of the question of the hon. Gentleman should be addressed either to my right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works or to my right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Education Department. With regard to the second, it is a matter upon which I am not able to give an answer, as I should have to consult upon the matter with the President of the Council; but I may say at once that I should not be satisfied that the Professors of Science alone should form a committee to consider the plans of the future building and the best means of utilising the available space.

DR. FARQUHARSON: May I call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the word "including" in the question?

MR. GOSCHEN: It is quite right that the professors should be consulted, and I hope we shall be able to satisfy the wishes of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Has anything been done yet with a view of securing tenders?

MR. GOSCHEN: My hon. Friend should address his question to the First Commissioner of Works.

DR. FARQUHARSON rising later, said: May I ask the Vice President of the Council if he can answer the last part of Question 11, namely, whether he will appoint an Inter-Departmental Committee, including the Professors of Science at South Kensington, to consider the plans of the future buildings and the best means of utilising the available space?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Without notice I think I cannot answer the question.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN THE BANDON DISTRICT.

MR. MORROGH (Cork, S.E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the day postal service between Bandon and Kilbrittain, and vice versa, could be served by a runner, thereby giving the inhabitants of Kilbrittain as much time as they have under present arrangements between arrival and departure of the day mail; and, if so, will he waive the objection (set forth in his letter of 11th March, 1892) to altering the postal arrangements as requested by the inhabitants of Timoleague and Courtmacsherry? The hon. Gentleman also asked if the right hon. Gentleman has received a Petition from the inhabitants of Courtmacsherry, County Cork, asking that the day mails at present sent by car from Bandon to Courtmacsherry, and vice versa, should be sent by the Timoleague and Courtmacsherry Railway; is he aware that such change would greatly facilitate the business of traders and inhabitants of the district, by giving them extra time to answer letters between the arrival and departure of the mails; and have the Railway Company offered to carry the day mails at a price much lower than is at present paid for the service? The hon.

Gentleman further asked the right hon. Gentleman if he has read a copy of resolutions passed at a meeting of the traders and inhabitants of Timoleague, County Cork, asking for improvement in the postal service between Bandon, Timoleague, and Courtmacsherry, and vice versa, requesting that the day mails should be sent by rail instead of road, as at present; is he aware that large weekly markets, and important monthly fairs, are held in the town; and in view of these facts, and the general requirements of the district, will he grant the increased postal facilities asked for?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The matters mentioned in the three questions put down by the hon. Member are now being further considered, and, as soon as a final decision can be come to, the hon. Member shall be informed of it.

KINSALE TOWN AND PIER.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Board of Works are yet in a position to furnish the Kinsale Town and Harbour Authorities with full details of the expenditure on the Kinsale Pier and works; whether the Board will state why the contractor, who originally contracted to perform the work, was released from the contract; and what amount, if any, has been charged against the Town and Harbour Commissioners owing to the non-performance of the first contract?

SIR J. GORST: As I stated on the 25th February, I am informed that the Board of Works have not refused any information to the Local Authorities. No loss was caused by the first contractor's failure to carry out his contract, except to himself.

MR. MORROGH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the refusal of the Board to grant the Provisional Order sought by the Kinsale Town and Harbour Commissioners will result in compelling the Commissioners to strike an increased rate of 2s. in the £1 for many years to come; and is he aware that many of the principal objectors to the Order have now abandoned their opposition to it; and, if so, will he undertake to re-consider the matter?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: As I have already stated, in reply to the hon. Member for North Cork, I am fully aware of the circumstances in which the application for the Kinsale Provisional Order was made. No intimation has been made to the Board of Trade by any objector to the Order that his opposition has been withdrawn. I have directed a public local inquiry to be held at Kinsale by one of my officers on the 21st instant, when the objectors, and all those interested in the proposed increase of harbour dues, will have an opportunity of expressing their views.

SENIORITY IN THE CUSTOMS.

MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether a Memorial, addressed to the Lords of the Treasury and bearing on a question of seniority, and which was forwarded on 9th March last to the Board of Customs for transmission to their Lordships, by certain second-class examining officers who had been formerly second-class outport clerks, had been received by their Lordships?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am informed by the Board of Customs that they are unable to support the Memorial in question, and that, therefore, they have not forwarded it to the Treasury.

SCOTLAND AND THE LABOUR COMMISSION.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a Special Commissioner has yet been appointed by the Labour Commission to inquire into the condition of farm servants in Scotland; and will the said Commissioner hold sittings at the different agricultural centres and at other suitable places throughout the rural districts in Scotland?

SIR J. GORST: No such Commissioner for Scotland has yet been appointed by the Labour Commission.

Mr. Morrogh

SENTENCE ON A POACHER.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate, with reference to the case of the son of a crofter, who, on 29th March, pleaded guilty to a charge of night poaching before the Sheriff Substitute at Nairn, is he aware that the accused's father is 72 years of age, and very frail, and that his son now in prison is, in point of fact, his sole support, and that the whole district had been covered with snow, accompanied by a severe frost, for more than two months when the offence was committed; also, that the previous charge made against the accused of poaching took place about 20 years ago; is he aware that when the accused was first charged with the present offence at Nairn on 26th March, he pleaded not guilty, that he was then sent to Inverness Prison for three days, and that he pleaded guilty when again brought up at Nairn on the 29th, in consequence of messages received through his brother from the Procurator Fiscal, stating that, if he did not do so, an additional charge—namely, of assault, would be preferred against him, whereby his punishment would be increased; is he aware that the Judge stated from the Bench that the law gave him no option to pass any sentence on the accused other than imprisonment, and to find caution; and whether he will make further inquiry, and, if the above statements are substantiated, take any steps which may be open to him for a revision of the sentence?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It does not rest with me to revise the sentence; but if the hon. Member will be good enough to communicate to me the information in his possession and the source of it, I will gladly consider whether it is a case for further inquiry.

BOARD SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION AT TOTTENHAM.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the School Board for Tottenham has been authorised by the Department to reckon its school accommodation at eight square feet instead of ten per child in average attendance; whether he is aware that in Noel Park School under that Board the girl's department with places for 400 at ten square feet, or 500 at eight square feet, has had recently 667 on the register, with an average attendance of 556 during one week, a highest attendance of 580, and an average for the whole of last quarter of 511; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the circumstances, and discourage such overcrowding?

SIR W. HART DYKE: The hon. Member is probably aware that the question of the school accommodation has for some time been urgent at Tottenham, and that the Department recently took the extreme step of declaring the School Board in default. The present Board is working energetically to repair the neglect of its predecessor, and it is only pending the supply of the deficiency in the neighbourhood of the Noel Park School that the Department has, under the power given by Article 85 of the Code, temporarily sanctioned the accommodation in the girls' school being calculated at eight instead of ten square feet. I am not aware that the school has been crowded to the extent which the hon. Member believes, but the grant will be endangered if the average attendance for the year is allowed to exceed 500.

MR. PICTON: For how long has the rule been suspended?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I cannot say without inquiry the exact time, but some months at all events.

MR. PICTON: Is accommodation being provided now?

SIR W. HART DYKE: Yes; we are getting on as quickly as possible.

THE MOVEMENTS OF TROOPS.

MR. THEOBALD (Essex, Romford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the statement in one of the daily papers that the 2nd Battalion Essex Regiment, the 56th Pompadours, have, since the year 1800, been at home only 15 years; and, if so, whether arrangements could now be made for them to return to England this year (after ten years' service in the Mediterranean) instead of being sent on to either India or Singapore as at present contemplated?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): The statement referred to is not correct. The 2nd Battalion of the Essex Regiment has been at home for 26 years in the present century. There are 31 battalions now abroad, which went on foreign service before the 2nd Battalion Essex Regiment; and, having in view the necessity of relieving battalions by their sister battalions, it would disturb the roster too much to bring it home so long before its turn.

THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can engage that the Indian Councils Bill will not be taken before the 28th instant, in order that Members interested in it may be able to be present?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): No; I am afraid I cannot enter into any engagement of the kind referred to in the question of the hon. Member, because I hope to be able to take the Indian Councils Bill on Monday week, that measure not being, in my opinion, a contentious one.

THE CONVICTION OF ANARCHISTS AT STAFFORD ASSIZES.

MR. DARLING (Deptford) had the following Question on the Paper:—To ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to attacks upon Mr. Justice Hawkins and others whose duty necessitated their taking part in the conviction and punishment of certain persons tried at the last Assizes at Stafford for being in possession of bombs and other explosives intended to be used for criminal purposes; if he has considered whether the attacks made in a newspaper called Commonweal constitute a criminal offence; and whether it is the intention of the Government to prosecute the publishers and printers of such attacks as incite to the murder of those who are engaged in the administration of justice, in view of the attempts by Anarchists to murder Judges in France? The hon. Member said:—I have a Question upon the Paper addressed to the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General, but I do not see the Attorney General present. Perhaps I might ask either the First Lord of the Treasury or the Home Secretary whether his attention has been called to the attacks made by an Anarchist newspaper upon those who are called upon to administer justice in regard to the Anarchists in this country, and whether these attacks will be permitted to go unpunished, or whether the law of the land will be put in force against those who make them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General is not in his place, and I am sorry to say I cannot answer the question.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury in what order he proposes to take the business on the Paper to-day in relation to the Motion for Adjournment for the holidays?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government have no choice but to take business in the order in which it stands on the Paper. The Motion for the Adjournment will be made after the Government Orders have been disposed of. The Orders as they appear on the Paper cannot be departed from.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman did not understand my question. I wished to know at what hour he intends to make the Motion for the Adjournment over the holidays?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I think we ought to be able to make the Motion for Adjournment about half-past five o'clock.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to ask the Government if they are serious in putting down for the Committee stage to-day a Bill containing over 500 clauses—the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill? Do they intend us to deal with a Bill of this enormous magnitude before the Motion for the Adjournment is made? The usual practice is for the Government to make the Motion for the Adjournment at the commencement of Public Business, and I may say that I have given notice that it is my intention, on the Motion being made, to call attention to the conduct of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland in connection with the candidature of an Irish Conservative.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have directly followed precedent in this matter. The hon. and learned Gentleman should know that the invariable practice has been not to put down the Motion for Adjournment over the holidays first, but to take some business before it. The particular Scotch Bill which has been referred to only passed the Second Reading yesterday, and if any desire is expressed by the Scotch Members for longer time to consider it that desire will certainly be acceded to by the Government, and we should not think of pressing the Bill. The Bill is a very long one, but hon. Members on both sides are agreed upon many of its conditions and we hoped it might pass to-day. There will, however, be no attempt to force the House to discuss a measure of this character. With regard to the other measures they ought not to take up much time; and as to the speech of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, I think an hour and a half ought to be enough for its discussion. Beside this, the House will only take non-contentious business.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman reconsider his decision about the Indian Councils Bill? There are Amendments to it of very considerable importance, and if he presses it on Monday he will not facilitate business.

MR. LABOUCHERE: What business is to be taken on the first Monday after the Recess?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My intention is to take a number of non-contentious Bills on Monday. The Burgh Police (Scotland) Bill is to be put down first, and probably the Indian Councils Bill. I entirely sympathise with the point of view of some hon. Members with respect to this measure; but something must be put down for the first day that we meet, whether it be Supply or a Bill, and as it requires some discussion it may perhaps be inconvenient to have it put down for that day. Neither theory nor practice seems in favour of putting down Supply, and I have endeavoured to put down non-contentious business.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I understand, then, that effective Supply will not be put down for Monday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not as the first or second Order.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): Has it not been the practice of the House not to take Scotch business the first day after the Recess, especially if that day is a Monday? If a Scotch Bill is put down for Monday, the Scotch Members will have to travel on Sunday, because many of us have to come over 500 miles.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I agree that it would be more convenient if possible to take wholly non-contentious business than such Scotch Business as the hon. Gentleman refers to; but, as the hon. Gentleman is aware, this is an important Bill, which Scotch Members are very anxious to pass, and which is not a Bill that requires great discussion, and which might be squeezed out altogether if I did not take every opportunity of pushing it forward. In the interests of the Scotch Members themselves, and of the constituencies which they represent, I would therefore ask them, if possible, to deal with this Bill on the first Monday on which we sit after the Recess. The hon. Gentleman will see that this course is proposed to be taken not so much in the interest of the Government as in the interest of the Scotch Members themselves.

IRISH BUSINESS.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can give us some idea of the course of Irish Business in the first week after the Recess. I do not ask about the Irish Local Government Bill because it now possesses only a historic interest. But I should like to know whether the Irish Education Bill is likely to be proceeded with, and the Second Reading taken in the first week after the Recess; and any Irish Supply?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think we propose that any Irish Business should be taken that week, unless, perhaps, with the possible exception of the Bill in Committee on the financial relations between the two countries.

The first Order of the Day on Thursday will be the discussion on the Budget-in Committee. But with that exception we shall neither take Irish Estimates nor Debates on Irish Bills.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I should also like to make an appeal to the First Lord of the Treasury with regard to the Criminal Law Amendment Bill, and would ask him not to take that Bill in the first week after the Recess.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to the appeal of the hon. Gentleman I wish to say I am ready to give way to it. I hope after the time that will elapse he will not require long notice to be given of the day on which it is to be taken.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman.

THE BUDGET STATEMENT.

SIR W. B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North-West): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would have the additional figures, which he gave the House last night, inserted in the statement which the right hon. Gentleman had got printed and placed in the hands of hon. Members last night? There are two columns in that statement not filled up.

MR. GOSCHEN: Certainly, I will take care that that shall be done.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Resolution [11th April] reported.

"That, instead of the Duty on Wine imposed by 'The Customs (Wine Duty) Act, 1888,' there shall be charged and paid the Duty following (that is to say):—

Sparkling Wine imported in bottle . the gallon . two shillings.

This Duty is to be paid in addition to the Duty in respect of alcoholic strength payable under 'The Customs Amendment Act, 1886,' and without reduction."—(The Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

(3.5.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): On that point I should like to ask for some further information from the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am in favour of ad valorem duties, and I think there should be some proportion between the cost of articles and the duties paid by them. I know that the right hon. Gentleman is opposed to ad valorem duties. In the case of the best champagne, for instance, and the best cigars, the duties should be proportionately higher than on the less expensive descriptions. I think the dearer wines and alcohol should pay a greater duty in proportion to the cost, and that this differential duty should entirely disappear.

(3.6.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Gentleman suggests that I am opposed to ad valorem duties. I am not so entirely opposed to the principle of ad valorem duties; but in practice I regret very much my experience shows a difficulty in carrying it out in these particular cases. With regard to wines, the difficulty is in ascertaining the exact value. Some persons say wine ought to be valued at the selling price. What is the selling price of wine? It is extremely difficult on the one hand to ascertain what the price is between the importer and the exporter; and, on the other hand, it is extremely difficult to ascertain the true market value. The hon. Gentleman suggests that the cheaper champagne is chiefly consumed by the middle classes, but I am inclined to think that the cheap wine is to a large extent ultimately sold as a very dear wine. The hon. Gentleman is not right in saying that I am opposed to ad valorem duties; but it has been a source of anxiety to me for a considerable time how to devise the means of charging dear wine a higher duty than the cheaper sort, and so to make the change which he asks me now to make.

(3.7.) MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has not found that he has committed what I may call an international blunder in setting up a differential duty which operates chiefly against the French producer. I cannot understand why this champagne should have a higher duty imposed upon it than the Johannisbergs, and the more expensive clarets and burgundies which come into this country. Champagne originally paid half-a-crown, but now, by the operation of the system which the right hon. Gentleman introduced, good champagne pays 5s. and inferior champagne pays 3s. 6d. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he cannot see his way to retrace his footsteps and go back to the principles of his youth, and adopt Free Trade pure and simple?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

(3.8.) MR. GOSCHEN: It is only by the courtesy of the House that I am allowed to answer the hon. Gentleman. I cannot for one moment admit that I made a huge mistake in imposing the duty on champagne. It must be remembered that it was imposed upon a foreign article which is distinctly one of luxury. Four years ago the House declined to allow me to charge higher duties on the sale of Rhine wines and clarets as well. The House thought fit to differ from me on that point; and we may conceive what would have been the result of that higher duty on all these wines from the fact that this duty on champagne has for the last four years running produced £150,000 a year.

Resolution agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Courtney, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Sir J. Gorst.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL [LORDS]
—(No. 232.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

*(5.9.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to move

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that it have power to further amend section fifty-eight of 'The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878,' by enabling county road boards, under certain conditions, to construct and maintain roads and bridges for the benefit of their county within the territory of a neighbouring county, provided the consent of the County Council of the latter county be first obtained."

In explanation of this Instruction I may state that, with regard to the more remote portion of the counties in Scotland, it often occurs that a county or part of a county requires an outlet, say to a railway station, and in order to get that outlet it has to traverse a portion of the territory of the neighbouring county. As the law now stands there is no power for the county requiring the outlet to construct and maintain a road or bridge in the territory of the neighbouring county. I think it will be granted that such a power is desirable, and I therefore move this Instruction without further comment.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that it have power to further amend Section 58 of 'The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878,' by enabling County Road Boards, under certain conditions, to construct and maintain roads and bridges for the benefit of their county within the territory of a neighbouring county, provided the consent of the County Council of the latter county be first obtained."
—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)

*(3.12.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews, Universities): In assenting to this Instruction as a reasonable one, I only desire to say that I do so in the belief that it will not in any way delay the Bill, which is one of considerable urgency.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

*(3.15.) MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): I understand that this clause is to enable the County Council to approve of a resolution to re-build any bridge that may be destroyed or seriously injured by flood, fire, or other sudden calamity, at any meeting called for the purpose. Would not the right hon. Gentleman make some change with regard to the meetings at which the Resolutions are to be approved?

*(3.16.) SIR C. J. PEARSON: I could not assent to the hon. Member's suggestion. The October meeting is the one at which the Road Trustees transact their important business, and it was thought right in 1889 that that meeting should be retained as one for the ordinary business of the county; and this Bill, while accepting that situation, introduces a special meeting by special notice only for the purposes set forth in Clause 1—that is to say, for the purpose of dealing with the cases of bridges which have been destroyed by flood, fire, or other sudden calamity. I could not now assent to make a change generally, because I think there is a great deal to be said against allowing the repair or the re-building of bridges, which has for a long time been in contemplation, to be the subject of special meetings. These matters might well be relegated to the October meeting.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

New Clause—

"Notwithstanding the terms of Sub-section 16 of the Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889, any assessment leviable under Section 58 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, for the re-building of bridges destroyed or injured as in the preceding sections mentioned may be imposed and levied as the County Council may determine, either on the county (subject to the provisions as to the insular districts contained in the said section) or on the district or districts within which such bridge is situate, partly on the county and partly on such district or districts, and such assessments shall be paid one-half by the proprietor and the other half by the tenant or occupier of the land and heritages on which the same shall be imposed, provided that nothing in the Local Government (Scotland) Act or this Act shall prejudice the power of borrowing for the purpose of such re-building conferred by Section 58 of the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878, and any assessment in respect of such borrowing may be imposed and shall be payable as under the section before mentioned,"—(The Lord Advocate.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I wish to ask the Lord Advocate whether the effect of the clause will be to make any difference in the incidence of rating between owners and occupiers?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: No, Sir. I am not aware that the clause will have any such effect. It will give the County Council power to lay the cost of re-building the bridge upon the district within which it is situated, and to confer upon them the power to lay the cost partly on the county and partly on the district.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added to the Bill.

New Clause—

"Where the Road Board of a county shall, with the approval of the County Council, enter into an agreement with the County Council or

Sir C. J. Pearson

Road Board of an adjoining county for the construction of any new road or bridge, under Section 58 of 'The Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Act, 1878,' and the portion of the new road or bridge situate in the latter county shall be made and maintained for the benefit of the former county, it shall be competent to impose and levy the assessment for defraying the expense of the construction and maintenance of the portion of the new road or bridge situate in the latter county upon and from the persons liable to be assessed for the construction and maintenance of new roads or bridges in the former county, in the same manner and with the same powers of recovery as if the whole of the new road or bridge had been situate in the former county,"—(Mr. Marjoribanks.)

—brought up, read the first and second time, and added to the Bill.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday, 25th April, and to be printed. [Bill 291.]

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH. (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 230.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

(3.23.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): This Bill was read a second time last night after twelve o'clock, and we had not time to then discuss it. Indeed, I did not know that it had been read a second time until I saw the report this morning in the papers. We ought to have a separate Public Health Bill for the whole of Scotland, for the counties as well as the burghs, as is the case in England. I shall now move to report Progress, in order to call attention to this matter. The Bill requires to be greatly altered, but we have not yet had time to put Amendments down upon the Paper. Altogether the Bill contains 560 clauses, and it can only be passed by striking out the whole of the Public Health Clauses. It entirely transforms our Burgh Law, our Police Law, and our Public Health Law. Under the circumstances, I think it is only reasonable that an opportunity should be given us of putting Amendments upon the Paper.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Dr. Clark.)

(3.28.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I hope the Motion for Adjournment will not be persevered with strongly. Three years ago a Committee was appointed to deal with this Bill, and they sat for three months. It is true that some changes were then made in it of an important character relating to rating, but they all came within small dimensions, and they might be discussed in a very short time. I deprecate very strongly the idea that has been suggested that the Public Health Clauses should be taken out of the Bill. The fact is that the Public Health Clauses are the most important clauses in the Bill, and it would be hardly fair to those who represent Scotland to take them out of it. I hope my hon. Friend will allow the non-contentious clauses to go through Committee, and to leave over those upon which there should be some discussion till Monday week. Opportunity would then be afforded to the hon. Member of putting down such Amendments as may be considered necessary.

(3.30.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I hope the Motion for Progress will not be persevered with. It is perfectly true that upon all the clauses there is not general agreement; but what I would impress upon my hon. Friends is this—to take a broad and a friendly view of the measure, and to allow us to go through Committee as far as possible to-day. I may say that I had a conversation with my right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian, and that he is very anxious to see this Bill carried through. That being so, I am sure my hon. Friend will be willing to accede to the wish thus expressed, and will withdraw his Motion.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand the objections of the hon. Member for Caithness to be confined to certain clauses, and I would suggest, without discussing the value of those objections, that we might be allowed to take the less contentious clauses to-day. On the part of the Government I would be glad to postpone any clause to which objection is taken.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): It is perfectly impossible, when clauses are being read from the Chair, for hon. Members to formulate their objections. I have no objection to the Bill as a whole—certainly not to three-fourths or four-fifths of it; but there are in the Bill a number of things to which I have a very strong objection. For instance, in casually reading the Bill this morning, I came across one clause which completely alters the entire principle of the law relating to the abolition of imprisonment for debt in Scotland, and I am sure that this result was not intended by those who drew this Bill. I wish to point out the great inconvenience of the course adopted by the Government with regard to this Bill. I know that many hon. Members who might have an objection to the details of the Bill agreed to raise no objection to the Second Reading if the Government allowed a reasonable time to elapse before taking the Committee stage, so that they might look into the matter. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness, I was prepared to move an Instruction to the Committee to the effect that the Committee have power to divide the Bill into two different portions. There was, however, no opportunity given so that I might put down such an Instruction. There is one body of men in Scotland who may be considered as pre-eminently entitled to be consulted in any matter connected with public health, and that is the Association of Medical Officers in Scotland. Those gentlemen have stated their objection to the question of the law relating to public health in Scotland being treated in the manner proposed in this Bill. They say that the Bill, if it is to be passed at all, should apply all round, and that the larger towns should not be excepted. They complain that, this Bill having only been printed a few days ago, they have had no opportunity of seeing its provisions. One of their objections to the Bill is that it proposes to alter the position of Officers of Public Health in Scotland as defined by the Local Government (Scotland) Act. If the Bill had been divided into two parts, the non-contentious matter might have been disposed of at once. But there is another inconvenience. It is proposed that the Bill should be put down for Monday week. Having regard to the Adjournment of the House until that day, it must inevitably happen that when the Bill is then brought forward a large number of Amendments will be handed in in MSS. I do not think that is a system of legislation which can commend itself to the House. Now, Sir, my hon. Friend below me intends to move to include Glasgow in the Bill. On that point, I will only say that while I could tolerate the Bill as long as it does not apply to the City which I have the honour to represent, I should certainly offer the strongest possible objection to Glasgow being placed under this Code without due notice.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I want to say a word on behalf of the small burghs, who really do want this Bill. Glasgow is not affected by the Bill, or if it is affected it is in so minute a way as to be imperceptible. In the small burghs people, without distinction of Party, are deeply anxious that this Bill should be passed. It has been ten years before the House. It has been printed I do not know how many times at great public cost, and over and over again for no reasonable purpose it has been objected to. Two or three years ago we got through Committee, and further progress was stopped, not by any representative of a constituency affected by the Bill, but by the hon. Member for St. Rollox, who put down 15 pages of Amendments which made it impossible to pass the Bill. Now we have the hon. Gentleman who represents the College Division objecting on the same grounds.

DR. CAMERON: I did nothing of the sort.

MR. R. T. REID That is the kind of objection by which this Bill is being met. My hon. Friend the Member for Caithness no doubt represents a burgh that is affected. I am sure there is no desire to deprive him of an opportunity of moving his Amendments. But the First Lord has made a reasonable offer; he says that if any clause is objected to, it will be postponed, and ample opportunity given for its discussion. Why, then, should we not proceed with the Bill? There may be objections on some points, but the substance of the Bill is most acceptable to the constituencies, and is earnestly wished for.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): The reason I objected some years ago was this: The Government was going to introduce a Local Government Bill which would transfer the administration of matters connected with public health to the County Councils. It was simply a matter of convenience. Now that the Local Government Act has passed, I may say that personally I have no objections to this Bill. At the same time, I would point out to the Government the extreme inconvenience of mixing up in one Bill questions connected with the police and with public health. If there is to be an amendment of the Public Health Act it should be done by a separate Bill. To apply to burghs a rule different from that obtaining in counties will make the Public Health Act unworkable.

DR. CLARK: I would have no objection to the proposal of the First Lord if I saw how it could be carried out. But I notice that in the 4th clause it is proposed to substitute the word "Commissioners" for "Town Councils." We do not want that new-fangled word, and if it is not left standing then the phraseology of all the later clauses will have to be altered. Again, it is proposed that certain burghs should be exempt. Greenock is to be exempted, but Leith and Paisley and Govan are taken in. We want a uniform Police Law.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): If, as has been said, there are few hon. Members present, it is because they do not desire to discuss in detail this Bill, and because they know that the Town Councils are anxious that the Bill should pass. I hope the Amendment will not be pressed. I can understand that it would be desirable to have some changes respecting the Public Health Act in counties. I do not see how it is likely we shall have a more favourable opportunity of passing the Bill than we shall have this afternoon. It will be a matter of the deepest regret and concern to all the small burghs in Scotland if anything is done to hinder the passing of this Bill. We are all of one mind on the subject, and it is very hard that the safety of this Bill should be endangered by the Representatives of constituencies which are hardly affected by it at all. There is nobody whatever against this Bill, and I earnestly hope our reputation for common sense will not be taken away by any senseless opposition to the Bill.

(3.55.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I would remind the hon. Member for Caithness, with reference to the postponement of Clause 4, the Definition Clause, that that was the very course adopted in the Committee, and why should we not postpone the Clause now? As representing five of the burghs in Scotland which will be affected by this Bill, I can speak as to the feeling which exists in favour of its passage into law, and I most sincerely hope the advice which has been tendered to this House through the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, who wishes to assist in the passage of this Bill, will be accepted by all sides of the House.

(3.57.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): With regard to the Definition Clause, I do not think there is any serious objection on the point as to whether those gentlemen should be called Town Councillors or Commissioners. What we are concerned about is the law under which they are going to administer the affairs of the burghs.

DR. CLARK: I have no objection to go on as far as we can until we come to the contentious matter, but then as soon as we get there we may go on to subjects which are not dealt with in this clause.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clauses 1 to 3 agreed to.

Clause 4.

DR. CLARK: I move that the clause be postponed.

Clause postponed.

Clause 5.

DR. CLARK: This clause raises a question of principle whether the Bill shall apply to the whole of the burghs of Scotland, or whether a number of burghs shall be exempted. I beg to move that this clause be postponed.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 6 and 7 agreed to.

Clause 8.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to move the Amendment which was moved previously—

“After ‘situated’ insert ‘Members of Parliament for burghs wholly or partly within the county and Councils of burghs within the county.’”

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I would ask the hon. Gentleman to remember his attitude towards the Bill, and to consider whether it is desirable to take this Amendment now. I hope he will take another occasion for bringing it forward.

MR. CALDWELL: If time be allowed for the purpose of making other Amendments I certainly, for my part, will not put down one single unnecessary Amendment. I have no intention of interposing any obstacle to the passing of the Bill, but I would appeal to the Government to give time for the consideration of Amendments.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I hope my hon. Friend in moving his Amendments will only press matters of principle.

MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): The hon. Member should put the saddle on the right horse.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 9 to 14, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 15.

DR. CLARK: I beg to move that the clause be postponed.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 16 to 27, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 28 postponed.

Clauses 29 to 35, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 36.

DR. CLARK: This clause limits the number of Magistrates of burghs according to population. We think that two Magistrates are not sufficient for some of the burghs, and I move that the clause be postponed.

MR. ESSLEMONT: The smallest burghs have 7,000 of a population. I should think two Magistrates would be sufficient for such burghs, and I have heard of no wish from any burgh whatever that the number of Magistrates should be increased.

DR. CLARK: It is with reference to burghs between 10,000 and 15,000 that this matter is contentious. There was a division in the Committee on the matter, and a strong feeling about it.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 37 to 41, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 42.

DR. CLARK : This clause affects one of the burghs which I represent, where we have two classes of Magistrates, Police Magistrates, and Burgh Magistrates. I think this clause wants amendment, as it does not meet the case entirely, and I move that the clause be postponed.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 43 to 45 agreed to.

Clause 46 postponed.

Clauses 47 to 59, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 60 postponed.

Clauses 61 to 74, inclusive, agreed to.

Clauses 75 to 77 postponed.

Clause 78.

(4.8.) MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.) : This clause deals with a population of not less than 25,000. I beg to move, as an Amendment, in page 3, line 8, after the word "thousand," to insert the words,

"or at any time it is proved to the satisfaction of the Sheriff that they have a population of 20,000."

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(4.9.) DR. CLARK : If this had come on in the usual fashion the hon. Member's Amendment would have been on the Paper, and we would have known what it meant. I object to anything of this kind being done without notice, and I think the Amendment should be put on the Paper, so that we may know what we are doing.

MR. PROVAND : I hope my hon. Friend will not press the Amendment now.

MR. BARCLAY : This Amendment is to alter the population of the burghs, and it will give rise to considerable discussion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause postponed.

DR. CLARK : The Government have now got two portions of their Bill, and Parts 3 and 4 raise the questions of the Police Force and the Public Health Clauses, which I think require further time for consideration. To these clauses also there are a great number of Amendments. I, therefore, move that you do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."

MR. R. T. REID : I hope the hon. Member will not press his Motion, but let us get on with the Bill, in which the burghs I represent are deeply interested.

MR. ESSLEMONT : I hope my hon. Friend will not press the Motion.

DR. CLARK : In these clauses there are several powers given which I do not think ought to be given. I think it would be a reasonable compromise to take up to Clause 99, the end of Part 3 of the Bill. Beyond that the clauses are bristling with pains and penalties, and we ought not to allow the Criminal Law to be altered in this way without full and free discussion. If the right hon. Gentleman will take up to Clause 98 that will give him the machinery, and leave the clauses beyond, which deal with the incidence of the taxes and lighting, and will then report Progress, I will withdraw.

MR. R. T. REID : I hope my hon. Friend will not persist. How, in the name of common sense, are we to pass this Bill till the crack of doom if there are constant Motions to report Progress? The Bill is of great magnitude, and to apply the process of dealing with ordinary Bills would render its passage impossible. When I observe that those who are the subjects of the clauses imposing penalties are themselves anxious and pressing for them to be passed, and that the objection comes almost wholly from those who have select penal clauses of their own, it is impossible to reconcile their proceeding with a sincere desire to pass the Bill.

DR. CAMERON : I think progress would be facilitated if my hon. and learned Friend would abstain from indulging in unnecessary lectures. He previously said that my object in resisting the progress on the Bill was to enable me to put down 15 pages of Amendments. I never put down 15 pages of Amendments to a Bill in my life. I have been silent while 70 or 80 clauses have been passed, waiting till I have some Amendment to propose—and surely that is a guarantee that I have no desire to place a mechanical obstacle in the way of the Bill. The First Lord of the Treasury feels the importance of these clauses as he intends to give an opportunity of discussing them, and I shall feel bound to offer some remarks on the clauses in Part 4.

MR. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I want to make a suggestion which may help matters. I propose that we shall proceed with the Bill avoiding all discussion to-day, postponing all contentious clauses.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is the offer I made to the Committee two hours ago.

MR. CRAWFORD: I think my hon. and learned Friend had the opportunity of raising every one of these points before the Committee which sat for eight weeks in the summer, and he carried as many of his points as any individual of the House could expect to do. It is true that if my hon. and learned Friend persists in raising these points it will make legislation impossible. I think it a little unfair of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), whose constituents have insisted on being exempted from the Bill, to resist the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the Scotch Members in this House, and of the small burghs of Scotland to whom the passing of the Bill is very important.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If we carry out the principle that every clause to which objection is made be postponed we should get on better. I shall have to cut this discussion short, having regard to the other business of the House, but we have still a little time left for it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I want to raise an objection to this Bill being scamped in this way. In the Bill many precedents will be set which it may be attempted to apply to Ireland, and we ought, therefore, to give more time to the consideration of them. It is an absolute piece of humbug and bunkum trying to rush this Bill through in an afternoon, to meet the exigencies of an already defunct Government.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): We might proceed to Clause 104, and then postpone the rest. I am glad to have heard this discussion, which shows that the voice of Scotland is not unanimous, as that is in favour of Scotch Home Rule.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! Does the hon. Gentleman withdraw his Motion?

DR. CLARK: There is Clause 83, the Coercion Clause, on which I feel very strongly. After our experience in Skye I shall have to oppose that clause. I withdraw my Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 79 to 82 agreed to.

Clause 83 postponed.

Clauses 84 to 86 agreed to.

Clause 87 postponed.

Clauses 88 to 99, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 100 postponed.

Clauses 101 to 103 agreed to.

Clause 104 postponed.

Clauses 105 to 107 agreed to.

Clauses 108 and 109 postponed.

Clauses 110 to 113 agreed to.

Clauses 114 to 117 postponed.

Clause 118.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): This is another clause to which we object. It imposes a penalty of 40s. on occupiers for not performing certain duties which are now performed by the owners. I do not think we are making much progress, and I see no use in going on in this way.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I think the clauses up to 126 are of a most contentious character.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then we will postpone those clauses.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): There is a great deal in this Bill raising new powers, and if we go on as we are going it will be said you allowed those powers to be given to Scotland sub silentio, and then it will be proposed to apply them to Ireland. There are a number of excellent clauses in this Bill which we should be delighted to apply to Ireland, but we have no chance of getting them. But in voting clauses in this matter we are acting entirely in the dark, and if we vote anything that is bad for Scotland we shall have it applied to Ireland, and be told that we should not oppose it. I venture to make a protest against this system of passing legislation.

Clauses 119 to 126, inclusive, postponed.

Clauses 127 to 129, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 130 postponed.

Clauses 131 and 132 agreed to.

Clause 133 postponed.

Clauses 134 and 135 agreed to.

Clauses 136 to 141, inclusive, postponed.

Clause 142 agreed to.

Clause 143.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I do not see why Scotland should have powers which are refused to Ireland, and I propose to alter this clause most mischievously. I propose to introduce the same mischievous proposal as was included in a Government Bill with regard to Ireland. We are not allowed to alter the names of the streets in our towns, and if we are not allowed, why should Scotland be? I admit the Amendment is a mischievous one, but I put it forward to show the manner in which Ireland is treated. We are allowed to alter the numbers, so we will leave the same power to Scotland; but I move after the word "name," to take in from the Irish Bill the words "with the consent of the majority of the inhabitants."

Amendment proposed, after the word "name," to insert the words "with the consent of the majority of the inhabitants."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. ESSLEMONT: This clause was brought forward at the particular request of the Scotch Members, and I hope the hon. Member will not press his Amendment. The Scotch Members will be very glad to help him to alter the Irish Bill if he will not spoil our measure.

DR. TANNER: This Amendment will show Her Majesty's Government

Mr. T. M. Healy

the necessity of dealing impartially with all portions of the United Kingdom. I hope the Scotch Members will assist us to make the Government swallow one of their impartial proposals.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I admitted that my Amendment was mischievous, and I think the clause had better be postponed.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 144 postponed.

Clauses 145 to 148, inclusive, agreed to.

Clauses 149 and 150 postponed.

Clauses 151 to 179, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 180 postponed.

Clause 181 agreed to.

Clauses 182 and 183 postponed.

Clauses 184 to 191, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 192 postponed.

Clauses 193 to 199, inclusive, agreed to.

Clauses 200 to 208, inclusive, postponed.

Clauses 209 to 214, inclusive, agreed to.

Clauses 215 and 216 postponed.

Clause 217 agreed to.

Clause 218 postponed.

Clauses 219 to 221, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 222.

(4.51.) DR. CLARK: According to this clause a person throwing a cork into the street is to be fined 20s.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 223 to 234, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 235.

(4.52.) DR. CLARK: This clause provides for the construction of sewers; and as it may come under one of the charges in connection with the Committee I should like to have it postponed.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 236 and 237 agreed to.

Clause 238.

(4.53.) DR. CLARK: This clause means that new houses cannot be built unless they are drained, and it is impossible in some of the smaller burghs to do that.

Clause postponed.

Clause 239 agreed to.

Clause 240.

(4.54.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): This clause deals with the ventilation of buildings, a subject forming the subject of inquiry in a Committee upstairs; and as it may be connected with the operation of the Public Health Act I hope the Committee will postpone the clause.

Clause postponed.

Clause 241 agreed to.

Clause 242 postponed.

Clauses 243 and 244 agreed to.

Clause 245 postponed.

Clause 246 agreed to.

Clause 247.

(4.55.) DR. CLARK: This is a very objectionable clause, which permits the sewage of other people to be put under the houses of their neighbours.

Clause postponed.

Clause 248 postponed.

Clause 249.

(4.56.) DR. TANNER: Here, again, "waste pipe in communication with drains." To run a waste pipe in communication with drains anywhere in the vicinity of an open window may be very serious. We have been considering these matters for weeks past in connection with a Committee upstairs; and that particular point was discussed during the whole of an afternoon; and accordingly, in connection with many of these sanitary clauses, I do not think you are doing well or wisely in scampering through this Bill with this undue and indecent haste.

(4.57.) DR. CAMERON: All these clauses would be much better dealt with by giving powers to the Local Authorities to make bye-laws. The small details would be very much better dealt with by bye-laws than by clauses of an Act of Parliament; and I would suggest, therefore, before coming to any decision, that all these clauses up to 256 should be postponed.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 250 to 256, inclusive, postponed.

Clauses 257 and 258 agreed to.

Clause 259 postponed.

Clauses 260 to 269, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 270.

(4.58.) DR. CAMERON: This is a subject, again, which had better be dealt with by bye-law.

(4.59.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I wish to point out to my hon. Friend that the object of this Bill is to consolidate the law, so that there may not be one law for one burgh and another for another. My hon. Friend is more familiar with the City of Glasgow than with the smaller burghs, where the same law would not be applicable, as they can go to any expense in these matters in the City of Glasgow.

(5.1.) DR. CAMERON: With all respect to my hon. Friend, whose views are entitled to great weight, I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman to take into consideration the propriety of dealing with a great number of these matters by bye-laws, and that these clauses should be postponed.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 271 to 276, inclusive, postponed.

Clauses 277 to 281, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 282.

(5.3.) DR. TANNER: This clause, which deals with the accumulation of penalties, appears to me to afford much room for discussion and ought to be postponed.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 283 to 285, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 286 postponed.

Clauses 287 to 289, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 290 postponed.

Clauses 291 to 315, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 316 postponed.

Clauses 317 to 325, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 326 postponed.

Clauses 327 to 329, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 330 postponed.

Clauses 331 to 339, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 340.

(5.20.) DR. CAMERON: Here we come to the public health portion of the Bill and the Sanitary Clauses, and I would suggest that we should now break off. I beg to move, Mr. Courtney, that you do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Dr. Cameron.)

MR. BARCLAY: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the discussion in Committee on the Bill will be resumed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Bill will be put down on the day the House is to resume after the Recess, with the view of making progress at all events with the remaining uncontested clauses. Under these circumstances I agree to the Motion moved by the hon. Member.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress.

(5.20.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to take it on the Monday, as it would much facilitate business.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The House could, after the Easter Recess, make progress at all events with the undisputed clauses.

Committee to sit again upon Monday, 25th April.

SHORT TITLES BILL [Lords].—(No. 227.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to strike out all the repealing clauses.

*(5.24.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I may explain to the hon. and learned Member for Longford, I propose to strike out all the repealing clauses. The result will be to make the Bill simply permissive, enabling people to use the short title, and not preventing those who prefer to do so from employing the long title. As the hon. and learned Member is well aware, there are many Acts of Parliament which cannot be cited except by very long titles.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I am altogether opposed to the idea of altering the historic titles of certain Acts of Parliament. Take the Act of Union of Scotland. It is to be called Union of Scotland Act? Union of what? Then there is the Act for the Union of England and Scotland, and that of the union with Ireland—our little country over the way. I shall object to any tinkering with these historic titles.

(5.27.) SIR C. RUSSELL (Hackney, S.): I would point out to my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Longford that people will still be at liberty, notwithstanding this Act, to use the longest titles that exist.

DR. TANNER: I think that the Government should be fair all round, and allow the Criminal Law Amendment (Ireland) Act to be cited by the simple, common, and true title of the Tory Coercion Act. It is as well to call a spade a spade while we are at it.

(5.28.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I can satisfy the scruples of the hon. Member. The words are without prejudice to any other mode of recital.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 negatived.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Schedule 1 be added to the Bill."

(5.33.) MR. T. M. HEALY: The Government proposed at 5.30 to report Progress, and I really think it is not fair to go on.

SIR R. WEBSTER: There are only three Schedules, and these we might be allowed to take.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I withdraw my opposition.

Schedule 1 agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Schedule 2 be added to the Bill."

(5.38.) MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg now, Sir, to move that you report Progress, and ask leave to sit again. It is now more than half-past five o'clock, and, moreover, it is desirable that we should have this Bill in reserve.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Member admits that his object in making this Motion is to have a Bill in reserve that he may operate more successfully upon the Attorney General at a later stage. That is hardly a reason for not going on with this Bill. I said that 5.30 was a desirable hour to begin the discussion upon the Motion for Adjournment, but the hon. Member can hardly complain if the hour is a little overstepped. The Bill now before the Committee can be disposed of in a few minutes, as there is no contentious matter in the Schedules. I hope the Motion for Progress will not be persevered with.

DR. TANNER: As one of the late guests of the right hon. Gentleman, I would like to put this matter in proper form. I wish to move an Amendment on the Schedules with reference to the Criminal Law Procedure (Ireland) Bill. That Bill is known as the Coercion Act, and sometimes it is spoken of as Balfour's Coercion Act, thereby reminding us of the immortal services of the right hon. Gentleman. I shall feel it necessary to divide the Committee on this point, as the right hon. Gentleman has impressed me with a sense of responsibility in respect of this matter.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday 25th April.

MOTION.

ADJOURNMENT.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to move—

"That this House, at the conclusion of the Morning Sitting this day, do adjourn until Monday the 25th April."

PEERS AND ELECTIONS.

(5.40.) MR. T. M. HEALY: We are on the point of adjourning for Easter, and it is only fair to take a slight survey of what the Government have done since the Session began. At the beginning of the Session we were told that in conformity with the Unionist pledges a Local Government Bill on the lines of the measures already passed for England and Scotland would be introduced for Ireland; and that Bill, we were told, would be the consummation of Unionist policy, and would finally seal relations of amity between this country and Ireland. Sir, I ask with Hans Breitmann—where is the Local Government Bill now? We are all anxious that Government should go on with that Bill, but we know very well from authoritative statements that have appeared in the Unionist newspapers that the Government have themselves abandoned all hope of passing the measure into law. Thus it is that every pledge made by successive Governments with regard to Local Government in Ireland has been broken, and time after time they have shown themselves absolutely incapable of legislating on this important subject. In 1878 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet brought in a Bill, which was a better Bill than the measure now before the House. The present Bill is so bad that the Government are ashamed to present it to the House of Commons. It is a Bill which purports to abolish the powers of Grand Jurors in Ireland, and to hand them over to the people of Ireland. The Grand Jurors met last month, and from not one of the 32 counties did there come from those gentlemen, whom it is proposed to disestablish, one single word of protest against the great Local Government Bill of Her Majesty's Government. That is one of the most remarkable testimonies to the Tory character of the Bill. There is another subject I should like to touch upon—namely, the subject of education. So far as I can see, Irish education is as far from being perfected as ever. A very reasonable demand was made by competent and indeed high authorities that the Bill should be split into two parts—that the part which deals with intricate and somewhat difficult matters of procedure should be postponed, so that the part which gives relief to the teachers, which is non-contentious, should be passed, as passed it would be in a few hours. The Government object to that without forcing down the throats of the Irish Members a proposal for dealing with the Pension Fund that is absolutely obnoxious to the people of Ireland. These are the entire performances of the Government, and I like to check off the Act of Union year by year, in order to show the assets. We have an offensive and objectionable Local Government Bill which is brought forward only to be withdrawn, and an Education Bill which is objected to by the Irish Members—a Bill which the Government will not allow the Irish Members to mould in accordance with the wish of the Irish people. But, Sir, the immediate purpose of my intervention was to call attention to the action of the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland (Lord Ashbourne). Lord Ashbourne is at the head of the judicial administration in Ireland; he is a man who had great experience in this House; he has very important functions to discharge in Ireland. In the first place, he has to be satisfied of the legal knowledge of the Removable Magistrates—a subject so profound as almost to engage his exclusive attention. He has, practically, the appointment of all the Judges in the land; he advises the Lord Lieutenant and I believe a practice has sprung up—I believe it dates from the time of Lord Chancellor Sullivan's first appointment—of having an office in Dublin Castle called the Lord Chancellor's Office. Therefore, this Judge in the land takes practically a part in the executive as well as in the legal and judicial administration of the country. Moreover, Lord Ashbourne is a Cabinet Minister. So strongly does he feel that he is to some extent a suspect that he does not sit and adjudicate in certain matters coming before his Court—in revision appeals, for example, with respect to the registration of voters and other cognate matters; and although I do not think it is a very great loss, still there attaches to him the conviction that he is bound to walk warily in the discharge of his important duties. But in addition to being Lord Chancellor, Lord Ashbourne is a Peer of the Realm, and as you, Mr. Speaker, reminded us when the Cambrian Railway Directors were before us the other day there are certain Resolutions passed at the beginning of every Session which, if they leave out the force of law, are still real and absolute powers. One of these Resolutions which was mentioned by you, Mr. Speaker, when admonishing the Cambrian Directors from the Chair, is in these words:—

“Resolved, That it is a high infringement of the liberties and privileges of the Commons of the United Kingdom for any Lord of Parliament, or other Peer or Prelate, not being a Peer of Ireland at the time elected, and not having declined to serve for any county, city, or borough of Great Britain, to concern himself in the election of Members to serve for the Commons in Parliament, except only any Peer of Ireland at such elections in Great Britain respectively where such Peer shall appear as a candidate, or by himself, or any other, be proposed to be elected; or for any Lord Lieutenant or Governor of any county to avail himself of any authority derived from his commission, to influence the election of any Member to serve for the Commons in Parliament.”

Lord Ashbourne was as well aware of that Resolution as any other Peer. But I do not wish to press the point too strongly against Lord Ashbourne because the Resolution has not the force of law, and because the Duke of Westminster, the Duke of Norfolk, and other persons higher in the scale, are in the habit of intermeddling in politics, and it would not be fair to reprimand Lord Ashbourne who is only a Baron for doing what Dukes do habitually. My real complaint is that Lord Ashbourne who is a Judge of the land has interfered practically in a hustings matter. The right hon. Gentleman, the Leader of the House, says that has yet to be proved. Well, Sir, I acknowledge that my authority is rather slight—it is only a paragraph in the Times. I am well aware from certain judicial proceedings that any statement the Times makes with regard to a Member of Parliament or a Peer belonging to a certain political Party ought to be taken with a certain amount of reserve. But in this instance the statement in the Times may, I think, be taken as accurate because it was not telegraphed, and might have been supplied by the noble Lord himself. Lord Ashbourne would have done better by attending to his important judicial duties in Ireland instead of traipseing over to Portsmouth to look after the candidature of Mr. Evelyn Ashley, who is an Irish landlord in Sligo. We know the subject of the relations between the Government and the Irish landlords has been sufficiently agitated, and Lord Ashbourne might have refrained from mixing himself up with an Irish landlord, whose conduct in 1881 we remember by his having a number of suspects put into gaol because they were giving him trouble. I think when Lord Ashbourne goes to support Tory or Unionist candidates for English constituencies, he would do well not to support Irish landlords, or, at all events, such an obnoxious character as Mr. Evelyn Ashley. Then his Lordship, having doffed the ermine and the horse-hair, proceeded to lecture the Liberal Party on their vices, and launched out into a great panegyric on the virtues of Members of the present Government. Now, if there is anything indecent I know, it is one Member of a Government getting up and praising another Member. It is a kind of mutual admiration society which is established by that means. It is like the case of a long firm in which the one who is not convicted is put up to give evidence in favour of his "pals" in the dock. It is quite remarkable that Lord Ashbourne travels 500 miles, and leaves the Court of Appeal in Ireland and the care of wards of Chancery, and goes down to Portsmouth to make a defence of the Unionist Party. The Times says that—

"His Lordship, on entering the hall in company with the candidate, was received with a loud outburst of cheers."

What would be thought in Ireland if Lord Halsbury left his robes in the Royal Courts of Justice and came over to Belfast to the Shankhill Board, for instance, or went to South Antrim accompanied by the distinguished Gentleman who sits for that constituency, or even went to Trinity College which the Attorney General adorns by representing, and delivered an address to the Irish nation? We should be inclined to resent it, and to tell Lord Halsbury that as he received a large salary for his duties in England he would be far better engaged there. Lord Ashbourne does not seem satisfied with getting all his friends and relatives made Judges in Ireland and in quietly drawing the proceeds of his office, but he must work for others of his relatives, and play for a second term by getting in Unionist candidates and delivering speeches of this character. He said—

"There was a time when every public man should absolutely and fearlessly meet the public opinion of his country, and speak upon every topic of their public life."

Well, I do not think so. I do not think Judges are appointed to go on the hustings and speak upon every topic of their public life. What we want Lord Chancellors for is to take care of wards in Chancery and to confine themselves strictly thereto, not to go down to the country "primrosing" and delivering violent speeches. The noble Lord might have taken this long journey without being needlessly offensive. I always notice when a man says he does not mean to be offensive that he invariably says something un-Parliamentary. For myself, I never say anything offensive. Look what his Lordship says of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. He said—

"Let any fad be started and Mr. Gladstone's lieutenants will speak upon it, and in such a way that the poor people behind the fad are left to the delusion that it might be a great benefit to them, and that something might be done for them."

I do not see why the cold shade of silence should pervade the Ministerial Benches at the present moment on hearing this deliverance of a Tory Judge. If this is the tone of speech we are to have when Lord Chancellors leave the Bench, the more they remain on the Bench the better. Then I find his Lordship went on to praise different Members of the Tory Party, but somehow or other he left out the Home Secretary. I do not know why he left out the Home Secretary, but I may be inclined to make a few remarks hereafter about that. He says in regard to financial administration—

"The Government had had great luck in securing the vast aid of the genius of Mr. Goschen."

And nobody remarked sugar bounties, or publicans' licences, or anything of that kind. But the First Lord of the Treasury was not passed over. But before he came to the First Lord he had a few remarks to make about another gentleman. The noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty was also referred to, and in reference to him Lord Ashbourne said—

"In their naval administration the present Government and Lord George Hamilton had manifested an earnest desire to put the Navy into a vigorous and efficient state."

Quite so. He is simply praising his own friends. In regard to the Government of Ireland he says, "The peace and quietness which had been restored they owed in a great measure to the genius of Mr. Balfour." I certainly think if Lord Ashbourne went to deliver a speech in regard to a gentleman whose highest service is that of having passed a beneficent Coercion Act he might, in a more fitting way, have acknowledged the great work which he says the First Lord of the Treasury did on behalf of Ireland when he was Chief Secretary. And this is the class of Judges with whom the Government think it reasonable we should be satisfied to have at the head of the judicial system in Ireland. But he had not one word to say in favour of Mr. Ashmead Bartlett. I most solemnly pledge myself that I have read out every word his Lordship said in praise of the Cabinet or Members of the Government. When the noble Lord thinks it worth his while to leave the quiet of the Four Courts in Dublin to deliver speeches of that kind in favour of the Tory Party, it shows the pass which Castle administration in Ireland has reached. So far as my experience goes, we should have been appalled if any Judge, when Lord Spencer was governing Ireland, had dropped across to deliver a speech in favour of Mr. Foster or the coercion policy of that day. Or what would have been thought if we had sent John Nash to stand in front of the Home Rule van and beat the drum in favour of the policy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian? What would the Orange Party have said—what would the hon. Members for North Armagh and South Tyrone have said—if any other Judge had stood at cross roads and addressed a meeting or done anything of that kind? Supposing there had been a riot at the Portsmouth meeting, would it not have been a pretty spectacle for the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, whom the Irish people were called on to respect, to have been seen "rotten egged" while taking part in the hurly-burly of an election demonstration? I do think such a thing would be calculated to lower the dignity of the Judicial Bench. The House has already pronounced against conduct of the character that has been pursued by the noble Lord and against the Judges of the land taking part in political meetings. And, in addition to the responsibilities of a Judge, there is this further grave position held by his Lordship: that he has practically the appointment of Removable Magistrates and County Court Judges, and has also great influence in the appointment of other Judges in Ireland. He is likewise the right-hand man of the Lord Lieutenant. And we are fairly entitled to expect that a gentleman with the long experience in regard to this House that Lord Ashbourne has should observe the same decorum that he displays in the conduct of his judicial functions with regard to matters of a strong Party character, and should not leave his own country to come over to England and set a bad example to the Judges here by conduct which would not be tolerated on the part of one in their own sphere. Suppose it had been a Removable Magistrate instead of the highest Judge in the land, say, Mr. Cecil Roche; suppose this gentleman, fired by the example of the Lord Chancellor, had come over to help you at the pending election; would that be tolerated? Are Civil servants to be allowed to attend political meetings? In my opinion a most infectious and detrimental example has been set and it will be well if the noble Lord will get up in another place and make some apology for the bad example he has set.

(6.11.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I apprehend that the attack we have just listened to from the hon. and learned Gentleman on the Lord Chancellor of Ireland is not, even from his own point of view, intended to be taken seriously. I gather that from the substance of the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman and from the manner in which he treated certain parts of the subject. In regard to the substance of his criticisms he attacks Lord Ashbourne on two grounds—first, that he has interfered in the controversial part of politics while Lord Chancellor of Ireland; and, secondly, that he has interfered in an election over here, although a Peer. With regard to the first ground. The hon. and learned Gentleman must know perfectly well that to go down to meetings either at Portsmouth or elsewhere, under the circumstances in which Lord Ashbourne attended those meetings, is a matter of every day occurrence on the part of Peers and has never been objected to by this House. The exact limits to which Peers should keep in dealing with election contests I do not propose to lay down; I do not profess to be a lawyer and it is not my duty to interpret these matters. But there can be no doubt, draw the line where you will, that Lord Ashbourne is on the safe side of that line, and in what he did was only following the habitual practice of Peers—sometimes Liberal Peers, sometimes Conservative Peers, and certainly not more Conservative than Liberal Peers. I come to the second substantial contention of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He appears to think that the fact that Lord Ashbourne is a Judge in very high place in Ireland is a reason why he should not himself take any part in politics in this country, or express any opinion in England on matters of Party policy. The hon. and learned Gentleman must remember that from time immemorial the British practice has been otherwise. From time immemorial the Chancellor of Ireland, as well as of England, has been a Party politician. The Lord Chancellor of England has invariably been a Member of the Cabinet, and the second most important Member of the Cabinet—and so long as you conduct the business of Government by Party you cannot well put any man in a position more obviously involving Party considerations than if you put him in the Cabinet, and if you once swallow that camel there is no need to strain at the gnat of a Peer taking part in politics outside the House of Lords. It is, of course, true that the habit of speaking on platforms at all is comparatively a novel practice so far as politicians in high office are concerned. I should think the number of times Sir Robert

Peel spoke on a public platform to any other audience than his own constituents might probably be counted on the fingers of one hand, and probably the same is true of Lord Palmerston. The habit of conducting our Parliamentary Debates at greater length, not only in this House and the other House but on public platforms, is one which, for good or evil, has been increasing with prodigious rapidity in the last 20 or 30 years, and it is evident that this must be so in the case of a Lord Chancellor as in the case of every other politician of note, whether in or out of office. But the duty of Lord Chancellors is not to take a greater part in the political controversies of their day, not to show more than formerly that they are members of one political Party; but occasionally to do, what all other leaders of political Parties have to do, to state the opinions they hold, which everybody knows they hold, before popular audiences on public platforms. Nor has it ever been suggested, either in this House or elsewhere, that the fact that the Lord Chancellor of the day, whether in Ireland or England, was a Party politician, has ever warped his absolute impartiality when on the Bench, or has ever suggested to any suitor who came before him that he was not secure of absolute justice at the hands of his Judge. I do not know that I need say more on the substance of the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman. It did, indeed, strike me during some of his remarks, that what he objected to on the part of Lord Ashbourne was not so much that Lord Ashbourne had made a Party speech, but that that Party speech was one not at all to the taste of the hon. and learned Gentleman himself. It struck me that he was not so much anxious to vindicate the position of the Judicial Bench, as anxious to deliver a thrust at a political antagonist—not with a poisoned weapon—but still a thrust at a political antagonist. In referring to the speech of my noble Friend, the hon. and learned Gentleman paid what my noble Friend will, no doubt, regard as a compliment, but one which is not likely to be returned by any Member of the other House with regard to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The chief criticism of the hon. and learned Gentleman upon the speech of my noble Friend at Portsmouth was that it was of too eulogistic a character. He seemed to think my noble Friend indulged in too much agreeable speaking about his friends. If, against my expectations, any speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman is the subject of discussion in another place, the particular point of attack will not be undue indulgence in eulogistic utterances on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman. It is no doubt true my noble Friend praised the administration of some of his colleagues; he may have taken too favourable a view of their performances. The hon. and learned Gentleman has often had to take notice of the behaviour of his colleagues, past and present, and I have not noticed in his utterances that he ever indulged in what might be described as grovelling flattery. That is not the sort of language in which the hon. and learned Gentleman indulges; that is not the kind of speech in which he excels. But that is no reason why he should envy the gifts of others more charitably endowed than himself, or why he should subject to these scathing criticisms, a speech, the ability of which cannot be contested, and which even he will not assert went out of the ordinary and proper line of Party controversy.

INFLUENZA IN IRISH SCHOOLS.

MR. TUIE (Westmeath, N.): I wish to ask the Chief Secretary if his attention has been called to the rules of the National Board of Education, insisting on an attendance of 30 children at schools to earn the grant for assistant teachers, and how the operation of that rule has been affected by the epidemic of influenza? In consequence of that epidemic it is difficult to maintain the attendance in some schools, and I think some modification of the rule should be allowed.

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; I understand that the hon. Member refers to a case where the attendance has been reduced in consequence of illness. I have communicated with the Board in the last ten days or so, and I understand that they always exercise a certain leniency in cases where illness has reduced the attendance slightly below the number requisite for keeping the school open, or in the other case, for requiring an assistant teacher. Certainly, in the case of illness to which the hon. Member has referred, I think they would exercise that indulgence and not order the salary of the assistant teacher to be stopped because there was not full attendance. If the hon. Member has any information to lay before me I will consider it.

THE IRISH MAIL SERVICE.

(6.23.) MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I wish to call attention to the action of the Post Office Department in regard to a matter raised at question time—the postal facilities for the South of Ireland. I have to acknowledge the courtesy of the Postmaster General in receiving a deputation from the South of Ireland about a month ago, and so far as I am able to judge, the course he has taken is one which he has taken against his judgment, and which he would not have taken if the question had been left in his hands to decide. The right hon. Gentleman told us he was quite in favour of reform, but said the matter rested with the Treasury. I would like to show what the Post Office has done in the matter. The day mail arrives at Cork at a quarter to twelve, and it leaves Cork at ten past one. Taking into consideration the interval between arrival and delivery, and between posting and despatch, there is little more than an hour for answering correspondence. The Cork Chamber of Commerce has over and over again called attention to the matter, and some time ago succeeded in getting the right hon. Gentleman to interest himself in the subject. A similar grievance was brought to his notice with regard to the North of Ireland, and I want to call attention to the difference of the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman in the two cases. At that time the North of Ireland was better off than Cork, as there was a longer interval for answering letters. In face of that fact the right hon. Gentleman did not grudge spending £23,000 in improving the postal arrangements. He spent £5,000 in improving the train services between Dublin and Belfast, and Dublin and Londonderry, and the other part of the sum in securing an alternative route not passing through Dublin, and that for dealing with a volume of letters which the right hon. Gentleman acknowledged did not exceed the volume of local letters passing between Dublin and Cork, and which was less than the volume between Dublin and Cork if the latter included the American mail. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that the state of things is unsatisfactory, and pointed out that the Department had spent the sum of £23,000 to give in the North of Ireland an interval of five hours between the arrival of the English mail and its dispatch, and yet the Treasury are not willing to spend £3,000 in order to improve the service to the City of Cork. Any improvement in that service would benefit not merely Cork and the whole of the South of Ireland, but the whole commercial community of England. We have been treated in a somewhat unfair manner. The Postmaster General has told us what he has succeeded in doing for the North of Ireland, and we ask the expenditure of £3,000 to secure a better Mail Service for Cork. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that the Treasury, having regard to the expenditure elsewhere, is not willing to grant us this advantage; but I think it is most unfair that the South of Ireland should be sacrificed to the interests of other places. The right hon. Gentleman does not say that the demand is unreasonable, but that the Treasury are unable to consent to it, because money has been spent elsewhere in improving the Mail Service in other parts of Ireland. Not an additional penny will the Treasury consent to spend on the Cork Service, although the benefit would be for the Anglo-American Mail Service as well as for Cork. We know how important this American Mail Service is. We know that other ports are competing with Liverpool for the American mails, and we know the advantages of this service, and what a considerable improvement the expenditure of £3,000 would effect, and the right hon. Gentleman admits the sum is a reasonable one. This is no case in which a Railway Company makes an unreasonable demand for an improvement in a local service, as was said to be the case with the Wexford Mails. Negotiations have taken place with the Great Southern and Western Railway Company, and the right hon. Gentleman has frankly admitted the Company were reasonable in their demand; and yet, after expectations have been raised, we are met with the unsatisfactory and inconclusive statement that the Treasury will not permit the right hon. Gentleman to do what he considers just and right in this matter. I quite believe that the right hon. Gentleman himself is willing to meet the wishes of the people of Cork in this matter, and I do urge him to use all influence with the Treasury that the Southern Mail Service may be put on as satisfactory a footing as the Service for the North of Ireland.

(6.33.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The time at our disposal will not allow me to do full justice to the Department in relation to this subject. On several occasions I have recognised that hon. Members have a very good case in respect to the imperfect convenience the citizens of Cork now enjoy. We are constantly engaged in levelling up the Post Office Service. It is an agreeable duty when we find ourselves able to effect improvements in the Service and meet the wishes of localities. The Department can claim credit for having done much in recent years in this direction. The accounts show how much has been expended in the last few years in this manner. But everything cannot be done at the same time. We have many demands to meet. Cork does not stand alone in the position of not being satisfied with the Postal Service. There is a large and important English port in the centre of a great industry now making very similar representations to Cork, and showing that for a few thousand pounds great improvements could be effected. All these matters are considered and noted for attention as soon as circumstances will admit. I recognise that the facilities Cork enjoys are not sufficient, and that the additional sum the Railway company asks for a faster train service, thus allowing a longer interval for the return correspondence to be prepared, is a modest and reasonable request. But the fact is the expenditure upon improvements elsewhere has exhausted the sum we can apply for this purpose for the present, and so this matter stands over for future consideration, and I shall be glad if my tenure of office should allow me the opportunity of meeting the wishes of hon. Members in this respect.

RATING OF SCHOOLS—IRISH AFFAIRS.

(6.37.) MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): I take the opportunity to recall to the attention of my right hon. Friend a Bill which, though several times mentioned, has not yet appeared—a Bill as to which there is a good deal of public interest—the Bill for the exemption of schools from rates. That Bill was given a place on the year's programme in redemption of a distinct pledge given last Session, and it has acquired still greater importance from the Debate earlier in the Session in reference to the use of schoolrooms for political meetings. A sort of understanding was come to that a clause in the Bill should embody the Resolution the House then arrived at. These two matters—the exemption of schools from rating, and the use of schools for political meetings—are of so much importance that I think we may ask if the Government are prepared with their proposals on the subject? Of course, if the Bill is not introduced very soon after Easter, the chance of such a Bill passing this Session is not very great. Without unduly pressing the Government, I hope we may have some assurance on this matter.

(6.39.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I do not intend to delay the House, but there are two questions I should like, before we separate, to put before the Chief Secretary. The first of these I have mentioned several times—the steam trawling carried on in Galway Bay. The law against steam trawling within three miles of the coast does not apply to Ireland, and so it is that Scotch and other trawlers, not being able to pursue the practice off other coasts, appear in increasing numbers off the coasts of Mayo and Galway. I hope that during the Recess the Chief Secretary will obtain information on this matter, and, if possible, arrange with the Admiralty for the presence of a fast gunboat, which will protect the interests of the Irish fishermen. Then the other point I desire to mention is the claim of the Christian Brothers' Schools to assistance under the Education Bill. I trust that the Government will obtain full information on this matter, so that when the Education Bill comes on we may not be told that the Schools of the Christian Brothers are entirely outside the pale of the Education Department. If the Secretary to the Treasury would make an official report as he has made an unofficial report, he would do great service.

(6.40.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My hon. Friend behind me (Mr. J. G. Talbot) desires us to bring on the Rating of Schools Bill. As he is aware, the House adopted the suggestion which I think emanated from himself, that added to that Bill there should be a clause dealing with the use of schoolrooms for other than purely educational purposes. I believe the Bill has been drafted, but whether it will be possible to find time to discuss it depends upon the progress we are able to make with other measures. The hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Colonel Nolan) has mentioned two matters, trawling and the Christian Brothers' Schools. I think my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary was present to hear the request in reference to the Christian Brothers' Schools, and I have no doubt he will keep the subject in view and make himself thoroughly acquainted with the circumstances. As to steam trawling and the change which the hon. and gallant Gentleman says is taking place in the fishing in Irish waters, that also is a question which demands, as it will receive, serious consideration.

(6.42.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The Irish Education Bill will receive close scrutiny, and probably will be met with prolonged debate; and with this in view, I wish to say that the Return laid before the House on the Motion of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) is of an extremely partial character, and, standing alone, will cause a very incorrect judgment to be formed of material facts in relation to Irish education. I shall put down a Motion which I hope to move when we re-assemble after the Recess, for a second and supplementary Return which will qualify the imperfect and partial statement of facts as it appears in the Return of the hon. Member. It is desirable in view of the Debate that this second Return should be granted as soon as possible. If it is not granted, I must obtain the facts as far as I can in any other way open to me, for they are pertinent to the Debate on the Education Bill; but I think it will tend to economy of time if they are put before us in form not open to doubt. I take this opportunity to direct attention to the Motion of which I shall give notice this evening.

(6.44.)* MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I may remind the hon. Member that the Return is not in the form in which I placed my notice on the Paper, but in the form in which the Government expressed willingness to give it, and therefore I am not responsible for any partial character it may have. But my purpose in rising is to ask the First Lord if he can indicate the day after the Recess when the Education Bill will be taken? It is a subject of the greatest interest to a large number of people in Ireland, and I shall be glad if he can indicate the probable time when it will be reached.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot give any positive pledge beyond saying that it will not be taken in the first week after the holidays.

SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when Committee on the Small Holdings Bill will be resumed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My idea is that we ought to reach it on the Monday in the second week, May 2nd. The previous Thursday I anticipate will be occupied with the Budget discussion.

(6.45.) MR. P. O'BRIEN: Before we separate I should like to say a word with reference to the prisoner Egan, now confined in Portland Prison, and as to whom I put a question to the Home Secretary to-day. The right hon. Gentleman was good enough to say he had reconsidered the case, but I am anxious to know if he is still open to receive information I can put before him? It will be in the recollection of the House that when the question of amnesty was brought before us some twelve months ago by my late Friend and Leader (Mr. Parnell), and more recently by the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. E. Redmond), a clear distinction was shown to exist between the cases of Egan and the other prisoners convicted at the same time. The late Home Secretary (Sir W. Harcourt) admitted that Egan's case stood on different ground, and the right hon. Gentleman is the real gaoler in the case I suppose. I think the present Home Secretary expressed a similar opinion, and what I now want to ask is whether the right hon. Gentleman is still open to receive and consider information I can put before him in relation to Superintendent Black of Birmingham, whose evidence was mainly responsible for Egan's conviction? I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will give an assurance that he will give full consideration to facts which should lead strongly in the direction of a release of this prisoner.

(6.47.) MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot say that I have in the least altered the view I have previously expressed in regard to this case; but certainly, if material facts are brought before me, I shall always be ready to consider and to give full weight to them.

(6.47.) DR. TANNER: One matter in relation to Irish fisheries. There have been many remonstrances addressed to the authorities against the daily destruction of immature fish on the Irish coasts; and, putting the matter into a very few words, I would press upon the Chief Secretary that something should be done to prevent this destruction in the interest of a valuable Irish industry.

MR. JACKSON: It shall be borne in mind.

(6.48.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Can the First Lord of the Treasury tell us what is the intention as to Morning Sittings after the Recess?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not at present.

MR. CREMER: It is important to hon. Members who have Motions for Tuesdays or Fridays to have some indication.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot give any intimation now. The arrangement for Morning Sittings ceases at Easter. As soon as there is any necessity for further time for Government measures I will communicate it to the House.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, "That this House at the conclusion of the Morning Sitting this day do adjourn until Monday the 25th April."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 229.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): May I be allowed to say that an important communication representing the views of the shipowners of the United Kingdom in reference to this Bill has been received, and will, during the Recess, be most carefully considered by Members whose names are on the back of the Bill; and if the Bill is now given a Second Reading the Committee stage shall be fixed for a distant date?

SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I object.

Second Reading deferred till Monday, 25th April.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (PURCHASE) BILL.—(No. 213.)

Read a second time, and committed for Monday, 25th April.

SHERIFF COURTS (SCOTLAND) EXTRACTS BILL.—(No. 119.)

As amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Ordered—

That Standing Orders 39 and 129 be suspended, and that the time for depositing Petitions against Private Bills, or against any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, and for depositing duplicates of any Documents relating to any Bill to confirm any Provisional Order, or Provisional Certificate, be extended to the first day on which the House shall sit after the recess.—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

MOTIONS.

MIDWIVES' REGISTRATION.

The Select Committee on Midwives' Registration, nominated of—Mr. Bright, Mr. Tatton Egerton, Dr. Farquharson, Sir Frederick Fitz Wygram, Dr. Fox, Mr. Howorth, Sir Guyer Hunter, Mr. Fell Pease, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Stephens, and Mr. Arthur Williams.

Ordered, That five be the quorum.—(Mr. Fell Pease.)

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER (MILNATHORT) WATER BILL.

On Motion of the Lord Advocate, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order under "The Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1867," relating to Milnathort Water, ordered to be brought in by the Lord Advocate and Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 280.]

WITNESSES (ROYAL COMMISSION AND PARLIAMENT) PROTECTION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Yerburch, Bill to make provision for the better protection of witnesses giving evidence before any Royal Commission or any Committee of either House of Parliament, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Yerburch, Mr. Fisher, Mr. Forrest Fulton, and Mr. Story-Maskelyne.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 287.]

RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT (1888) AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Sinclair, Bill to amend "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Sinclair, Mr. Jeffreys, Mr. Philip Stanhope, Mr. Tomlinson, Mr. W. F. Lawrence, and Mr. Barclay.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 288.]

JURY LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Pitt-Lewis, Bill to amend the Law as to Grand and Petty Juries, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Pitt-Lewis, Mr. Bernard Coleridge, Mr. Kimber, and Mr. John Kelly.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 289.]

DISTRICT COURTS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Pitt-Lewis, Bill to amend the Judicature Acts by the establishment of District Courts, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Pitt-Lewis, Mr. John Kelly, and Mr. Atherley-Jones.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 290.]

DRAINAGE AND IMPROVEMENT OF LAND (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Jackson, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Drainage and Improvement of Land in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 292.]

It being Seven of the clock, Mr. Speaker, in pursuance of the Resolution of the House this day, adjourned the House until Monday, 25th April, without Question put.

House adjourned at Seven o'clock till Monday, 25th April.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 25th April, 1892.

QUESTIONS.

LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) ACT, 1891.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland when the Returns prescribed by Section 33 of "The Land Purchase (Ireland) Act, 1891," will be distributed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am informed by the Land Commissioners that they have collected materials for the preparation of this Return, and that they are now in communication with the Treasury as to the particular form the Return is to assume. It will be presented very shortly.

*MR. J. E. ELLIS: I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that similar information has been handed to a supporter of the Government on this side of the House, and it is important that we should all have the information in an official form.

THE CLARE SLOB LANDS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Board of Works engineer made an estimate as to the probable cost of repairing the damage done to the embankment of the River Fergus slob lands reclamation by the storm in October last year; was it acting on the advice of said engineer that the Treasury abandoned the works; and whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the engineer, and the Correspondence between the Treasury and the Board of Works on the subject?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The answer to the first paragraph of the question is in the affirmative; but with regard to the remainder of the question, I do not think it would be for the public interest to lay any Correspondence on the Table at the present time. The Treasury acted on their own responsibility in dealing with the matter.

MR. COX: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman is it not the fact that these slob lands are at the present time advertised for sale by the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice and are estimated to produce a yearly rental of £3,666 4s.? If this is so, is the right hon. Gentleman prepared to modify the reply he gave me on the last occasion when I put a question on this subject when he said the money expended had been thrown away, and the Government refused to expend any more money in building up the embankment washed down by the floods?

SIR J. GORST: I am aware that the land has been offered for sale by the Court of Chancery, and for that reason I think it undesirable to publish the Correspondence. The hon. Member puts into my mouth the statement that the expenditure had been thrown away, but I assented to his statement that undoubtedly there had been a large expenditure, and the Treasury are determined to spend no more.

MR. COX: But is the right hon. Gentleman aware that of 1,242 acres there will be only 29 acres available, the remaining 1,213 acres being again submerged?

SIR J. GORST: The hon. Member must give me notice of that question.

MR. COX: I will do so.

THE GRESHAM UNIVERSITY.

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is able to state the terms of the Reference to a Royal Commission on the question of University Education in London, and the names of the Commissioners?

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) had notice also of the following question: To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is in a position to announce the names of the Royal Commissioners to whom the question of a teaching University for London (the Gresham University) will be referred?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In answer to this question and also to the question in the name of the hon. Member for North Islington, I have to say that the terms of Reference to the Commission as received at the Home Office are as follows:—

“We, taking the premisses into consideration, do authorise the said Commissioners to consider, and if they think fit, to alter, amend, and extend the proposed charter remitted in compliance with an Address of the House of Commons so as to form and report to us a scheme for the establishment under charter of an efficient teaching University for London.”

These terms, as my hon. Friend will see, are so wide that they will cover all projects which may be thought worthy of consideration for including the existing London University in the scheme. The names of the Commissioners are as follows:—Earl Cowper, K.G. (chairman), Lord Reay, G.C.S.I., G.C.I.E., Bishop Barry, the Right Hon. Sir Lyon Playfair, K.C.B., LL.D., Sir William Scovell Savory, Sir George Murray Humphry, M.D., LL.D., Mr. George G. Ramsay, LL.D., Rev. Canon Browne, B.D., Mr. Henry Sidgwick, Litt.D., Mr. John Scott Burdon Sanderson, M.A., Mr. James Anstie, Q.C., Mr. Ralph Charlton Palmer, and Mr. Gerald Henry Rendall, M.A.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeen, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman why the representation of the medical profession is restricted to the surgical side of the profession, and whether he will take into consideration the desirability of adding a physician in active practice as representing the general body of medical practitioners in the United Kingdom?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will inquire from my noble Friend with whom the responsibility rests of submitting the list to Her Majesty. I will submit the suggestion of the hon. Member, but I rather think that a difficulty will be found in increasing the number of Commissioners, already considerable. I believe I am right in saying that Sir George Humphry is not merely a surgeon—he is a doctor of medicine.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I rather think that it is exclusively in connection with the surgical profession he has made his reputation.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

THE WESTERN HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS (SCOTLAND) WORKS ACT, 1891.

DR. MACDONALD (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Secretary for Scotland has, in contravention of Section 2, Sub-section 4, of “The Western Highlands and Islands (Scotland) Works Act, 1891,” refused to make inquiry into certain works proposed to be made under the said Act in Ross-shire till plans, specifications, &c., are laid before him as to the proposed works; and, if so, what remedy there is to compel the observance of the Act and procure an inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Secretary for Scotland has requested the County Council interested to supply information, plans, and specifications, with a view to facilitate the preliminary inquiry he is entitled to make under Section 2 of the Act. Whether such plans are furnished or not the Secretary of State in no case has refused to make the necessary inquiry.

DR. MACDONALD: May I ask whether it is not the fact that the plans and specifications are not to be supplied until after the inquiry is made?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will submit the suggestion of the hon. Member to the Scotch Office.

HARBOUR OF REFUGE AT PORTNAGURAN.

DR. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government is now prepared to act on the recommendations of the Western Highlands and Islands Commission of 1890, to grant a sum of £30,000, or other sum of money required, for the construction of a harbour of refuge at Portnaguran, in the Island of Lewis, so as to enable the fishermen to prosecute their avocation with some degree of safety and success; and if there is any intention of giving a grant, as similarly recommended, for erecting a lighthouse on Thupman Head adjacent to Portnaguran?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be obliged if the hon. Member will put off this question until to-morrow or Thursday, and I will obtain full information from the Scotch Office on the subject.

BEHRING SEA FISHERIES.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Seeing the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in his place, I beg to ask him a question of which I have given him private notice—whether he can inform the House what is the present state of the negotiations in reference to the Behring Sea Fisheries question—how far they have progressed towards arbitration?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I have to say that complete accord has been arrived at between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the United States as to the modus vivendi pending a settlement by arbitration of the matters in dispute relating to Behring Sea Fisheries. The Convention has been signed at Washington, but the terms of it have not yet reached this country. I have, however, no reason to suppose that the document in the telegram from America which appeared a few days ago in the Times is in any respect inaccurate. Her Majesty's Government are taking steps to consult the Canadian Government in regard to the person whom they wish to recommend to Her Majesty's Government as one of the British arbitrators. The name of the gentleman who will arbitrate on behalf of Her Majesty's Government has not yet been definitely fixed.

NEW WRIT.

For County of Essex (Mid or Chelmsford Division) v. William James Beadel, esquire, deceased.—(Mr. Akers Douglas.)

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT (1861) AMENDMENT BILL [Lords].—(No. 182.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 11th April.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

*(3.45.) MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I do not propose in moving my Amendment to recapitulate all the arguments used on the Second Reading of the Bill; it is not necessary or desirable, and I should be trifling with the time of the Committee were I to attempt it. Yet I may be allowed to say that I think I was able on that occasion to prove pretty successfully that the elective principle is not at all new in India. I could even bring forward authorities to show that the very origin of the principle is from the East. But I do not wish to occupy time with a matter more or less of an academical character. I further showed that the elective principle is actually at work in Municipalities and Local Boards in India, and I think the number of these institutions which exist there is calculated to astonish some hon. Members. I was able to show from the evidence of Indian officials that the working of these Municipalities had been eminently successful and I also showed that the members of the Indian National Congress, which gives expression to an important section of Indian opinion, is an elective institution, the members being all elected in free and open meeting. Further, I was able to show that the elective principle has been recommended by a number of Viceroys who have rendered distinguished services to the Empire and to India. It was partially recommended to the Home Government by Lord Dufferin. Lord Northbrook accepted the principle with scarcely any qualification, and Lord Ripon, as we all know, has always been in favour of the principle, which has also the recommendation of Lord Reay, a distinguished Indian Governor. I was also able to show that a considerable number of Indian civil officials favoured the extension of the elective principle, Mr. H. J. Reynolds, C.I.E., Mr. Cotton, for 25 years a member of the Civil Service, and others. I am bound to say I think that all these authorities combined form a strong body of evidence, which ought to convince this Committee that it would be desirable to extend the elective principle in the formation of Indian Councils. I was rather amused by some of the comments in the English Press, which go far to prove that a great number of the writers did not even take the trouble to read the Debate on the Second Reading in extenso, for they ascribed to Indian reformers firstly the desire to destroy the actual mode of government in India by introducing full Parliamentary government into India; secondly, they impute to us the wish that the people of India, or their elected representatives, should have the complete power of the purse; thirdly, that the official body should be placed in a minority in the Councils of India. Now, these comments remind me of the definition of a crab as "a red fish which walks backwards;" a definition which is quite perfect as a definition were it not for the facts that a crab is not red, is not a fish, and does not walk backwards. So I may say of the arguments placed in the mouths of Indian reformers, who advocate the elective principle for members of the various Indian Councils: they would apply admirably but for the fact that we are not anxious to introduce Parliamentary government in India. To do so at the present time would be ridiculous and absurd. It never has been advocated by any politician taking a serious interest in Indian affairs. We have never dreamed of giving the elective body the power of the purse; but it is the object of Indian reformers, and their friends on this side of the House, so to extend the Bill now before us that it shall give to these Councils full liberty to discuss financial questions, and that is a point upon which we shall insist from these Benches. We think that greater facilities should be given, than the Bill now affords, for this purpose, and that it should be possible to take divisions on proposals before the Viceregal Council on financial matters; that members of the Council should be free to put questions and to call for papers, so as to enable enlightened criticism to be directed upon proposals in the Vice-Regal Council. We are not anxious to put the official element in a minority on these Councils; but, on the contrary it has always been suggested by the National Congress, that the elected members on the Indian Councils should not be more than one-half or less than one-third of the total number of the members of Council, so as to leave the Government of India always with a majority of votes. So all the arguments directed against our proposals fall pointlessly to the ground. It may be asked, "Why are you anxious for elected representation on the Indian Councils?" Why, Sir, for very much the same reasons which animated English reformers 60 years ago, when they advocated a large increase of the franchise. In those days of a narrow franchise and pocket boroughs it was asked by Tories, "If you give the franchise to a larger number of people, how will that affect the economic conditions of the working men—how will it increase the happiness of the labouring classes?" But since then we have seen the wonderful effect that has followed from the extension of the franchise in the United Kingdom. We have seen the Corn Laws abolished; we have seen the right of combination given to the labouring classes, the liberty of the Press established, the right of free meeting, free education, secured to the people, their economic position vastly improved. All these things, I believe, have flowed from the extension of the franchise in England; and it is just because we believe that the economic position of India requires more serious attention, and that its own inhabitants are more likely to drive home the arguments by which the requirements of India are supported, that we ask you to concede this extension of the elective principle. I am quite aware that Anglo-Indian opinion in India will be opposed to such an extension, as expressed by the Anglo-Indian Press. That Press, it seems to me, neglects, to a large extent, its duty in India, where it might do much noble work in diminishing the differences and smoothing the difficulties which must inevitably arise in such a country as India. The Anglo-Indian Press does all it can to increase those difficulties, and daily pours the virus of race hatred into the veins of the Anglo-Indian community. Deeply I regret that this should be so, and I hope the Press may in the future turn over a new leaf. There are various sections of Anglo-Indian society naturally opposed to the introduction of the elective principle by Indian reformers, whose watchwords are similar to those of reformers in England, "Peace, Retrenchment, and Reform." The military classes are, speaking generally, opposed to peace; their interests are in the direction of active service and a "forward" policy—as they term it. The Civil Service is against retrenchment, because it might possibly happen that this retrenchment would take the form of a considerable curtailment of the salaries paid out of Indian Revenue. I believe one of my hon. Friends who spoke in the Second Reading Debate referred to the Return, issued on the Motion of the late Mr. John Bright, in which it was shown that out of 68,000 Europeans in India 25,000 were Government officials, who amongst them divided the sum of 13 millions sterling in salaries and emoluments, &c., annually. The commercial classes instinctively fear reforms and changes, the introduction of which may, and occasionally must, interfere with the natural flow of trade. Among this class are men who, having crossed the Indian Ocean with little means, have no sooner been in India for a few years, and put together a few lakhs of rupees, than they think it necessary to vilify and attack the people in whose country they have so advantageously improved their own position. Lawyers, too, dislike competition with the nimble-witted Baboo. I think the Indian Government will require all the assistance of this House to enable it to advance against the impediments which will be thrown in its way by interested classes, and against difficulties raised by Anglo-Indian prejudice. We are told that the elective principle is contained in the present Bill; but even with microscopical examination it is scarcely possible to find it. It is supposed to be contained in the 4th sub-section of this clause, which runs as follows:—

"The Governor General in Council may from time to time on the approval of the Secretary of State in Council make regulations as to the conditions under which such nominations, or any of them, shall be made by the Governor General, Governors, and Lieutenant-Governors respectively, and prescribe the manner in which such regulations shall be carried into effect."

Now, I am quite willing to believe it would be possible, under this subsection, to introduce an arrangement to allow a certain number of men to be elected by large cities, or by various bodies, to the Legislative Councils; but it is equally evident that this section of the clause gives no distinct pledge to this House or the country. Mr. H. J. Reynolds, C.I.E., in a lecture delivered a short time ago, since the passing of the Second Reading, described these concessions as "utterly inadequate," and as having "aroused feelings of indignation and contempt." I am bound to say I think these feelings of indignation and contempt will be shared by a considerable number of the Indian people, and by my Amendments I propose to give the Government the opportunity of incorporating and including the elective principle formally in their Bill, and of giving proof of the sincerity of their intentions. Whatever may be the fate of my Amendments, I am glad to think that some assurances have been given both in this House and in another place which will, I trust, eventually lead to a large extension of the elective principle. We all know that the hon. Gentleman who has charge of the Bill in this House was not very re-assuring as to what the Government would do; but still he did give us to understand that to a large extent there was an intention to introduce the elective principle. Now, Lord Salisbury, too, in another place, has given a general assent, I believe, to the interpretation put by Lord Kimberley on some remarks of Lord Cross, which gave considerable latitude to the clause to which I have referred. The Marquess of Salisbury said—

"I rise for the purpose of expressing my general assent to the language which has been used by the noble Lord (Lord Northbrook). I quite agree with him that the word 'representation' better represents the intention we have in view than the more narrow word 'election.' I desire to correct the idea that this extra representation in the Legislative Councils is to be necessarily confined, or even specifically confined, to Municipal Bodies. I do not in the least desire to narrow the language or elasticity of the Bill in the direction of discouraging such bodies; but I must demur to the idea that they must necessarily be the main bodies in India to whom this additional representation must be given."

I quite agree with the Marquess of Salisbury, because it is quite evident that it would probably be very undesirable that the same people who were elected on the Municipal Bodies should be chosen to select in the large cities the persons who should be sent as representatives to either the Provincial or Legislative Councils. The municipal elections would be carried out with a different object in view—with the object of looking after the sanitary arrangements, &c., &c., of large towns, popular education, and matters of that kind; but these would be a different sort of men possibly from those who might be elected for the higher duties of taking part in the Provincial and Legislative Councils. In the case of many of the bodies in India—the Chambers of Commerce, for example, and the Universities—those who sit on them are nearly all nominate members themselves; and anything emanating from them would hardly be considered to emanate from the people themselves, or to constitute a true, or indeed any, representation of the people. There was a suggestion made by the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) on the other side of the House. He thinks it advisable to select 16 large cities, and to take care that such cities should cover every possible variety of opinion, and that they should be instructed to send members to the Provincial and Legislative Councils. That is a suggestion which may or may not be carried out; but I believe that, to a certain extent, it would meet the views of many Indian reformers if such a step were taken. I am glad to think that Lord Salisbury, in the remarks which I have quoted, has, at any rate, made an advance on the position which he has taken up on former occasions with respect to Indian reform. I hope the “black man” controversy is closed, and that the noble Marquess will never again be heard to use words so calculated to wound the feelings of the great body of our fellow-citizens in India. I think he also stated before that the idea of election was entirely foreign to the Indian mind and to Indian institutions. If so, it would seem to me that his recent speech, and what he allowed to pass with his tacit approval in another place, show that he now takes, I hope, a broader view both of his own and our duties and responsibilities in India. I am glad to think that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian has also given us very clear indication as to what we may expect from any Government of which he may be at the head, by the terms in which he referred to the employment of the elective principle in India during the recent debate in this House. Although I do not wish to occupy the time of the House by reading many long extracts from what he said, I think I should put on record the pledges which he made to this House on that occasion. Speaking in the Debate on the Second Reading of this Bill the right hon. Gentleman said—

“It is quite evident that the great question we have before us is the question of the introduction of the elective element into the Government of India. That question overshadows and absorbs everything else; it is a question of vital importance. While the language of the Bill cannot be said to embody the elective principle, it is very peculiar language, unless it is intended to pave the way for the adoption of that principle. I believe it was suggested by a nobleman in the House of Lords, who is friendly to the elective principle in India, that unless it had been intended to leave room for some peculiarities not yet introduced into the Indian system, in the appointment of the members of the Councils under this Bill, it would have been a very singular form of speech to provide not simply that the Governor-General might nominate, but that he might make regulations as to the conditions under which such nominations should be made, either by himself or by the Government in Council. It is plain, I think we must assume, that those who have adopted the language have in their view something beyond mere nomination. What I desire, above all, is not that there shall be produced at the moment an imposing and magnificent structure, but that there shall be the introduction of that which in itself is in real sympathy with the hearts and minds of the people of India. All these things induce us to look forward cheerfully to a great future for India, and to expect that a real success will attend the genuine application, even though it may be a limited one, of the elective principle to the Government of that vast and almost immeasurable community. My hon. Friend, in moving the Amendment, has pointed out authorities in favour of the elective principle, these including men who have been responsible for the actual administration of India. These men, notwithstanding that responsibility, have entirely exempted themselves from whatever prejudices administration may have entailed on them, and they have distinctly and deliberately sanctioned the introduction of this elective principle. It is there that we stand upon solid ground, and Her Majesty's Government ought to understand that it will be regarded as a most grave disappointment if, after all the assurances we have received that an attempt will be made to bring into operation this powerful engine of government, there should not be some result such as we anticipate from their action."

And then he says—

"I do not think there is on that (the Government) side of the House any jealousy of the introduction into India of that principle, which undoubtedly, if it did exist, would form a strong mark of difference between the Party who sit there and the Party who sit on this side of the House. In reality and in substance we have the same objects in view, and are prepared to recommend the employment of the same means."

Well, I think that these extracts, though they are, perhaps, a little too long, seem to me to pledge the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian up to the hilt to effective action on this question. The Duke of Devonshire, then Lord Hartington, when replying to a deputation some years ago, also spoke in favour of the introduction of the elective principle into the Councils of India. I am led to believe, Sir, that the elective principle, is necessary; and I think it would be a great advantage to India if it were introduced with respect to the persons selected for the Provincial and Legislative Councils of India. There is one, other, last reason why I think this reform should be carried out. In the time of the East India Company Parliament was especially watchful of the Government of India; and on the renewal of the Charter every 30 years the most searching inquiry was made into all the abuses which could be alleged against the East India Company. I believe Burke said that it was the first duty of a Member of Parliament to be very jealous of the Executive Government; and I trust that the Members of this House will take a considerable interest in the affairs of India. They have been far too much neglected in past years. The Debate on the Indian Budget has always been postponed to the Dog Days; and it is high time that new methods and a new system should be introduced into this House. I have much pleasure in moving my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 5, after the word "Council," to insert the words "elected as hereinafter provided for, and."—(Mr. Schwann.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(4.12.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): I observe that the hon. Member has devoted the greater part of his speech to a general discussion on the merits of the elective system in India and to other topics of Indian or Anglo-Indian interest rather than to a recommendation of the particular scheme of election, as I understand, which he desires to graft on this Bill. From the wording of his Amendment, which runs, "elected as hereinafter provided for," I should gather that the whole of his electoral scheme is comprehended in this Amendment; and supposing his Amendment, as I trust it will be, is rejected by the Committee, there will go at one sweep all the other Amendments which he proposes to introduce into the Bill, and which define the electoral system he here refers to in general terms. I think, therefore, it will be my duty, and I think it will be to the advantage of the Committee, if I take the elective system "as hereinafter provided for," which the hon. Member refers to, and state at once the reasons for which it is impossible for the Government to accept it, or to allow this Amendment to appear in the Bill. Now the hon. Member proposes by means of this Amendment to graft an injunction on to the Bill embodying an extensive electoral scheme. In the first place he proposes a large number of additional members on the Councils, of whom not less than one-third nor more than one-half is to be elected. It is not my duty to discuss that point now, because it obviously arises upon a later Amendment which the hon. Member may be perfectly willing to move, whether his views as to election are entertained or not. In the next place he leaves the nature of the constituency in his electoral scheme, and also the actual number of persons to be elected, to be determined by the Viceroy. He then refers to what he euphemistically describes as "the reasonable representation of minorities." Under his proposal election is to be by ballot, and the franchise is to be conferred on not less than two per cent. of the inhabitants of the territory under the Council in question. And, finally, those gentlemen who are elected to the Councils are to hold office for a period of three years. That, Sir, is the elaborate and complicated, but I think, also, the diffident and ambiguous, system of election which comes under the head of these words "elected as hereinafter provided for," and which the hon. Member wants to introduce into this Bill. Now I am placed in some difficulty in discussing these questions because the hon. Member, having, as I have said, devoted the whole of his speech to purely general considerations which appear to me only to touch the fringe of the subject, has failed altogether to give the Committee any information upon the nature of these proposals or upon the reasons which led him to make them. These proposals are not, so far as I know, the offspring of the hon. Member's own ingenuity. They are taken verbatim from the second of the two Indian Councils Bills, introduced into this House by the late hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh). Now, Sir, the Government are absolutely unable to accept this elaborate electoral scheme as being altogether outside what they consider the legitimate province of interference of this House with the Government of India, and as altogether outside the scope of this Bill. The object of the Government, and the object of this Bill, as I explained in the Debate on the Second Reading, is, in so far as the elective principle is capable of being introduced into India, to leave the manner, the date, and the mode of its introduction absolutely to the Viceroy. They are unwilling to interfere with his discretion in the matter. That is the intention of the Government, and that it is also a wise intention was recognised by no less an authority than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian himself. The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has quoted from that right hon. Gentleman; but he did not quote the most significant part of his speech; and from the extract which the hon. Member gave, if it stood alone, one might draw a totally different inference from that speech from what the right hon. Gentleman himself intended to convey by it. What did the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian say? He spoke as follows:—

"I think I may fairly say that what the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary did embody in his speech was the elective principle in the only sense in which he could be expected to embody it. My construction of that speech is—and I do not think it admitted of two constructions, especially considering the reference the hon. Gentleman made to the speeches of Lord Kimberley—my construction of that speech is that it is the intention of the Government and the intention of the House of Lords, in which we are now invited to concur, that a serious effort shall be made to consider carefully those elements which India in its present condition may furnish for the introduction into the Councils of India of the elective principle. Now, Sir, if that effort is to be made, by whom is it to be made? I do not think it can be made by this House except through the medium of empowering provisions. I doubt if it would be well or wise on our part, with our imperfect knowledge, to proceed with the determination of the particulars of any plan. The best course we could take would be to commend to the authorities of India what is a clear indication of the principles on which we desire them to proceed. It is not our business to devise machinery for the purpose of Indian Government; it is our business to give to those who represent Her Majesty in India ample information as to what we believe to be sound principles of government; and it is, of course, the function of this House to comment upon any case in which we may think they have failed to give due effect to those principles. But in the discharge of their high administrative functions, or as to the choice of means, we should leave that in their hands."

Well, these were the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. I understood they were accepted on that side of the House, and undoubtedly it was in deference to these opinions that the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman himself was withdrawn. But I am bound to point out that if the Amendment which he is now moving were carried it would be absolutely fatal to this Bill, and it would be taking up an attitude wholly inconsistent with the attitude which he adopted two or three weeks ago. As regards the general disquisitions with which the hon. Member favoured us about the advantages of the electoral system to India, it is not my desire to repeat the reasons which I endeavoured to state before, why the Government believe that a general scheme of representative government is wholly impossible in that country. I endeavoured to point out then, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham pointed out with much greater knowledge and ability than I can command, that the idea is essentially foreign to the Oriental mind, that there are many classes in India to whom it would be not only uncongenial but to whom it would be absolutely repugnant, that no scheme could be devised which would in any degree represent the people of India, and that it is very doubtful whether we have any right to speak of the people of India at all if any unity or homogeneousness is supposed to be predicated by such a title. I will not repeat those general considerations upon this occasion; I will only allude to one observation which fell from the hon. Member in his speech just now. He said that the elective principle was already actively at work in the Municipalities of India, and that the result showed that it had been eminently successful. But these elected bodies are still upon their trial; and the system has not been universally applied. In many cases the Government have had to make other arrangements because the system is not understood, and not appreciated, and not desired by the people. It has not been received with any enthusiasm in India. It has been found that the people are very apathetic about its adoption, and that they cannot assimilate the idea of election at all readily, that many of the best men—the traders and business men—have held aloof, that it is very difficult to get the best men to come forward if elected, and that in many cases obstacles are raised where there is any difference of religious opinion, as for instance in the cases of Hindoos and Mahomedans. Therefore, I think that argument is not one of very great value. Now as regards the scheme of the hon. Member itself. With regard to the question of additional members, as I have said, I shall leave that point for discussion upon a later Amendment. The hon. Member is prepared to leave the question of the constituencies entirely to the Viceroy. Well, that shows that he has a confidence in the Viceroy, which must no doubt be very complimentary to that statesman; but it also shows that he has a diffidence in himself which is highly significant; and all the more so when contrasted with the minute instructions on certain particulars that he has introduced into his scheme. The attitude of the hon. Member appears to me to be like that of a man giving an order for a church to an architect, who insists upon certain small details, such as the arrangement of the pews and the reredos, but leaves entirely to the judgment of the architect what the style of the architecture is to be, whether Gothic, or Palla-dian, or Romanesque. Then the hon. Gentleman asks for the reasonable representation of minorities. But what would be regarded as reasonable representation by a Hindoo would not be regarded as reasonable representation by a Mussulman, and what would be regarded as reasonable representation by a Brahmin would not be regarded as reasonable representation by a Parsee. Why, even in this country we have not yet succeeded in arriving at a reasonable scheme of representation of minorities. The next provision of the hon. Member's scheme is that the franchise is to be bestowed on not less than two per cent. of the inhabitants of the district in question. Has the hon. Gentleman any idea whatever of how that plan would work out in practice? We believe it to be utterly fantastic, and that it would be extending the franchise in India far below the lowest point which has ever yet been touched in England after the lapse of centuries. Take the case of the North-West Provinces, where already a Council exists. In that district the total number of persons who can read or write any of the elementary native tongues, including those who are under instruction at school, is under three per cent. I presume the hon. Member does not propose to extend the franchise to those who are at school. This proposal, therefore, would give every man in that country who can read or write the right to vote at an election. After the lapse of centuries we have not yet arrived at manhood suffrage in England; and yet the hon. Member coolly proposes to introduce a system into India which descends to an even lower point in the intellectual scale. The next item in the proposal is that the members of the elected body should hold office for three years, and that point will probably be dealt with when the hon. Member moves an Amendment on the subject later on. Without repeating my remarks on the general subject, but dealing with the scheme as it is adumbrated by the hon. Member, I hope I have shown that it is an ill-digested scheme, and, if carried into operation, would be found unworkable. If this particular Amendment were carried out it would be incompatible with the object of this Bill, and with the interpretation placed upon it by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, and would be antagonistic to the cause of good government in India.

(4.30.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I think it is the duty of the House to say how India shall be governed as it has done in the case of our other Colonies. We should bear in mind what the feelings of the people of India are upon this subject. So far as I have been able to gather, they ask to be allowed to elect at least one-half of the members of the Councils, and I cannot for the life of me understand why we cannot consent to the adoption of such a moderate request, especially bearing in mind that the Councils of India have not much to do with the government of the country. We are now educating, or we are attempting to educate, the people of India, and we are asking that they shall be given some small share in the government of their country. The people of India ask for it themselves through British residents in that country who understand it well, and who say that there are a sufficient number of people educated in India who might be safely entrusted with a more active share in the government of the country. There can be no doubt whatever that there are at the present time a large number of people in India who are demanding what is called Home Rule in that country, and the adoption of the elective principle is desired with the view of preventing a much larger and more unfortunate question arising by-and-by. The hon. Gentleman who moved this Amendment referred to the Local Boards, and he said that they are working satisfactorily and with considerable success. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India denied that they are working well, but he failed to give a single case in support of his statement. I therefore take it that the assertion of the hon. Member is worth more than that of the Under Secretary for India. The people of India may rest assured that when the Radicals of this country come into power—as they will no doubt before long—they will do what is just and right towards them, and enable them to assist in governing their own country in a better manner than it is governed at the present time. Instead of India then being a source of weakness to this country it will be strong enough to protect itself against any outside foe. So far as we can see, the present Government are opposed to the adoption of the elective principle in India, although the people of that country are asking for it. I trust, however, that the people of India will go on asking for its adoption in the reasonable and temperate manner in which they have asked for it at their Conferences during the past five or six years, and that before long we shall be able, owing to their advanced state of education, to grant them their request.

(4.42.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I agree very warmly with the desire that the elective principle should be recognised, and that the Government should find some means of adopting it in India. Eminent English officials in that country say that one of the greatest difficulties that our Government have to encounter in that country is that of ascertaining what the feeling of the people really is. It is undoubtedly the opinion of the Government (as it is of the Viceroy) that the reforms proposed by this Bill will enable the Government of India to ascertain more fully and in a more authoritative way than before what the opinion of the population is, and what their wishes and feelings are with regard to the various questions affecting them which come before the Legislature. It is perfectly true—as has been said by the Under Secretary for India—that the feelings of the Oriental population with regard to this question of nomination and election are almost entirely opposite to the feelings of the people here, but it is also true that the elective principle has many advantages over the nominative principle. The elected member is above the feeling that he must conform to the wishes of those who appoint him. Those who know only a little about India must be aware that the nominated members of the Councils in India feel themselves bound to act in accordance with the wishes of those who appoint them. There have, of course, been some remarkable exceptions, but on the whole they feel a certain difficulty in opposing measures which the Government introduce, or in expressing themselves with the requisite freedom with regard to them. It is certainly, therefore, desirable that there should be an independent expression of opinion on the Councils, and I think that can only be obtained by adopting the elective principle. The value of an independent opinion would be very much diminished if the people of India did not believe that it sprung from the genuine feeling of those who represented them. For that reason, and for other reasons that I need not go into, I believe that there are many Members of this House—and I need not confine my remarks to this House alone—who desire to see the elective principle largely introduced into India, and who also feel a very strong and confident hope that it will be introduced into that country. We know that eminent officials hold such views, and we have no reason to believe that the opinion of the present Viceroy is at variance with them. I, for one, should be extremely glad if the House had the opportunity of asserting that principle. But how do we stand with regard to the question now? My hon. Friend the Member for Manchester comes before us with a series of Amendments, and some of the points he raises relates to matters which would require a great deal of debate.

MR. CURZON: The hon. Member would commit the House to the adoption of the system of election.

MR. BRYCE: I should hardly think that would be so. Possibly Mr. Courtney could tell us whether it would be so.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): The Amendment indicates that something must be done, but it does not say what.

MR. BRYCE: I should be sorry to tie the hands of the Indian Government by any specific Amendment, and to make them unwilling to do what they might otherwise be willing to do in a large and generous way. On the Motion for the Second Reading of this Bill the Under Secretary for India said it would be competent for the Governor General in the interpretation of this Bill, if so advised, to introduce the elective principle. Therefore, although I feel as strongly as any Member on this question, I shall be unable to support the Amendment of the hon. Member, and I would ask him not to divide the Committee upon it.

*(4.57.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): If the hon. and learned Member who has just sat down (Mr. Bryce) had more personal knowledge than he possesses of the system under which our Indian bureaucracy now works, he would not entertain the hope which he has just expressed that there ever will be any practical application of the elective principle which is said to exist in theory in this Bill. The only clause which is supposed to contain such a principle, even in theory, is not to be put in force unless on the initiative of the Indian Government itself. Now, I am convinced from a very long personal experience in India, extending over 30 years, that the system of government in that country is such as would render it perfectly hopeless and impossible for any Government, however courageous it might be, to put such a principle in motion of its own accord. I desire to remind the Committee of a circumstance which I think is of great gravity, but which, I believe, has not been mentioned in the Debates upon this Bill. It is that the need for the introduction of the elective principle has greatly increased rather than lessened, as compared with 35 years ago. Her Majesty's Government and this House were then held to possess something of the position of a Judge as to the doings of the Indian Company. The Board of Control, although it was not altogether efficient, still had considerable effect as a Court of Review, and Her Majesty's Government and this House also were inclined to view with jealousy the exercise of irresponsible power by the Government at Calcutta. In the days of the East India Company its proceedings were periodically reviewed in this country. Every 20 years the Charter had to be renewed, and on such occasions the Company was put more or less on its defence. But now all that is altered. The Board of Control has gone; there are no Charter renewals now; and Her Majesty's Government has meantime so changed its attitude that it has now practically become the advocate of the Government of India instead of, as formerly, its Judge. For this reason I say there is a strong official argument that the time has come when the voice of the people of India should be heard in the Legislative Council of India. I do not believe that the Secretary of State for India, as his office is at present constituted, is really aware how little information is afforded to Her Majesty's Government by what I may call the rank and file of the officials of the Government of India. I say there has grown up a system whereby all adverse Reports made by district officials are at this moment "burked" on their way to the Governors of the Presidencies, or, at all events, to the Governor General. At this moment, in provincial centres such as Commissionerships, there are pigeon-holes cram-full of documents which have been "burked" in the way I have mentioned, because of their pessimistic character. The reason is not far to seek. Under such a system as obtains in India the collection of Revenue is the end and aim of the existence of the Government; and that being so, it is perfectly natural that a district officer, impressed with the increasing poverty of the people, who writes a Report for the consideration of the Government, should be discouraged in every possible way from putting that document forward. Indeed, I have known instances where such an officer, impressed by the wants and even by the starvation of the people, has, when his Report has reached head-quarters, found that the writing of such Reports was not the best way of finding promotion in his service. That feeling has now got abroad, and the result is that fewer and fewer adverse Reports are written by Anglo-Indian officials every year. Hence it is perfectly clear that the necessity for hearing the views of the population by their own mouthpieces yearly increases. Can the right hon. Gentleman opposite explain why the Government of India, through its officers, is so extremely jealous of allowing the people to express their views in the manner proposed? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that at the present moment in the State of Mysore there is an elected body of cultivators which meets, discusses, and has published reports of its proceedings? I have often referred with the greatest pleasure and profit to the information which is thus supplied to the Native Ruler by the cultivators rising in their places and plainly declaring what are their real wants and woes. Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Secretary of State for India has any objection to a Motion whereby, if the elective principle be not directly applied to the Legislative Council, a proviso may be introduced authorising or directing an assemblage of the representative cultivators for the Provinces of British India similar to that which takes place in Mysore? If there still is, as in the past, a rooted objection on the part of the Government of India to sanction such a scheme, I venture to say that no intelligible reason can be stated for such an attitude, unless it be that our rulers fear rather than desire to know the truth. If such representative bodies are created, I believe that the information which will be supplied to their rulers will not only be most valuable, but will be such as to stagger the Government of India itself, and bring to it knowledge which it at present excludes from its consideration as only existing in the minds of certain members of the Indian Congress, of whose views it contemptuously takes no account. I could mention other States in which the representative principle has been accepted, and is working, although in a small degree, very happily. There is only one further point to which I want to refer, and that is the enormous difficulty at present existing as to anything like a true publication even of the official Reports such as they are. I adduce this also in support of the contention that the Government of India is not duly made aware of the wants of the people. I could point out instance after instance in which Reports of a melancholy or pessimistic nature have, when they came to be alluded to in the interesting volume called The Return of the Moral and Material Progress of India, had their character rendered the reverse of that which was intended when they were launched by those responsible for them. If I may venture to count my 30 years' experience as anything, I caution the Committee against refusing this Amendment; because if we refuse to give the people of India an outlet for the expression of their views and wants, I have no hesitation in saying that a crisis—nay, even a catastrophe—will occur in a very few years' time, not in consequence of race disaffection or anything of that kind, but from increasing poverty, decadence of the soil, absence of manure, the reduction of cattle, and the starvation of the people, which will necessarily subvert the very foundations of our enormously expensive Indian Government.

Mr. Seymour Keay

*MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I do not think the House possesses an experience of Indian affairs which will justify us in laying down a general scheme of election; but, at the same time, I consider that we should clearly urge the Government of India to introduce the elective principle in some form. I, for my part, should be satisfied if we had one single Amendment asking the Government of India to add to the Council a certain number of elected members, leaving that Government a free hand to devise the machinery by which members shall be elected. I think, too, we might also leave to them to fix the number. I feel strongly the truth of much that has fallen from the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and agree that we must provide an outlet for the expression of the grievances of the people, which are deeper than this House is aware of. I also share in those dark forebodings, because I do believe that most of the people are suffering from excessive poverty, and I am convinced that India abounds with serious discontent, which will never find adequate expression until there is some application of the electoral principle. Therefore I hope the House will use this opportunity of instructing the Government of India to adopt the representative principle in some form or other, and especially so seeing that it may be many years before we have such an opportunity again. I think we shall be committing a great mistake, indeed a dereliction of duty, if we do not give definite intimation that it is the opinion of this House that there should now be an inception in India of the principle under discussion. I think that the Bill should be more explicit, knowing, as I do, the unwillingness of the Indian Government to have its prerogatives interfered with, and I very much doubt whether there will be any practical result in the absence of definite instructions.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I had hoped that, after the judicious speech made by the hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce), the hon. Member the Mover of this Amendment (Mr. Schwann), would have been brought once more to the judicious manner in which he acted on a similar occasion; but such, it seems, is not to be our fate. Hence it is necessary that someone on this side of the House should say a few words in support of the Government measure. In reference to what has just fallen from the hon. Member, I hope the Under Secretary of State will not say one word more than he has already said, for I venture to think that, according to the best opinion in India, as much has been said on the subject as can be said at the present time. As the House is kind enough to remember, I am rather in favour of the introduction of such a principle; but I am above all things a practical person; and I am very well aware of the extreme distrust and apprehension with which this measure is viewed by many, both at home and abroad, for whose opinion I have the greatest respect. In my opinion this Bill paves the way for the introduction of the principle, and it leaves matters to the resident Executive. That is just as it should be. One great difficulty in this matter—and remember I speak as a man who is somewhat in favour of the principle—is that nobody in India among the vast congeries of population, except one limited class, the Indian Congress, cares anything for the elective principle. That is a class for whom I have the highest respect and regard, and I shall not repeat all I have said during previous Debates in this House to show that it represents nothing but itself. The great defect of the Congress is that it never has succeeded in acquiring popularity from its own countrymen, or attaching to itself the confidence of the people of India. This Amendment would thoroughly commit the House to the very principle which was argued in the Debate on the Second Reading, and which we had hoped was laid to rest. According to the Bill the introduction of the elective principle was to be left to the Government of India, whereas this Amendment absolutely commits the Government to the principle. Why, if this Amendment were carried, the Government of India would have no option but to at once proceed to have elected members of the Council, and its effect would be to say the Council shall consist of elected members. Then, of course, there must be some sort of election, and I venture to say that the system which has been adumbrated is nothing more than the most shadowy outline of a possible electoral system for a vast country comprising the most indistinct terms. But, whatever it foreshadowed, it would commit the Governor General to a system of constituencies, and I confidently assert that no human wit can devise a system of constituencies for such a country. How is the House to send out to India a specific instruction to set up a system of which we have no idea whatever as to how it could be worked, or carried out, or even introduced? In this scheme there is one particular point to which the Under Secretary of State for India referred. It was this. The hon. Member proposes that not less than two per cent. of the population should be enfranchised. That proposal looks mild at first sight, but really it means a great deal. Take, for instance, the North-West Provinces. There two per cent. of the population would mean 620,000 electors, and I do not know where the Lieutenant-Governor of those Provinces would find them. Then take such a country as Bengal, where one would have to find 1,100,000 electors. I do not know where they could be found, and I, who have governed that country, assert that they could not be found. You would have to drag them from the highways and bye-ways, and when you got them would find it impossible for them to understand what the system meant. In the other Provinces there would be still greater difficulty. This is my main objection to the Amendment, but there are one or two points which seem to call for passing reference. The hon. Member for Manchester quoted the words of the European Press, and spoke disparagingly of them.

MR. SCHWANN: Anglo-Indian.

SIR R. TEMPLE: Yes; they are European though, just as much as we are. They are our countrymen, educated here and born here; and by what right, then, does the hon. Member speak of them as Anglo-Indians and not as Europeans? He said that they were opposed to the principle of the electoral system, and that they had failed to do their duty to the people of India because they refused to recommend the adoption of the electoral principle. I say their conduct demands our respect, because they are independent Englishmen, capable of judging and understanding the state of affairs, whose advice should be accepted by the House. They live in the country, and knowing the dangers and various pitfalls are not prepared to approve of what is proposed. Well, Sir, something has been said by more than one Member about his unwillingness to introduce the system of Parliamentary government. Hardly had the words escaped the hon. Member's lips when another hon. Member below the Gangway said he did wish to introduce that system or something like Home Rule. Now, it might be true that in the first instance the hon. Member for Manchester, who moved the Amendment, did not wish to introduce Parliamentary government. He knows very well that it would not do in India. Those who have to fight and defend the country are the people with whom the responsibility of government must rest, and those who know India best know that for valour and energy they must look principally to the European Administrators there. The hon. Member for Manchester must know all this. And, therefore, he may not be desirous to immediately introduce the Parliamentary system. But what he wishes to do is to prepare such a Council for the government of India as would be able to bring pressure to bear upon the Viceroy, who, although he alone was responsible for the safety and welfare of the country, would, nevertheless, be bound by bonds that would oblige him to regulate the Government by a Parliamentary system. The hon. Member also knows what that means. It is to gradually prepare the bonds which, although loose at first, would, if accepted by the European Samson, gradually be drawn tighter until at last he has become Samson Agonistes. How would it all end? It would end in the natives having all the power and the benefit of British rule, whilst we should alone have to bear the onerous burden of responsibility. Now, Sir, I will conclude by saying that you can no more speak of the people of India than of the people of Europe or of Asia. There is in India a vast congeries of population. It is a sort of colluvies gentium, of which no parallel is to be found on the European Continent. The fact is, India is made up of peoples of various nationalities and habits of thought, languages, and religious observances, which have no sympathy the one with the other. The delicate Bengalee differs from the sturdy yeoman of the North-Western Provinces. He again differs from the martial and loyal Sikh of the Punjab and from other races of the country. They are united in nothing except the golden bond of British rule and loyalty to the Queen-Empress of India.

Sir R. Temple

*(5.40.) MR. SCHWANN: I do not wish to detain the Committee at any length, but I should like to reply to the remarks of the hon. Baronet so far as many Hindoo gentlemen are concerned. I maintain that during the Indian Mutiny there were wonderful examples of heroism shown by Indian gentlemen and officials, who, at the risk of their own lives, did much to defend and save the lives of others. I think it would be a shame to allow this opportunity to pass without defending them from the aspersions of the hon. Baronet in this House.

(5.42.) SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I rise to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Manchester. I do not wish to say I agree with the arguments which the hon. Member for Manchester has brought forward; but if I were in doubt about the matter and were inclined to support his arguments the strongest confirmation that I should have received would have been drawn from the remarks which fell at the last moment from the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple). What did he say? He said, "You are not dealing in India with a people." I suppose he meant:—You are not dealing with one nationality; and then he went on to describe the extreme diversity which exists amongst the varied population of that country. I think that statement must have forced upon most of our minds the absolute necessity of getting, so far as the government of the country is concerned, an expression of public opinion from those various component parts. If you stand in India as an alien Government, and are administering the affairs of a vast population of people numbering 230 millions, it is absolutely essential to have a thorough expression of public opinion on the part of that population. I quite agree with my hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for India that this Amendment of my hon. Friend behind me is not a practicable Amendment on account of the conditions which surround it. But so far as the Amendment itself is concerned—and as it is not hampered by any conditions—I think we should have some response from the hon. Member opposite in charge of the Bill, to whom application has been made by several Members on this side of the House, asking him to introduce into it words which would make it plain to the authorities in India that the electoral principle is accepted by this House. I do not mean that he is to tell the authorities to adopt the principle at once or to make any arrangements which might appear to them to be undesirable or likely to produce danger and discontent, but to lay down, as a principle accepted by this House, that the electoral principle should be adopted in any future arrangements which are made for constituting the Legislative Bodies of India. I would ask the Under Secretary to say if he could not accept in place of the present Amendment words providing that the additional members shall be eligible whether elected or nominated. I think if something of that sort were adopted by the Government much of the discussion now taking place would be found unnecessary. I understand my hon. Friend is inclined to withdraw his Amendment if the Amendment per se is accepted by the Government. Passing on I wish to make one remark with regard to another matter. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham said there were none in India who could replace in valour and intellect the men concerned in the administration. I am sure from his knowledge of India he does not mean by those terms to pass censure upon the great population of which so many deserve commendation for similar qualities. I am perfectly well aware of individual cases which show distinctly that amongst the native population there are men competent by valour and administrative ability to take the very places that the hon. Member says they cannot take. I have only just referred to this point because I feel sure it was not the intention of my hon. Friend to asperse the character of these people; but I could not listen to his remarks without saying a word in their defence.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: I meant no aspersion upon the spirit and character of our Indian fellow-subjects. I have reason to acknowledge that they possess those qualities. But what I meant to say and still say is that for valour and capacity and energy—which are necessary for crises of danger—they are not equal to, and cannot replace, Europeans.

*MR. SCHWANN: After the Debate which has taken place, and which I consider more or less satisfactory—although we have not been able to obtain a definite pledge from the Government—I think it would be desirable to withdraw my Amendment which with the permission of the House I now beg to do.

(5.50.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I think the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India will consider it to be only fair on his part to make some response to the many appeals we have made to him as to whether he will incorporate in this Bill some express declaration admitting the electoral principle. Now we all know what took place on the Second Reading of this Bill. In reply to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, on that occasion the Under Secretary of State for India admitted to the full that the electoral principle was involved in the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury admitted it too. Now, I ask would it not be better, as the Bill will be worked by friendly Viceroy, to remove all cause of contention and to satisfy the aspirations of the people of India—because many millions are watching the progress of the Bill with great attention—by incorporating in the Bill the electoral principle. At the same time I would guard against putting any pressure on any Viceroy to take advantage of that principle, but what I would do would be to give a free hand to the Viceroy and the Lieutenant Governors. The electoral principle can alone bring about that political training which every stable Government, like that of the British Government in India, must desire to see fostered. Public spirit cannot be created without entrusting people with certain privileges and a certain amount of political power. If that is done we shall not hear anything about Samson Agonistes. Now, I would ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it looks well to allow the right hon. Member for Midlothian in the most express terms to say that the electoral principle is involved in this Bill—to allow it to remain doubtful, hidden away in the most remote corner of Sub-section 4—and yet not incorporate it in the Bill in an open way. If the hon. Member will forgive me, I may say that I do not think it is fair to place too much stress on my hon. Friend's Amendments “as hereafter provided.” I do not think my hon. Friend would place—I know I would not—very much reliance on these details, though they come no doubt with some substantial authority, because my recollection is that these details are the very details endorsed by the Indian Congress. Defects can easily be found in details, but the principal question now before us is whether we cannot embody in the Bill the electoral principle. I, myself, would much prefer that the Viceroy should at their own discretion exercise the electoral principle and choose their own constituencies. But, however that may be, I am sure every English legislator will agree with me when I say that it is absolutely essential for the Viceroy to be surrounded by people who voice the feelings of the natives at large, and will be able to give him, not an opinion—he wants not the opinion of those prophets who prophesy—but the real and honest facts as to what are the wishes, wants, and feelings and prejudices of the people. That cannot be done in a society far less complex than that of India—an independent community like our own—if members are only nominees. What I want to see in the Legislative Bodies of India are men who can speak with authority. In order to accomplish that object, I want the electoral principle to be plainly incorporated in the Bill. When we come to the other Amendments I will undertake to prove that not one thing is conceded to the people of India by this Bill. It is a shame. These people are dependent on us, and we should treat them with generosity, and avoid all pretence and duplicity with them. I feel very keenly on this, and I have taken a long journey to be able to say my humble say on this matter. I will ask the Under Secretary of State for India to give us an expression of the electoral principle in the Bill that we can construe as such, at the same time providing for the discretionary power of those responsible. I think I am not unjustified in asking him to do this, as it will facilitate the operations of this Bill and make it successful in India.

*(5.58.) MR. CURZON: Out of courtesy to the hon. Member I cannot refuse to answer so direct an appeal; but, at the same time, I cannot undertake so far to adopt his suggestion as to add anything to this Bill to make more clear that which I think is already sufficiently clear. If I may quote from myself in the Debate on the Second Reading, when referring to the sub-section that has been alluded to, I used these words—

“Undoubtedly the words of the clause were designedly introduced by the Government with a clear apprehension of their meaning. I do not think there was any want of clearness in the terms in which I expressed the possible application of that clause at an earlier period of the evening. I endeavoured to give hon. Members to understand that it has been designed to give perfect latitude to the Viceroy in this matter, and that it will admit of the introduction of the principle of representation in India; whether the system be election, or selection or delegation, or whatever the precise method may be that recommends itself to the Government of the Viceroy.”

Those words expressed with perfect clearness both the intention of the Government in introducing the sub-section and the probable interpretation that will be put upon it by the Viceroy, and I have nothing to add to what I said upon that occasion.

(6.0.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I put it to any Member of the House whether any Governor-General would not consider himself limited by the term “nomination” in this Bill for I do not find either the words “election” or “selection,” and I ask the House whether any Governor-General or Lieutenant-Governor would consider himself entitled to go outside the meaning of the word “nomination,” and apply the principle of election or even of selection in the most limited manner. I should be glad if the Under Secretary for India would in his answer state definitely whether that is so or not, but even that I apprehend would not be conclusive, because, if any difficulty arose upon the construction of this Bill it is perfectly obvious that the Judges who might have to interpret it would not be bound by words of a Minister of State ; they would be bound by the legal interpretation of the words of the Bill. The word "nomination" is in the Bill, the word "election" is not in the Bill, and there is so much difference of meaning between these two words that you will find it is the shadow and not the real thing which you are giving to the people of India.

Amendment negatived.

* (6.2.) MR. SCHWANN: I regret, in reply to an appeal that has been made to me, that I am not able to withdraw all the subsequent Amendments standing in my name, but I regard some of them as very important, and it would be advisable for us to consider them. With respect to the Amendment which I am now about to move it cannot be doubted that the proposal made by the Government for the number of additional members of the Governor-General's Council is far too small. That proposal practically only adds four to the number of that Council. At present the number of members of this Council stands at not less than six and not more than twelve, and the Government propose to increase these numbers to a minimum of ten and a maximum of 16. That seems to me to be a very paltry and miserable addition to the numbers of this Council, and the Committee should not lose sight of the fact that only half the number of these additional members must be non-official. Therefore, even of the additional members only a very small number are certain to be outsiders. This is a very unsatisfactory state in which to leave the question, and I venture to propose that where "ten" stands in the Bill the Committee should insert "forty." I venture to recommend this to the Committee because it is perfectly evident that so small a number in the Viceroy's Council could not practically give even a shadow of real representation to the Indian people. Many hon. Members who have not considered the various suggestions made in other quarters may consider that the number 40 is too large for the Viceregal Council. I can assure hon. Members that 40 is really rather a moderate number in comparison with other suggestions which have been made in recent years. Not very long ago the late Mr. Coleman Macaulay, C.S.I., Chief Secretary for a long time to the Governor of Bengal, laid before the Governor of India proposals for the re-construction both of the Provincial and Legislative Councils. I am sorry to say he died about a year and a half ago, and his death was a great loss to India. In his suggestion it was proposed that there should be 70 members for the Bengal Provincial Council, and it will be evident to the Committee that this number might give a reasonable representation to the people of India. A more recent suggestion has been made by Mr. H. J. Reynolds, to whom I have referred before, and I have no hesitation in laying his testimony before the Committee because he has had experience of both classes of Councils. He has been for six years a member of the Vice-regal Council, and for twelve years in the Bengal Council, and it seems to me that the opinion of an official who has spent some of the best years of his life in India and is not an agitator—for he is the last man in the world to whom that name could be applied—is entitled to considerable respect. He has laid a scheme before the public lately in a brochure in which he proposes that the Viceregal Council shall number 104 members. Of these 40 are to be elected by the eight large Provinces of India, which shall have five representatives each. But while he would give to this Council 40 elected members, he would also give 40 members nominated by the Government, so that both the two systems which have been alluded to in the course of this Debate would find a place in such a Council. It is further proposed that there should be on the Council twelve officials and twelve Native Princes, not of independent States but of States under the control of the Government of India. These proposals are much greater than the suggestions which I have ventured to make to the Committee. Instead of 40 members, as I propose, you have in one case a suggestion of 70 and in the other of 104 members. I will venture to read a few words from Mr. Reynolds' brochure, because I think his remarks on this point are well worth the attention of the House. He says—

Mr. Conybeare

“Enough has, I think, been said to show that these Councils, even the best of them, are Councils only in name, that they neither represent the public nor possess the public confidence.”

This, the Committee will remember, is from a man who has sat in both classes of Councils.

“And that if they were established with any idea of giving the people some voice in the making of the laws under which they live they have signally failed in attaining that object. Then deficiencies are due partly to the wording of the Act itself and partly to the vicious customs and rules of practice which have defaced and enfeebled the working of it. The objects of the former class with which we are at present concerned may be summarised as follows:—(1) The insufficiency of Councillors.”

The very first defect mentioned by Mr. Reynolds is the one we wish to remove by increasing the number of the Legislative and Provisional Councils.

“(2) The overwhelming preponderance of official members.”

This we want to correct by the proposals we are making.

“(3) The absence of any system of representative election; (4) The narrow limits to which the functions of the Councils are restricted; (5) The inability of the Local Councils to pass any law conflicting with an Act passed by the Council of the Governor General.”

These seem to me to be five very important points, and I venture to submit that my proposal increases to a very limited extent the number of additional members. If we look at this House we find 670 Members elected to represent the various sections of opinion in the United Kingdom. The object of having so large a number of Members is that on almost every subject there should be a number of Members who are practically experts; and it would be most valuable if the Viceroy in Council had the assistance of a number of experts who could give him an absolutely accurate picture of what is going on in the various Provinces they represent. It seems to me that we are asking no unreasonable thing in proposing a substantial addition to the number of the Legislative and Provincial Councils, and I move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 8, to leave out the word “ten,” and insert the word “forty.”—(Mr. Schwann.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘ten’ stand part of the Question.”

*(6.14.) Mr. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I am very glad that the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Schwann) has raised his point in the way he has, for he has shown most clearly that what is proposed by the Bill would be no substantial addition to the number of these Councils. As a matter of fact, the increase resolves itself into the figure two, and I think it will be admitted that that is an infinitesimal addition. It is true that the proposal of the Government is to add four members, but two of these are to be nominated, and the elected members—if that principle be admitted—can, therefore, be increased only by two. As to whether 40 will be a judicious figure I am not prepared to say, and it may be shown that such a number of members would be more or less unworkable. But I believe the division will be taken on whether the word “ten” stands part of the clause, so we shall not be pledging ourselves precisely to the figure 40 if we vote against the proposal of the Government, which I shall do.

(6.15.) Mr. MAC NEILL: I maintain that under this clause there is not expansion enough. There is no necessary addition to the number of members, and the only benefit derived from the Bill is in connection with the elective principle. The word “additional” does not mean that these additional members are re-inforcements of the body of members composing the original Council. The word “additional” is a generic term. It means any member who is not a member ex officio. Under the old system a Governor who exercised his power of nomination to the fullest extent could nominate two more men than a Governor under the new system need appoint unless he chose. It is not right to palm off on the people of India as a reform a proposal of this kind which is not a reform at all. I object to this proposal because it is a mere subterfuge and a juggle. It gives the people no real benefits while it professes to give them reform, and to my mind in some things the new system is worse than the old.

* (6.20.) SIR R. TEMPLE: The hon. Member is right so far. In round numbers I believe this Bill raises the old figures of from six to twelve additional Members to from ten to sixteen. I hope the Government will bear in mind that under existing circumstances it is very important to keep the number of additional members as low as is consistently possible because out of these additional members a certain number must be practically non-official, either European or native, most probably native. And if you have a large number of additional native members you must have something like a corresponding number of highly placed European official members. That I beg to inform the House is a practical necessity. Thus the result would be that you would have a number of highly placed and highly paid officials taken away at times from their employment, and their places would have to be taken by other officials, who would have to be highly paid for the work thrown upon them. Unnecessary places would have to be made and unnecessary expense incurred, and I hope the Under Secretary will bear this in mind before he makes any large concession such as is asked.

MR. MACNEILL: I should like to ask the hon. Baronet who has just sat down whether my contention with respect to additional members is not correct?

* SIR R. TEMPLE: Yes, certainly you are correct. The word "additional" means the number of members who are additional to the Executive Council and are appointed for legislation only.

* (6.22.) MR. CURZON: The Amendment which has been proposed, only deals, as I understand, with the Supreme Council, but as there are other Amendments which propose a larger addition to the numbers of the Provincial Councils, it would, perhaps, be well if I were to deal with them all together. In the first place let the House clearly understand the position. At the present moment in the Supreme Council the number of additional members is a minimum of six and a maximum of twelve. We propose a minimum of ten and a maximum of 16. The hon. Member for Manchester proposes a minimum of 40 but does not state a maximum. In the Madras and Bombay Councils the number of additional members at present is a minimum of four and a maximum of eight. We propose to raise those figures to eight and 20, and the hon. Member for Manchester proposes to raise the minimum to 30, but does not state a maximum. In Bengal, where the number is at present twelve, we propose 20, and the hon. Member for Manchester proposes a minimum of 30 and a maximum of 48. In the North-West Provinces, where the Council now numbers nine, we propose 15, and he proposes a minimum of 30 with a maximum of 36. The House will observe that the additions proposed by the Bill are very much smaller in the case of the Supreme Council than in the case of the Provincial Councils, and there is an essential difference between these two classes of Councils. The work they have to do and the consequent difference in the number of members required to do the work do not appear to have been properly appreciated. The hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. John Ellis) described our proposals as infinitesimal, but I must confess I do not see how he can apply this term to the proposals with respect to the Provincial Councils.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I was referring exclusively to the Supreme Council.

* MR. CURZON: Then with respect to the Amendment, I do not quite see the principle on which the hon. Gentleman has framed his own figures. Has he copied them straight from Mr. Bradlaugh's Bill? But Mr. Bradlaugh never had the opportunity of explaining his Bill to the House, and we are, therefore, in ignorance of the manner in which he arrived at his figures. First, with regard to the proposed addition of four members to the Supreme Council, I admit at once that that is a small addition; but I would remind Members of the House that the Government of India, who are certainly the best judges of the necessities of the Council, do not ask for any addition to the Supreme Council, and in my answer in the Debate on the Second Reading of this Bill, I gave very good reasons why a large increase in the numbers of the Supreme Council is not required. I also quoted a very strong opinion in the same sense expressed by Lord Northbrook, who, it will be admitted, knows more about this subject than do hon. Members opposite, or than I do myself. But, in spite of the opinions of persons best qualified to judge, there is now a proposal to raise the number of members to as much as 47, and yet the hon. Member describes his proposal as rather moderate. From one point of view I admit the proposal is moderate, but from another point of view it is grossly excessive. If he wants to turn the Supreme Council of the Viceroy into a Parliamentary Body analogous to this House I quite agree that the proposed addition is moderate, but with a knowledge of the functions of that Body and of the work it has to perform, I think that the proposal is altogether excessive. Our figures both with respect to the Supreme and the Provincial Councils have not been lightly arrived at. They are the result of communications between the Home Government and the Central and Provincial Governments of India extending over a period of years. I have already stated that the Government of India expressed their opinion that any large addition to the Supreme Council would involve an increase of expenditure without any corresponding increase of efficiency. With respect to Bombay the Governor at that time approved of the increase, but the rest of his Council thought that no increase was necessary. The Madras Council accepted the figures in the Bill. I think I can give the House very good general reasons against any further extension. In the first place, there is the difficulty which I touched upon on a former occasion of finding good men who are unemployed and willing to devote that part of their time which is necessary to the purposes of these Councils. On that occasion the right hon. Member for North-East Manchester (Sir James Fergusson) pointed out that a large number of gentlemen gave their time to attend the sittings of the Indian National Congress, but that is a very different matter from giving their time to the work of these Councils, for the Congress meets but once a year and sits, I believe, for a very short time, whilst a seat upon the Councils would involve attendance for at least two or three months in the year. There is another point. The more members there are on these Councils the longer will be the time spent on the debates, and the expenses must necessarily be greater. As the hon. Member knows, travelling expenses are allowed to the members, and also the expenses of residence; therefore, each additional member would be a direct additional expense. I would also point out that if the number of non-official members were increased the number of official members would, in the same ratio, have to be increased, since it must be perfectly clear that the Government must be in a majority, and to increase the number of official members would be to take them away from important duties elsewhere. An increase of members, too, would tend to produce results which are inseparable from popular Assemblies; by that I mean more especially the creation of two Parties. You cannot have these Councils on the scale contemplated by the hon. Member without the formation of a Government Party and an Opposition Party, and such a position in India would not only result in friction, but in the dislocation of Government altogether. The right hon. Member for Midlothian has described Opposition as being a position of greater freedom and less responsibility. But in India the opposition would be all freedom and no responsibility. Responsibility arises from the obligation to accept the results of Opposition; but in India that obligation can never arise, and it would be in the highest degree undesirable to promote that friction and possible hostility between Parties in these Councils which does not at present exist, and which I hope this House will do nothing to create.

Question put.

(6.35.) The Committee divided:—
Ayes 93; Noes 48.—(Div. List, No. 80.)

MR. SCHWANN: I do not propose, Sir, to move the subsequent Amendments which stand in my name. I accept the Division as an indication of the feeling of the House.

SIR W. FLOWDEN: The Amendment which stands in my name provides that where the Indian Councils Act is, under this Bill, extended to the Punjab, the number of nominated Councillors must be limited to a certain number, and so far, I think, merely carries out the proposals of the Government as applied to the localities where Councils already exist. Under the Act of 1861 power is taken to create a Council for the Punjab. However, I do not wish to press this part of the Amendment, as it is not a matter of great importance so far as the Punjab is concerned, as when the Act is extended the Government would naturally not give a higher nomination than in the other Councils. I move, Sir, the first part of my Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 24, at end, add—

"It shall be lawful for the Governor General in Council, when extending the provisions of the Indian Councils Act of 1861 to the territory known as the Punjab, to fix the number of councillors whom the Lieutenant Governor of the Punjab may nominate for his assistance in making laws and regulations at not more than twelve."—(Sir W. Plowden.)

*MR. CURZON: The existing law already empowers the Governor General in Council at any time to extend its provisions to the Punjab, and to declare the numbers whom the Lieutenant Governor may nominate. There is, therefore, no object in putting these words into the Bill. The only object of the Amendment, if carried, would be to prevent the Lieutenant Governor from appointing more than twelve Councillors. But I think it would be hardly wise or statesmanlike to tie the hands of the Indian Government in advance, or to impose numerical restrictions upon a Council which is not yet called into existence, and the date of whose birth is not even approximately known. For these reasons I venture to ask the hon. Member not to press the Amendment.

SIR W. PLOWDEN: I will not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR W. PLOWDEN: The second part of my Amendment is intended to provide for applying the provisions of the Act of 1861 to the large Chief Commissionerships, which already exist in the Central Provinces and Burmah, neither of which are provided for in the Act of 1861, and the provisions of that Act can only be extended to those countries by an extremely expensive process—making them into Lieutenant Governorships—which is a course I do not think the Government would be at all inclined to adopt. It would create an additional demand on the Public Purse for which there is no necessity. I believe it would be a great advantage, especially with regard to the second case, if a Council were created at once. There is always a difficulty in passing Indian legislation through Parliament; and unless this step is taken now, we might have to wait a considerable number of years before what is admitted to be desirable could possibly be carried into effect. I hope the Government will not be carried away by the idea that they can make Lieutenant Governorships of these countries, and so extend the Act of 1861 in that way. That would be a course indicative of an extravagant spirit which would be sure to be resisted.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 24, after the word "Oudh," to insert the words "The Governor General in Council may extend the provisions of 'The Indian Councils Act, 1861,' to any Chief Commissionership now in existence or subsequently created, provided that the number of councillors appointed in any such case shall not exceed one for each million of inhabitants in that territory."—(Sir W. Plowden.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*SIR R. TEMPLE: I cannot agree with the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and I hope the Government will not accept it. There are three Chief Commissionerships in contemplation. The first two are Burmah and Assam. These provinces are in a very crude condition and by no means fit for a Legislative Council, and such a measure is quite uncalled-for in their case. The third consists of the Central Provinces. I was myself the first Chief Commissioner there, and organized their Administration in its present shape. They have a large area no doubt; but they are in no wise desirous of anything of the kind, and the creation of a Legislative Council there might lead to embarrassing results.

Sir W. Plowden

*MR. CURZON: The Amendment of the hon. Gentleman consists of two parts: the first, referring to the possible creation of Councils for these districts which are now under Chief Commissioners; and the second, the ratio of the numbers of the Councils. Upon the first point the Government quite concur with the hon. Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple); they think that none of these districts are at present fitted for a Council, and they are of opinion that the creation of such bodies might produce results which would be disappointing. As to the suggested ratio of the number of Councillors to the population, I think the hon. Member must see that that would be an unfortunate principle to adopt, because if you adopt it in one Province why not in another? and it certainly could not be applied, say, to Bengal. In fixing the ratio of members the interests to be represented and the classes which constitute the bulk of the people ought to be the determining factors rather than the population. It would be unwise to prescribe for Councils, the date of the creation of which we cannot determine, a particular method of creation or a ratio of numbers, both of which might subsequently be found to be very disadvantageous to the district.

MR. BRYCE: The Amendment merely gives power and does not suggest the creation of a Council, and I think might have been accepted by the Government, and would from its very terms prevent that which the Under Secretary seems to fear. There is, doubtless, a difference between Assam and the Chief Commissionerships. I agree that Assam is not suited for a Council, but that would not apply to Burmah and the Central Provinces. No part of India has developed so rapidly as these Central Provinces, and it may be desirable in an appreciable time to extend the Act to these Chief Commissionerships, and it would be a pity for the Government to have to pass another Act to amend the Act of 1861. I should have thought the proposal of my hon. Friend was a harmless and safe one, and might have been acceded to. The Amendment does not make the ratio of members depend on the population, but says the number of members shall not exceed a certain ratio to the population.

(7.0.) MR. MAC NEILL: I regard the area of population as a matter of detail on which I say nothing. But everyone who has experience of this House knows the extreme difficulty of bringing in measures for amending the Indian Councils measure. The Indian Councils Act, which we are now endeavouring to modify, was passed no less than 30 years ago. This Bill, which is just now before the Committee, has been passing through the mill of the Lords to get to this House through three Sessions of Parliament. Now, the Government are stopping my hon. Friend who has moved this Amendment in order to keep anything like liberty from India and to prevent anything like the formation of public opinion in these Provinces. They are stopping him in reference to Burmah in order to prevent it in the future from having an Executive and Legislative Council, while at the present moment we are poisoning the people of Burmah with opium. Mr. Courtney, I beg to call your attention to the fact that the responsible Minister for India, who is in charge of this Bill, is not here; and I beg to move that you report Progress.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is inside the House.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that my hon. Colleague, who is in charge of this Bill, has only gone for one moment to consult an official under the Gallery, which is an ordinary and customary thing to do.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's and the hon. Gentleman's pardon. I did not know the Under Secretary was in the House. We are rather touchy on this subject, having regard to the systematic neglect with which India is treated in this House, and having regard to the fact that India still is, in the words of Mr. John Bright, simply a pasture land for smart young men. It is a great comfort that we have shorthand writers taking down what we say, and that what we say will be read in every bazaar and in every part of India.

I hope the people of India will note the manner in which the Government have dealt with this Amendment. My hon. Friend who has moved it desires to give the Governor General there power to extend the Councils in localities such as Assam, Burmah, and the Central Provinces. But the Governor General cannot be invested with this power now, and when public opinion is ripe enough to have Councils there we shall have to pass a measure for the purpose through the two Houses of Parliament. This Bill has been four years already before Parliament, from its inception to the Committee stage, and yet you strangle the suggestion that a Province of India should have a chance of getting a Council without four years of Parliamentary delay, in order to keep liberty from the people of India, and in order to outrage the people of India. I hope my hon. Friend will press his Amendment to a Division. It will show the true inwardness of the present Cabinet in passing this sham measure in regard to the people of India.

*(7.6.) MR. S. SMITH: I think the argument in favour of this Amendment and in favour of extending the Bill to Burmah is exceedingly strong. I see no reason whatever why Burmah should not enjoy the benefits of a Legislative Council. Burmah, as a whole, is a very large country; it is quite as large as many European countries, as Spain or France for instance, and has a very considerable population. We know that several of the Chief Commissioners of Burmah have very strongly reported in favour of the suppression of the opium trade; and it is perfectly well-known that the opinion of the native population is dead against permitting opium to be sold at all. The Indian Government have, notwithstanding, overruled again and again the recommendations of the Chief Commissioners on this subject. Now, if Burmah had possessed a Legislative Council, these recommendations could not have been ignored, but must have been acted upon. I cannot imagine why the Government should not give a discretion, at all events to the Governor General, to enable these Provinces to have the nucleus of a Legislative Body. I think it is a very discreditable thing to bar the door against it. I say we should not let this opportunity slip, and I hope my hon. Friend will go to a Division.

(7.10.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I am sorry there is not more interest taken in this House in Indian affairs; but I do trust that the hon. Gentleman will go to a Division on this Amendment, because, after all, otherwise I cannot see much use in discussing it, unless the Government in some sort of way should explain the matter away. But the Government have done nothing of the sort. This Amendment does not ask the Government to give way much. It only asks them to do what very likely they themselves before long will desire to carry out. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) seems to think this proposal most objectionable because of his experience when he was the First Commissioner of one of the districts. But it is some years ago since he was there, and no doubt the place has greatly improved since then. The opium question is always with us, and will be always with us until we have taken some steps to put an end to it, and not to make a profit out of it ourselves. I trust, therefore, the hon. Member will go to a Division on this matter, unless the Government see their way to give way on this point, as I think they ought to do.

*(7.13.) MR. JOHN ELLIS: I am surprised that the Government cannot see their way to accept this Amendment, which has been moved by an hon. Member of great Indian official experience. The experience of the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham is extremely high; but I am sure he will permit me, without discourtesy, to remind him that that experience is becoming a little antiquated. I am sure in another Parliament he will find that his utterances about India are not rated at the excessively high value that some hon. Members seem to attach to them. A great deal has happened since the Indian Councils Act (1861) was passed, and certainly there are districts now as ready to receive the benefit of the Amendment as these present Provinces were to receive those under that Act. Therefore, I hope my hon. Friend will take the sense of the House upon his Amendment if the Government do not see their way to accept it.

*(7.14.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I cannot imagine any reason the hon. Gentleman who has charge of the Bill can have for opposing the Amendment now before the House, unless it is to be found in the remarks which he has made on a previous Amendment. I am not blaming him for this personally, because I think we must all recognise the distinguished ability which he has shown in the conduct of his new office up to the present time. But I am bound, for all that, to remind him that he has fallen only too speedily into the groove that has been all along occupied by his predecessors. The hon. Gentleman told us with reference to a previous Amendment that, if the number of the gentlemen nominated for the Councils became at all great, that fact could not fail to establish what he called an Opposition Party. In other words, such a distrust has the India Office of the natives of India as a whole that, not content with having knocked the elective principle out of this Bill, the hon. Gentleman also tells us that if members were even nominated by the Governor General himself in any considerable numbers, they could not help forming an Opposition which would criticise—and ably and severely criticise I have no doubt—many of the measures brought before the Council. I myself am very familiar with the real state of matters—not from the experience of 20 years ago, but from an experience dating up to the 30th of January last; and from my personal knowledge of the position in which the Chief Commissionerships stand, as compared with the Lieutenant Governorships, I must state—and I think I shall be supported by every really independent European who has an intimate knowledge of the subject—that there is actually no difference existing in the constitution or in the state of society under the Chief Commissionerships, as compared with those under the Governorships in India at this moment. I, therefore, am thoroughly surprised that the hon. Gentleman does not accept the present Amendment, unless, indeed, the Government are prepared plainly to say that they abhor the idea of establishing even nominated Councils throughout that country.

(7.20.) MR. CONYBEARE: I am sorry we have not a better House to debate this question. The principle in the Amendment is to be found in the Constitution of the United States, whereby the territories were in due course developed into States. I do not admit that the Provinces of India are not sufficiently advanced to be dealt with as proposed. We say they are. It might be as well, so far as Burma is concerned, to wait until the country generally is more settled than it is at the present time; but the other Provinces are certainly advanced enough for the purpose. Assam may not be so far advanced as the Central Provinces; but when we consider the great tea-growing industries in Assam we must see that there is a strong argument for putting the machinery of the Act of 1861 into force. I shall support the Amendment of my hon. Friend because I consider it is a judicious one.

*MR. CURZON: The very power which hon. Members desire already exists under the Act of 1861.

MR. CONYBEARE: What part?

MR. CURZON: Section 46.

MR. MAC NEILL: Then why not accept the Amendment?

MR. CURZON: The reason is that it is not the custom in Parliamentary procedure, when a matter has been adequately dealt with in one Act, to introduce another clause relating to the same subject in another Bill. Such a course would obviously tend to throw doubt on the interpretation of the first Act. The Amendment, in short, is superfluous.

SIR W. PLOWDEN: I think the application of the Act of 1861 should be extended, and I hope my Amendment will be agreed to.

Question put.

(7.30.) The Committee divided :—
Ayes 46; Noes 84.—(Div. List, No. 81.)

*MR. SCHWANN: I wish to propose the following Amendment :—

In page 2, line 2, after the word "Council," to insert the words "and shall within eighteen months of the passing of this Act."

I would point out that in the year 1870 an Act was passed in this House called "An Act to make better provision for making Laws and Regulations for certain parts of India," &c., &c. It took eight years to make rules under Clause 6 of this Act, yet only three-quarters of the appointments have ever been made, and the whole scheme was finally swept away by the action of the Secretary of State for India. Unless some such Amendment as that which I propose is adopted, it is very probable that a great length of time would elapse before we saw any practical results obtained from the carrying out of this measure.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 2, after the word "Council," to insert the words "and shall within eighteen months of the passing of this Act."—(Mr. Schwann.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*MR. CURZON: I do not think that there is any likelihood of delay taking place in carrying out the provisions of this Bill; on the contrary, there is every reason to believe that the Government of India wish to take advantage of it to issue these regulations. At the same time, I think that it is extremely undesirable to limit the time within which action must be taken, because the carrying out of the enactment is a matter which would require a great deal of consideration in India itself. I can well conceive that in some Provinces prolonged consideration may be necessary to decide as to the best methods of carrying out the provisions of the Bill. I think, therefore, that it would be unwise to fetter the discretion or to hamper the initiative of the Viceroy in this matter.

(7.45.) MR. BRYCE: I hope the Amendment will be accepted, or that some other limit will be suggested if 18 months is considered too short a time for the purpose. This proposal has been under consideration for three years, and it must, therefore, have been largely present in the minds of the Viceroy and his advisers. It ought to be possible to prepare regulations within a reasonable time. I am aware how slowly public business is transacted in India, but I should have thought the Amendment was one which the Government could have accepted. If, however, it is considered that 18 months is too short a time, no doubt my hon. Friend will be willing to move his Amendment in a different form, and to extend the period from 18 months to two years.

*(7.47.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I think the Amendment is necessary in order to strengthen the hands of the Governor-General. The European officials in India would be certain to endeavour to delay the operation of the measure, and in order that their resistance might be overcome the Governor-General should be in the position to say, "I am bound to act within a given period," otherwise he will certainly be thwarted in his endeavours to put the clause in operation.

MR. CONYBEARE: The argument put forward in support of this Amendment is certainly a very strong one, and I should like to ask why we should not introduce a limitation of time in this case as was done in regard to the County Councils Bills for this country? Surely we ought to do all we possibly can to strengthen the hands of the Governor-General, and to see that the measure is really one for the benefit of the people of India generally.

Question put.

The Committee divided :—Ayes 26; Noes 78.—(Div. List, No. 82.)

DR. TANNER: I wish to inform you, Mr. Courtney, that both the hon. Member for Elgin and myself have been into the "Aye" Lobby with the intention of voting for the Amendment, but that our votes have not been counted.

*MR. MACLEAN (Oldham): I would now move the following Amendment :—

In page 2, line 2, after the words "in Council," to insert the words "and with the sanction of both Houses of Parliament."

The object of this proposal is to insure that no regulation framed under this clause should be enforced until the sanction of Parliament has been given to it. I regret that it should have been necessary for the Government to take the discussion of this Bill on the first day after the holiday, because many Members who are interested in it are unable to be present. One fallacy has been often repeated. It has been said, notably by the hon. Member for Manchester, that there is no such thing as public opinion in India, and that it is necessary to create that opinion by introducing some elective system. I maintain that there is at the present moment, and has been for many years, a real and strong public opinion in India, and that it is not at all necessary there should be representative Government in order that the opinion of the people may be expressed. They have freedom of the Press; they have the right of public meeting; and I can assure the hon. Gentleman, from a rather extensive knowledge of the way matters are discussed in India, that there is a great deal of freedom of criticism of any measure proposed by Government. I certainly claim that if I did not actually create, I, at all events, brought to maturity, in the great City of Bombay a public opinion as vigorous and wholesome, and at the same time as loyal, as any opinion which exists in any other part of the world. The fact is, that the Government now even take great pains to consult the opinion of various sections of the population of India. We are told that we ought to give the right of elective representation to Municipalities, Chambers of Commerce, Universities, and other institutions of the kind. These are the very institutions the Government consults before it passes any measure, and I never knew of a Government bringing forward a fresh measure affecting finance or the interests of its subjects without consulting these bodies. The fact is, these institutions and these great organisations have a great deal of power with the Government at the present time; so much power that they sometimes prevent the wishes of this House being carried into effect, as was illustrated last year when they started the resistance of the Government of India to the desire of the Secretary of State that they should pass a certain Factory Act in that country. What we really want to get at, and what is very difficult to get at, is the opinion of the hundreds of millions of poor people in India.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, I do not see how the remarks of the hon. Member relate to the Motion he is moving.

*MR. MACLEAN: I was only replying to remarks which had been made earlier in the evening, and which seemed to have no particular reference to the subject under discussion. However, it is now proposed that in order to give better expression to public opinion in India we should have this elective system of Government, and in the present section, as finally explained by the Under Secretary for India, there is no doubt that the elective principle is to be introduced hereafter into the administration of India. That is distinctly stated to be the meaning and intention of the Government.

MR. SCHWANN: Not in the Bill.

*MR. MACLEAN: It is not expressed in the Bill, but it is allowed by the Bill; and the explanation which the Under Secretary has given to it shows that it is the intention of the Government that it shall be carried into effect. My hon. Friend the Secretary of State for India has spoken in the most satisfactory terms of the great danger that would be caused by the introduction of a system of anything like Party Government into India. I was very much pleased by the observations he made on that subject, but I maintain that under the words of this section we shall be drifting towards the introduction of a regular system of Party Government. My hon. Friend does not see the full force of the concession he has made to the other side. My own belief is that if we once introduce the elective principle into India we do away with the logical basis of our rule of that country. We must be masters there or else we must leave India altogether. If we once admit that the natives of India are entitled to the same privileges of self-government we ourselves possess then we have no business in India at all. Thus, in view of this strong conviction of mine, I regret very much that the Government should have so far yielded to pressure as to have made this important concession. I do not understand that it was the original intention of the Government to do anything of the kind; but Lord Kimberley asked in the House of Lords whether a certain interpretation might be put upon this section, and Lord Cross, with that sprightly amiability which never fails him, said, "Happy thought. Let us take the elective principle and introduce it into our Bill." Thus we have this principle, and it is provided that the Secretary of State in Council, with the Governor General in Council, may make such regulations as they please as to the way in which this additional Members of Council shall be nominated. I would call attention to the very loose wording of the clause, which leaves it open to the Governor General to alter the constitution of India at any time with the approval of the Secretary of State in Council. In fact, any new Governor General may in his Gladstone bag take out a new constitution for India, and I think that this giving up of the power of control of this Parliament is really a most dangerous principle to adopt. I do not know that any responsible statesman, in proposing Home Rule for Ireland, has gone so far as to say that the control of Parliament over any future changes in the Legislature of Ireland shall be absolutely done away with, and yet we here have that new principle applied to India. It is to be left absolutely in the power of the Governor General to make as many changes in the constitution of that country as he may desire. I do not say that danger will always arise through the exercise of this authority, but, to use a Johnsonian phrase, the clause contains a potentiality of mischief beyond the dreams of the present generation of agitators. It is obvious that if you have a Governor General who is anxious to conciliate people out there he may yield one position after another. You are yielding to pressure now, and you are offering thereby an invitation to the people to whom you yield to employ fresh pressure until they obtain all they desire. The Under Secretary of State, in speaking of this clause, tried to make out that I was really attaching exaggerated importance to it. He said it was a very small matter indeed. It is a small matter to some people if you make a breach in the bank of a reservoir by taking away a stone or two; but you may in this way let loose a torrent which will lay desolate the whole of the valley below. I think it is a dangerous thing for the Government to have enlarged the scope of this Bill so as to give room for the introduction on a great scale of the electoral principle in India. The Under Secretary seems to be in the position of the confidential butler who holds the door open so that the burglars may come in and steal the family plate.

MR. MAC NEILL: Who are the burglars?

*MR. MACLEAN: The hon. Member knows more about them than I do, for they are friends of his. I have no doubt that so long as we have a Governor General of the stamp of Lord Dufferin and Lord Lansdowne we are not likely to have any abuse of the privileges of this clause. Something has been said about Municipalities in India and the way in which they work, and in this connection there were some remarkable observations made by Lord Lansdowne, who spoke a fortnight ago at the opening of the great waterworks at Bombay. They show that he has a clear apprehension of the difficulty of working electoral institutions in India. He said—

"I have never disguised from myself that municipal government in India has special difficulties to contend with. It has been frequently and truly said by those who have made this subject their special study that, owing to the structure of society in India, the number of persons likely to take an interest in civic affairs is relatively much smaller here than it is in Western countries; and I have observed with regret that in some of our Municipalities there has prevailed a regrettable degree of indifference to the interests of the community—an indifference which sometimes takes the shape of leaving to a few willing workers the burden of exertion and responsibility which ought to be generally shared, and sometimes that of obstruction, offered from motives of false or even selfish economy, to the progress of necessary schemes."

Mr. Maclean

I have no fear that a Viceroy who shows so clearly his conception of the difficulties of working a system of elective Municipalities in India, and is so well aware that these Municipalities are only on their trial, will make any great or rash experiment in the introduction of the elective principle into the Viceregal Council. But we have had experience of other Viceroys, and we shall probably have experience of them again, upon whom no such dependence may be placed. We know how Lord Ripon, with the assent of Mr. Ilbert, introduced a Bill into the Council of India which set the whole of India by the ears. I have been denounced by the newspapers for my brutal frankness in speaking of Lord Ripon in this manner and expressing a dread of what would happen if he were again appointed Governor-General of India; but I suppose we Members of Parliament come here to tell the truth to one another occasionally in spite of the demoralising effects of Party Government. I think it is better we should face the realities of the situation, and look to the probable effects of the legislation we are taking in hand, than that we should wrap ourselves in a cloud either of dishonest ambiguities or of humanitarian twaddle. If we had a weak or rash Viceroy appointed to India he would be able to do the greatest possible injury to our rule in that country. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham has spoken of introducing the elective principle, and I have sufficient confidence in the soundness of his judgment to know that if he were the Governor General of India the elective principle would not work badly, because he would exercise his own knowledge and determine who were the best men to appoint even after the election had been made. But has my hon. Friend considered that it is possible you might have a Viceroy and Secretary of State who were anxious to recognise the National Congress in India as a regular institution? And is not it possible for a Viceroy to go there and say, "We take this Congress as representative of the people of India, and we will select your leaders and nominate them to the Viceregal Council?" It seems to me any proposal of that kind should have the express assent of both Houses of Parliament before it can be carried into effect. The National Congress of India has really been on its last legs for some time; it would have died out and would have ceased to exist but for the stimulus which this Bill has given it. ("Oh!") The hon. Member says "Oh," but I will quote from a letter written by Mr. Hume, the Secretary of the Congress, and published the other day. He says they could not get any money with which to carry on the Congress; and I have no doubt that statement would be confirmed by Mr. Digby, the ex-Secretary of the National Liberal Club, if he were applied to. Mr. Hume said—

"As a fact, however, but a small sum comparatively is provided—a wholly inadequate sum—and even that, though promised, is paid so tardily that thousands of letters, circulars, and reminders are needed to get in even this ineffectual contribution."

The Congress was losing the support of the people of India, but now I am afraid it will be again set up in active existence. We know the hon. Member for Manchester speaks of what the Congress proposes to do, and we know that the Congress never meets or separates without giving three hearty cheers for the Queen. That is an easy thing to do; but they also pass resolutions which are really aimed at the complete overthrow of the English rule in India. ("No, no.") I expected that; but here is a specimen of the kind of language used by Mr. Hume, the Secretary of the Congress, which shows the real aim and character of this Congress. Mr. Hume actually incites the members of the Congress to rise against the Government, and points out the way in which they must do it effectually. He is a pensioned servant of the State.

MR. SCHWANN: All these parties have been disowned.

*MR. MACLEAN: I say Mr. Hume is a pensioned servant of the State, and under any less mild rule than our own would have been hanged or shot as a traitor. Mr. Hume wrote—

"Do not fancy that the Government will be able to protect you or itself. No earthly power can stem an universal agrarian rising in a country like this. My countrymen will be as men in the desert, vainly struggling, for a brief space, against the simoom. There will be no foe to meet in the field, but rail and road will become impassable, bridges will be wrecked, telegraphs cease to exist, supplies be arrested; thousands of the rioters may be killed, but to what avail, when there are millions on millions who have nothing to look forward to but death—nothing to hope for but vengeance? As for leaders—with the hour comes the man—be sure there will be no lack of leaders."

Then he referred to what he himself had seen in the time of the Indian Mutiny—

"A great many of you do not understand what a house of cards our grand Administration is. You have not seen, as I have, the entire Administration shrivel up like a parchment flung into the fire, in less than a month, in consequence of the mutiny of some 40,000 soldiers, and that, although at that time the entire population were with us, in most places actively, in all passively, if not actively."

That is the style of language Mr. Hume indulges in. But I think the hon. Member said just now that he had dissolved connection with Mr. Hume.

MR. SCHWANN: No; that the Congress had denied its connection with those words.

*MR. MACLEAN: The hon. Member is mistaken. I have read the correspondence published in the Indian papers. The Allahabad Standing Congress Committee at first objected to the language of Mr. Hume in these words, on the ground, it will be seen, of expediency alone:—

"In fact, we are not only afraid of being misrepresented by our opponents, but we also think that a considerable number of men in our own ranks will feel nervous at the publication of the letter."

But they gave way, and then comes the following telegram from the Secretary:—

"The Committee have resolved to circulate your letter of the 16th February. It is being circulated."

There the Committee identified themselves with the plan of Mr. Hume. The hon. Member has said a great deal about organising public meetings in London, such as that of a number of native Indian gentlemen who met to discuss some remarks of mine in this House, in which I showed them up in their true character. Why do not hon. Members opposite now call a public meeting of all the natives in London to repudiate Mr. Hume, to denounce him, and to show that they will have nothing to do with his wicked designs? I doubt if they dare do that, because they know he is supported by a large body of the members of the Congress in India itself. I have thought it right to call attention to these things, because it seems to me the House is going on in a happy-go-lucky sort of way to change the whole Constitution of India and to introduce the elective system, the end of which none of us can really foresee. There can be no doubt, if anything of the kind is to be done, that we ought to maintain a very strict Parliamentary control over the action of the Governor General and the Secretary of State. Hon. Members opposite profess to be afraid that the Governors General may not carry out fully and freely the intentions of Parliament in this matter; but I say that some of them may go far beyond the intention of Parliament, and I say we ought never to part with the immediate control of Parliament over the Government of India. I have no doubt that the Government will refuse to accept my Amendment, and I have no doubt also that they will be able to have their own way in the Division; but, at all events, I shall protest to the last, with all my energy, against what I regard as this first, this irrevocable, and this fatal step towards the overthrow of English influence and authority in India.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 2, after the words "in Council," to insert the words "and with the sanction of both Houses of Parliament."—(Mr. Maclean.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

(8.58.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): With respect to the latter part of the speech of the hon. Member for Oldham, who quoted the sanguinary language of a Report from India, I should like to say at once, speaking for myself and for those on this side of the House, that we utterly repudiate any sympathy with such absurd and mischievous language. I have no hesitation in saying that I regard with much disgust and surprise the language contained in Mr. Hume's letter, proceeding as it does from a gentleman who has been labouring, and I believe sincerely, in the interests of the people of India. And I hope that the members of the Indian Congress, who are certainly not responsible for it, and who, up to the present time, probably have not had any opportunity of expressing their views with regard to it, will absolutely disavow and dissociate themselves from any language of the kind. I cannot conceive anything more calculated to throw back the movement which the Congress is endeavouring to push forward—that of securing to the people of India a voice in the management of their own affairs—than the dissemination of such language. I regard such language as highly mischievous, and the harm is incalculable that is caused by language such as the hon. Gentleman has lent himself to. He suggests that we cannot trust our fellow-subjects in India, and that it is impossible to concede a single inch of liberty for fear they should take many ells, and that will do more than anything else to estrange the people of India from our Government, and it will give them the idea that the expressions used by a single Member of this House are those generally held by the people of this country. During the short time I was in India I was impressed by the anxious desire of the people to have some sympathy extended to them by us, and the same feeling has been expressed by Professor Monier Williams and other able writers. The feeling of the people of India is very keen upon this point; that the improvement of steam navigation has made it possible for our civil servants to spend their short furloughs in this country instead of as formerly amongst the people, and the result has been to divorce the governing classes from the people. I think the hon. Gentleman, in opposing this Amendment, has shown extraordinary timidity. He is afraid that the Bill would introduce novel principles, but there is no new principle. The word "election" has been carefully eliminated from the Bill, and the authorities in India are not likely to trouble themselves to give any practical effect to that principle. Therefore, I think the Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean) is too timorous when he talks about the floodgates being opened and so forth. If under this Bill the principle of election is available at all I confess I welcome it with the greatest satisfaction, because, if you insist on keeping a people down by force of bayonets without doing what you can to meet their political aspirations, you will merely breed discontent; but if you show them that sympathy for which I am pleading, you will remove one of the greatest incentives to anything like the agrarian rebellion which the hon. Gentleman mentioned. With respect to what the hon. Gentleman said about the organisation of the Indian National Congress and the fact that applications have been made for subscriptions on behalf of that body, I may remind him that such things are not unknown in the history of our own politics. I can refer the hon. Gentleman to a political organisation with which he is better acquainted than I am—the emblem of which is a primrose—which has sent out circulars asking for contributions, and these circulars have sometimes got into other hands than those for which they were intended. One reason why this should be the case in India is that people are aware that this question is now before the House, and they are disposed to wait before they act upon the result of our deliberations. The hon. Member for Oldham always speaks in an interesting manner on Indian subjects, and I wish he would speak more often, but I think this proposal of his nullifies the whole principle of this Bill. It appears to me that if this Amendment were carried, an Act of Parliament would be required to sanction any rules and regulations which were formulated by the Indian Government. The Under Secretary pointed out with respect to another Amendment that it expressed distrust of the Viceroy, and that, I think, is the spirit of this Amendment in an even greater degree. This Amendment would take the heart out of the Bill, and I trust the Government will not accept it.

Mr. Maclean

* (9.15.) MR. JOHN ELLIS: The hon. Member for Oldham has delivered a very violent attack on the Indian National Congress. He quoted no resolution of the Congress to support his attack, but he contented himself in reading a paragraph from a letter written by Mr. Allan Hume, who was Secretary to the Indian National Congress. I do not know whether it is within the knowledge of the hon. Member that there appeared in the Times of the 2nd April an entire repudiation of this letter which had been cabled from India. There is in London a small informal Committee which represents to some extent the Indian National Congress in this country. They held a meeting on the 2nd of April at which they had the full text of this letter before them, and they unanimously passed this resolution—

"This Committee, having before it the full text of a circular letter issued by Mr. Allan O. Hume, C.B., dated Calcutta, 16th February, the substance of which was cabled by the Times correspondent yesterday, express their deep regret that such a letter should have been circulated, and their entire repudiation of the wild language and the unjustifiable conclusions drawn by Mr. Hume."—W. S. Caine, W. S. B. McLaren, Chas. E. Schwann, John E. Ellis, and others.

I can assure the Committee that we feel nothing could be too strong in the way of repudiation of the language—I might almost say the wicked language—used in that letter; but it must be borne in mind that Mr. Hume had been brooding for some time over the alleged grievances of India, and I think the same degree of culpability must not attach to Mr. Hume under the circumstances which would attach had he been in a condition of perfectly even temper.

MR. MACLEAN: I am glad to hear this explanation, but I should like to point out that by the Bombay papers which have arrived to-day I see that a Committee of the Congress have circulated that letter throughout the whole of India.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS: I have not seen the Bombay papers, and this matter is not in the final stage. There may be something further to say about it, but I may say that the Chairman of one of the Standing Committees of the Congress was at our meeting. He signed the repudiation I have read, and I feel sure the letter would not receive the sanction of the Congress. We dissociate ourselves from the letter and from the circulation of it. Mr. Hume has rendered very great services to India, and in this matter I have no doubt he has been carried away in a way which I hope he now regrets. With respect to the Amendment, I cannot conceive anything more lamentable than that we should have a series of heated speeches on Indian subjects, such as the one we have listened to, and that would be the effect of the Amendment. The speech was saturated with distrust and jealousy of our Indian fellow-subjects, and I deprecate the constant bringing before this House of Indian subjects, as this Amendment would do, if that is the way in which they are to be discussed.

MR. S. SMITH: I entirely concur with the last speaker in the view he takes of this letter.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I think it would be better if the Committee would leave the matter of this letter and confine itself to the discussion of the Amendment.

* (9.25.) MR. CURZON: The hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean) in his speech has given a not altogether fair account of the genesis of this clause. He seemed to think it had been introduced at the last moment in a haphazard kind of way, and had been accepted by the Government to save themselves from the difficulties of the situation; but I can assure him that it was well considered before it was included in the Bill. Moreover, it contains the views which have been consistently expressed in correspondence with the Government of India. It was with no uncertain knowledge of its purpose that it was proposed by Lord Northbrook, and accepted by the Government. The hon. Member for Oldham is anxious that these rules with regard to nomination and election should be submitted to both Houses of Parliament. I observed on the Paper a somewhat similar Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for North Manchester (Mr. Schwann); but that has been withdrawn in order that the hon.

Member for Oldham might move his. I therefore looked with some anxiety as to what action Gentlemen on the other side would take. But what is my surprise when I find in those Gentlemen unexpected allies. But though both these Gentlemen (Mr. Maclean and Mr. Schwann) have put down a similar Amendment, I recognise a difference in their objects. The hon. Member for Manchester is looking to the House of Commons and to discussion in this House, whilst the Member for Oldham is looking to discussion in the House of Lords. The hon. Member for Manchester fears that the rules may not be liberal enough, and may require to be expanded by this House. The hon. Member for Oldham fears that the rules will be too liberal and will require to be contracted by the House of Lords. The hon. Member for Manchester wants this House to apply the spur to a Conservative Viceroy, and the hon. Member for Oldham wants the House of Lords to apply the curb to a Radical Viceroy. He made that clear in his speech on the Second Reading a few weeks ago. These two proposals each illustrate the danger of the other. I do not think we want the House of Commons to interfere with one class of Viceroy any more than we want the House of Lords to interfere with the other. Moreover, the fears underlying these two proposals are each the corrective of the other. The hon. Member for Manchester is afraid that the clause will be a dead letter. The hon. Member for Oldham thinks that it conceals a revolution. He seems to regard the proposal of the Government as of the most appalling character, and to fear that a full-blown electoral scheme will spring from this clause, like Athens from the head of Jupiter. I venture to think that while, on the one hand, the clause will not be a dead letter, on the other it will not have the far-reaching effects which the hon. Member anticipates. The hon. Member suggests that giving such power to the Viceroy will be an innovation; in my judgment the proposal of the hon. Member would itself be an innovation. I think that the further interference of Parliament with the Government of India is most undesirable, for when Parliament does meddle in Indian affairs it not uncommonly muddles; and if the Government of India is doomed at any time to end in failure or collapse, it will not be from the attack of foes from without, nor from internal disruption, but in consequence of the undue interference of Parliament. And if it be undesirable that this House should interfere in the government of India, it is still more undesirable that India should be made a bone of contention between the two Houses of Parliament, and yet I can conceive no other result than friction between the two Houses arising from the Amendment. There are already in the Bill sufficient safeguards, which, perhaps, my hon. Friend has not noticed. Before these rules come into operation they must be approved by the Governor-General in Council, which Council is composed of men of knowledge and experience, and not necessarily of the same political colour as himself. They have then to be approved by the Secretary of State in Council at home. The Council of the Secretary of State is composed of twelve men of great Indian experience who are not Party men, and in both bodies, therefore, they will be discussed quite apart from Party considerations. But supposing the Amendment were carried, and the Secretary of State in Council declined to accept the decision of the House of Commons, what power have we to control him? Under those circumstances, another Act of Parliament would be required* to deprive the Secretary of State in Council of the powers conferred on him by the Act of 1858, so that the clause as amended would be inoperative unless the House were prepared to take that step. The Government are unable to admit the principle of further Parliamentary interference in the government of India than that which at present exists; and they are unwilling, in setting up this new scheme, to submit it to the risk of Parliamentary Divisions in this House. I think nothing would be more likely to retard the successful operation of this Act and of this clause than that it should be from time to time brought up for discussion in this House, and I hope the Committee will not give its adhesion to this proposal.

(9.37.) MAJOR GENERAL GOLDS-WORTHY (Hammersmith): The Under Secretary says he does not see why the House should intervene in such matters. Surely, Sir, if small questions under the Charity Commission are laid before the House and debates of several hours take place upon them, it is the right of the House to control the Government of India. I was in the Indian Mutiny, and I saw some of the worst scenes which took place in it, and I saw some of the inciting letters to which the hon. Member for Oldham referred. I have no wish that there should be a chance of any more such scenes. India was won by the sword and must be kept by the sword; and not only the sword wielded by Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen, but by loyal natives with whom many of us who are soldiers have fought side by side. I think it is most injudicious to give this power, and hope that the rules will be brought under the cognisance of Parliament. I shall support the hon. Member for Oldham if he goes to a Division.

(9.40.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I hope the hon. Gentleman will keep his Party in order and go to a Division. I shall be most happy to follow him into the Lobby against the Government, who are bringing in a Bill which neither they nor their supporters believe in. They are bringing it in simply to pose as philanthropists before the country. In the face of a near General Election these Committees are all humbug. I hope the supporters of the hon. Gentleman will nail their colours to the mast, and not let their courage ooze out at the toes of their boots, and will go to a Division.

(9.43.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I gather from the Under Secretary that his view is, that the English people, in the wider sense of the word, should not interfere through the House of Commons when the Governor General chooses to alter these rules. I must say I consider that a most extraordinary doctrine. The time may come when you may have an invasion of India, and then you will call upon the people of this country to come forward and hold India, and yet you will not let them interfere in the Government of India at all. The Governor General may set the whole of the Bill at defiance by the rules, and exclude all natives from the Council. You might have a Governor General not in harmony with the House of Commons, whom, however, it might be inconvenient to recall, and he might act in defiance of public opinion, and of the opinion of the House of Commons, by keeping out of the Council the very men whom the House of Commons think should be there. The Governor General should not have the right to make new rules without the House of Commons having some little right of interfering, if necessary. The hon. and gallant General is well acquainted with India, and he wants to limit the power of the Governor General, and I agree that the House of Commons should be able to interfere if the Governor General should make some injudicious alterations.

Mr. Curzon

(9.50.) Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 23; Noes 91.—(Div. List, No. 83.)

(9.57.) SIR W. PLOWDEN: We have now arrived at the position that the Government have admitted the elective principle, but will not admit words into the Bill to give it effect, as they are content with the words in the Bill. I seek to recognise the claims of the Native Representative Assembly. In India the representative principle has been long acted upon, and I know no country in which since ancient times it has been so largely adopted. In my Amendment I have endeavoured to embrace in a constituent whole the existing circumstances connected with the ancient methods, and make them applicable to the Bill. I should have apologised to the Under Secretary for not giving notice of this Amendment but that we are all acquainted with the happy way in which he can deal at once with any Amendment which comes before him. At the end of Sub-section 4 I propose to add these words—

"In those provinces or territories where the ancient institutions of the country recognise the representative principle, such as the village punchayet, or the village council, regard shall be paid to such old custom in the nomination or appointment of the councillors to be created under these regulations."

Inquiry has shown that these institutions existed long anterior to our rule in India. It has been recognised for many years past by many of our most distinguished administrators how advantageous it would be to India and to our administration if we could make use of those methods which have so long existed in that country. I do not think I could take a more useful instance of a distinguished administrator who has expressed that feeling than the case of Sir Bartle Frere, who 20 years ago read a paper before one of the Indian associations in this country, discussing the question how desirable it was that existing systems in India should be made use of as a means of representing the public voice of the country. He referred to the Village Councils which existed almost everywhere in their ancient form, and said—

"The chief significance of the Village Councils in regard to ascertaining public opinion would be that they would form a body of real representatives to state the opinions of their fellow-villagers in the District Councils."

That is exactly the point I want the Government to come to in their acceptance of this Amendment, or, at all events, in their method of dealing with the section to which my Amendment is appended. I have before the House a Bill which has not come to the Second Reading, and which deals at considerable length with the method of village representation, and carries it on to its logical result through the provincial representation and the Supreme Council. But now that the Government have accepted the possibility and probability of the Government of India making use of this power which they say is entirely given to them in the Sub-section to which this Amendment is appended, I hope they will also see their way to give some expression of their views as to the desirability of accepting any ancient system of representation existing in India, whereby this elective principle would be satisfactorily applied, because, as I understand, the great objection which has been raised to the elective principle in India has been the difficulty, and almost the impossibility of applying it. I believe that in these Village Councils is to be found an easy method of dealing with a very difficult and complicated subject, namely, that of adapting to Eastern countries Western principles of government. The ancient system of Village Councils is still strongly in force. Why, even in the ordinary procedure in our Courts of Justice half the decisions in small matters are the decisions really of the Village Councils. My Amendment is sufficiently broad and elastic to prevent its being said that any special form, any particular law, or any precise rule is laid down for the use of the Indian Administration in that country. It only specifies the desire of this House, which I believe is fully shared by all hon. Members on both sides, that where it is possible, and where the method is one which has its origin in old customs and in old systems, that method should be applied in carrying out the object of the Bill which the Under Secretary is conducting so ably. I venture to move my Amendment—

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at the end of the Clause, to add the words:—"In those provinces or territories where the ancient institutions of the country recognise the representative principle, such as the village punchayet or the village council, regard shall be paid to such old custom in the nomination or appointment of the councillors to be created under these regulations."—(Sir William Plowden.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*(10.11.) MR. CURZON: The hon. Member who has moved this Amendment is anxious that in the possible application of this clause to the Government of India the Indian Government shall not lose sight of old systems and old methods. There is no doubt that the existing system of the Village Council in India is a very ancient and valuable institution; but I think the hon. Member loses sight of the fact that the Village Council is not in itself a form of Council which can be said to be based on the elective principle at all. The members of the Council are chosen—but not by a system of election to which we should apply the term—on account of their personal status or qualifications by the consent of their fellow-villagers. These Councils are very valuable, and are excellently qualified for the discharge of the local business with which they have to deal; but I must point out to the hon. Gentleman that they have no legal status at all, and if this Amendment were carried out it would be necessary to give them a legal status. I must point out, in the second place, that the Village Council, as an electoral unit, is extremely small, and far too small to be made use of in such changes as we contemplate in this Bill. The hon. Gentleman has introduced a Bill in this House for the improvement of Indian Councils which commends itself to his judgment, and which is mainly based upon the Village Councils. I had occasion, in the discharge of my official duties, to study that Bill, and I shall say nothing about it now except what, I think, the hon. Gentleman himself will admit, namely that it is a very complex and difficult Bill—a Bill bristling with complexities and with contentious points. The main ground, however, on which I would ask the Committee not to accept this Amendment—indeed, I would ask the hon. Member himself to withdraw it—is not because of any inherent defect in the Village Council itself, but because of the general grounds upon which I have been advocating this Bill. We have consistently taken up the line of saying that whilst giving a broad indication to the Governor-General of the lines on which he might proceed, we do not desire to hamper him in the smallest particular by any suggestion, and much less by any command—and this Amendment amounts almost to a mandatory clause. I might fortify my position by again quoting from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian; but I will only repeat that the Government desire not to specify—not to particularise—but to leave ample discretion to the Viceroy. If Village Councils are to be mentioned, why not Municipalities, Local Boards, and other Bodies, which are representative of larger areas, and why not the Universities? The Committee will act wisely if it refrains from entering into these particulars, and if it leaves the application of the principles laid down to the Viceroy in Council.

Mr. Curzon

*(10.12.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY
It seems to me that with all his ability the hon. Gentleman who is in charge of this Bill has been able to find practically no answer except one to the representations which have been made to him from this side of the House. The burden of his reply is always to this effect: "Leave everything to the Viceroy." Now that is just the worst objection that we have to the Bill, or, at all events, to the only clause which is of value in it—namely, Sub-section 4. I have the very highest esteem both for the distinguished abilities and high character of the present Governor General. But I believe that no Governor General will be strong enough, however willing he may be, to take the initiative in this matter. The hon. Gentleman must admit that the answers he has given to the very mild Amendments moved on this side of the House have been hardly sufficient. He has not even attempted to reply to the assertion I have repeatedly made that the Governor General would not have the moral courage to put any part of this scheme in force unless he received some directions in regard to it. The Bill has been allowed to drop into nothing but a mere Party measure, to deceive England and not to benefit India. I might parallel it if I put it with the Small Holdings Bill, in regard to which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture (Mr. Chaplin) has practically said, "Leave everything to the landlord." We all know that the landlords will not do anything. In like manner the Government now say, "Leave everything to the Viceroy," well knowing that the Viceroy will not and cannot do anything, unless he receive directions in the matter. Thus both Bills have been introduced as nothing else than electioneering devices put forward in view of a more or less early Dissolution.

COLONEL NOLAN: This Amendment is not much understood by the Committee. I do not profess to say I understand it myself. I have always voted in this House against indirect systems of election, and I think the Radical Party have always been against it. I know very well what its effect has been in Ireland. It should be recollected that if it were introduced into India it might be re-introduced from there into this country, which would be a very dangerous thing. I am strongly inclined to vote against the Amendment.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: I do not wish to detain the Committee by discussing this system of election. I would only point out that, although the Indian name of Village Councils sounds pleasantly to Indian ears, still those Councils could not be utilised under this Bill. If a place partook of the character of a town, the chances are that it would have a Municipal Constitution, whose members would be elected. Places of less extent would be mere villages, and it would be difficult to devise any scheme by which they could co-operate in electing members of Council. Whilst fully admitting the value that attaches to ancient institutions in the villages, I hold that they are not suitable to the purposes of this Bill, and that, therefore, it is not practicable to introduce them.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I think this Amendment is the most important proposed to night. It will embrace the class which pays all the taxes and bears all the burdens—men who know the wants of the agriculturists, and will be able to express them. If we are to introduce the system into India I think this is the best way of commencing. The hon. Member for Galway seemed to think that this is a new idea in India and in Europe, but the French Senate is elected by an analogous system to the one now proposed. Perhaps we were strongly against it in the old form as applied to the Board of Works; but I think it is the most suitable for Eastern countries, and will be more in consonance than any direct form of representation. We must remember that the rack-renter in India is the Government. What they have to do is not only to consider the question of legislation, but also of administration. This class is governed as autocratically and despotically as the Russians are governed. They have no voice, and very often when their rents are raised injustice is done. Seeing that they bear the burden, I consider that they should have some share in determining who are to represent them in the various Councils.

MR. MORTON: I consider this Amendment, which proposes to utilise some of the old elected bodies in India, a step in the right direction, although a small one. While myself objecting to indirect election, I suppose, if we cannot have the direct system, that we had better accept the indirect, on the principle that half-a-loaf is better than none. There are some, however, who deem this system suitable for new countries, and it has, in some measure, been adopted in the United States. I have been struck to-night by the fact that whenever the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham speaks after the Under Secretary, he says precisely what the latter has said, and that if the Under Secretary follows him he also says ditto. That is a nice family arrangement. No matter what the Amendment proposed may be, the Under Secretary has always two answers ready for us. One is a desire to leave everything to the Governor General, and the other is that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian has opposed it in a speech on the Second Reading, or has made a statement in some way opposed to the proposal. I am surprised the Under Secretary of State cannot supply us with any authority from his own side of the House. He has said nothing regarding Lord Salisbury's opinion of India, and nothing as to the opinion of his own Leader, the First Lord of the Treasury. Indeed, it seems to me that this matter is really left to the genius and talent of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. I am glad to think, however, that the Tory Party are obliged to rely upon the right hon. Gentleman in this matter as in many others, although I should have been very much better pleased had they advanced reasons of their own. I do not think India will ever be governed properly until you interest the people, and as I believe this Amendment is a step in that direction I have pleasure in supporting it.

DR. TANNER: If you are going to do anything for these people in India, should not they be allowed some voice as regards their own representation? Is it to be despotism or an approach to a form of representative government? We are told in connection with all these Bills, whether in relation to India or Ireland, that we must be governed by the sword; that we are worse than Hottentots. Here we have a proposal emanating from an hon. Member who knows a great deal about the condition of India, who shows that you have a system of government existing in these villages, and who makes a proposal to substantially recognise that fact, and so to incorporate that existing system as to create a form of government that will satisfy the people, and be for the benefit of the rulers and ruled. But everything is to be left to the former, and nothing to the latter. I believe the time has come when we should endeavour to undo some part of the miserable system which exists in India—something that will reconcile the natives of India to British rule, and something that will elevate the people of India as their cause deserves. I hope, therefore, that this reasonable proposition will be conceded by Her Majesty's Government. If not, we shall have the satisfaction of going to a Division and registering our opinion against a sham measure, introduced for the purpose of throwing dust into the eyes of the people.

(10.45.) Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 47; Noes 94.—(Div. List, No. 84.)

DR. TANNER: I propose now that the following words be added to Clause 2:—

“Provided that any 20 taxpayers of a Presidency or Lieutenant Governorship may apply to the Governor General in Council for leave to petition the High Court for the removal of such Councillors on the ground of corruption, malversation, or oppression, or of persistent disobedience to the law, and the Governor General in Council, if of opinion, after hearing evidence, that there is a prima facie case, may give such leave. The petition shall be presented to the said taxpayers within 21 days after leave is given, and shall be tried by two Judges of the said High Court; if the said Judges find such Councillors guilty of knowingly pursuing a course of corruption, malversation, oppression, or persistent disobedience to the law, they may order such Councillors to be removed; and the Governor General in Council shall nominate in their stead, as Councillors, such other persons as he shall think fit.”

The Committee will see that I have absolutely adopted a portion of a celebrated Government Code not yet passed into law, and I hope, therefore, that this Amendment will be accepted by Her Majesty's Government.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member's Amendment is not in Order.

Clause 1 agreed to.

* (11.0.) MR. SCHWANN: I will not move the whole of the Amendment which stands in my name on Clause 2, but I will go to the one which commences with line 26. Clause 2 seems to me to be one of the very best portions of the Bill, because it gives to the Legislative Council an opportunity of discussing the Budget every year. That is a very good point in itself, but there are some additions which I should like the Government to make. By this clause no member of the Council has power to submit or propose any Resolution, or to divide the Council, or to ask for papers on financial matters. I think those powers should be introduced, and I think the members should have power to record their votes, if they think proper, by way of protest against any principle which is adopted in the Budget. The Under Secretary, on the Second Reading, spoke of the benefit of increased publicity, and I quite agree with him; but I do not see why we should not go further and allow the members to divide the Council and record their votes. The financial question is practically the most important that can be considered in India. The present condition of the country is one of wide-spread poverty, and I do not see that it would be any good for members of the Viceregal Council to examine and discuss financial matters unless they are able to divide the Council upon them and put their votes in evidence on record. The poverty of India is phenomenal. In England the average earnings per head of the inhabitants is £41; in India it is £2, or about 28 rupees. The average surplus per individual remaining over in England is about £4 3s. 2½d.;

in India it is about 4½d. India, as we know, is an agricultural country; but in Australia, where there is a population of about 4,000,000, the value of the stock of horned cattle, sheep, pigs, horses, &c., is £113,500,000 sterling; whereas in India, with a population of 140,000,000, the live stock, such as oxen, buffaloes, horses, &c., &c., is valued at £90,250,000 only. Then the native trades of India have been affected by competition from this country, and this is a matter, surely, which ought to occupy the attention of the Financial Council in India. In India the agricultural industries represent 86 per cent. of the whole, other industries 12, and trade 2. In England the land stands at only 14 per cent., manufactures 30, and other occupations 55. But although India is represented so high in proportion in the matter of land, Sir James Caird some years ago said "that the quantity of land cultivated in proportion to the population was the smallest known." These are points which should occupy the attention of the Financial Council. Then there is the Salt Tax, the tax on spirits, opium, &c., which all need careful study and debate, with the view of relieving the burden of taxation and the miseries of a use of noxious drugs and drinks. In the United Kingdom, France, the United States and Germany there is an annual saving of £554,000,000; but in India, which has a population equal to all these four countries, there is only a saving of £3,500,000 per annum. I will not occupy the time of the Committee in pointing out how this poverty can be relieved; but I think it is little better than a farce to provide that while the financial statement should be produced the members cannot divide the Council upon the proposals it contains.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 26, to leave out all after "declared" to "Act," in line 30, and insert — "Provided the rules to be framed shall give power to any member of such meeting of the Council, when financial matters are under discussion, to submit or propose a resolution, and to divide the Council in respect of any such financial discussion; the rules shall also provide for the right of any member to enter a protest in writing, which protest shall be duly recorded in the proceedings of the Council for the day on which such protest is made. Provided, further, the rules to be framed shall give power to any member at any such meeting of any such Council to submit or propose a resolution for the production of papers relating to any question, and to divide the Council in respect of any such resolution; any member may enter a protest of dissent from the decision of the majority, and such protest shall be duly entered upon the proceedings of the Council. Further."

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

*(11.10.) MR. CURZON: I am afraid that the hon. Member has not shown any adequate appreciation of the magnitude of the proposal which he asks the House to accept. With respect to the protest in writing, I should like to point out that in the case of the financial discussion it would be superfluous. It would be in the power of any member to make a speech, and that speech would be reported, and the protests in writing would merely go to make up a voluminous and preposterous record of the proceedings, and would give the Council in India powers which it has not been suggested should be given even to this House. With respect to questions, if the Amendment were carried you would destroy the object of this Bill. It is intended by the restrictions to reserve to the Government a certain amount of discretion in the matter and if you decline to allow a discussion on a certain subject, and yet permit the minority to protest, you are providing scope for a discussion, and that discussion of a one-sided character. With respect to the general character of the proposals made by the hon. Gentleman, they seem to me to be not less subversive of the character and scope of the Bill than those he tried to introduce with reference to election. I think, if I may say so with respect, the hon. Gentleman entirely misconceives the character of these Councils. They are deliberative bodies with special reference to the subject before them, and they must remain deliberative bodies. But the hon. Gentleman wishes to alter this, and to turn them into Parliamentary bodies more or less similar to this House. But is not this a hopeless confusion of ideas? We cannot have a Parliamentary system in India. I am sorry to repeat myself, but I am bound to do so when the same arguments are brought up again and again against the Bill.

The Government must be in a majority in India, and the majority must be the Government; it cannot resign, because there is no Opposition to succeed it as in this country, and, in the case of an adverse vote or any other contingency arising, the minority would not be able to step in and take the place of the Government. Does the hon. Gentleman see the logical corollary of a victorious Opposition? Does he mean that in these Provincial Councils the Government are to give way to a victorious Opposition? Unless he means that the discussion that he asks for would be purely academic, and the power to divide would merely emphasize the impotence of the minority. I believe, if these provisions were introduced, they would only generate friction between the official and non-official members of the Council; and no single proposal advocated to-night would do more to hamper and embarrass and dislocate and ruin our Government in India than the one I am now considering. As to the power of unrestricted discussion, I can imagine nothing more undesirable than unrestricted discussion of the financial arrangements between the Imperial and Provincial Governments, in which officials might be called upon to defend arrangements for which they might not be responsible, on which they had not been consulted, and which might have been arrived at by the Imperial Government without their knowledge, and even without their consent. The proposal of the hon. Gentleman might be a source of very great friction, not only in the Council itself, but in the settlement of the financial relations between the Provincial and Imperial Governments. The same holds good with regard to Divisions upon the right of interpellation. If you have no check you might have questions asked at a most critical juncture on the relations between the Provincial and Imperial Governments, and a Resolution might even be moved upon a question of Imperial policy on which a Provincial Government has no right to express an opinion. Lord Kimberley said that he believed it was the right thing to give the right of interpellation, but that it was not a light matter to give that right, which must be carefully guarded, or it might be a source of great embarrassment to the Government. If the power for motions, resolutions, and divisions which the hon. Member asks for were given, I believe it would result in a very grave and serious condition of things. The whole object of the Bill, in making these two concessions—the right of criticism of the Budget and of asking questions—is to facilitate the giving of useful criticism, and undoubtedly the Government hope by these means to give power of expression to representatives of public opinion and of the native communities in India which they have not hitherto possessed. But this advantage might be purchased at too great a cost, and the benefits would be altogether wiped out if we introduced these extensive privileges, which could only have results that would be perfectly disastrous. The Government cannot for a moment consent to accept the Amendment, and I do not think the hon. Member can have any adequate conception of the difference between the Councils in India and Parliamentary bodies in this country when he asks us to introduce it into the Bill.

Mr. Curzon

(11.25.) Mr. MAC NEILL: I am sorry the Government will not accept the Amendment of my hon. Friend, and I do not think the Under Secretary has put forward any powerful arguments against the right of protest. The right is already well known in Indian affairs, and in the Council of the Secretary of State for India at home protests are the order of the day. Protests are very useful; they give in short form the Constitutional history of a country, as is shown in the history by the late Professor Thorold Rogers. I do not think the power of division and motion for the further production of papers would be any use at all, but I do not see why the right of protest should be withheld. The mere fact of the existence of the necessities which urged my hon. Friend to move the Amendment ought to be sufficient to lead to its adoption. The hon. Gentleman must know that these are practically provisions which are incorporated in the very constitution of the Council of the Secretary of State, and I do not see why he should not allow these to be incorporated here. His remarks in opposition to the Amendment go to show that the power of interrogation will become ineffectual and a mere farce. Discussion of financial questions will be utterly impracticable, will be useless, if there can be no division, people will not be able to see, the light of public opinion cannot come in on various questions, and it will not be seen how opinion is accentuated when there is no power of division and interrogation. I very much regret that after 30 years of immobility as far as this question is concerned, we should have this sham measure proposed, and I make my earnest protest, though I am reluctant to prolong this discussion now. From first to last the hon. Gentleman has not made a single concession to Members who are endeavouring to fight the cause of the Indian people. With great ingenuity and readiness of resource the Indian Secretary has replied to our arguments on the spur of the moment; but throughout he has not shown the slightest conciliatory spirit or endeavour in this Bill to consult native public opinion. At the very outset of these discussions I said the Bill would not confer a single benefit on the people of India, and now at the close I am bound to say that opinion is intensified when I find that this Amendment is rejected which would make the power of interrogation effective. I can only express my deep regret and great disappointment.

*(11.34.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: In his last speech the Under Secretary has I think unintentionally somewhat misled the Committee when he said that these Councils are deliberative assemblies. I think the Committee would understand from that that they are at this moment very much of the character of those mere debating societies, to which the hon. Gentleman said they might be reduced under certain conditions. Now, he must be thoroughly aware, and many Members of the Committee must be aware, that these are Legislative Councils in every sense of the word, and that it is to them, and to them alone, that India is indebted or misindebted for legislation under which government for good or bad is at this moment carried on. In the Debate on the Second Reading of the Bill I ventured to point to clauses of certain enactments which I considered were of the most oppressive character, and which were all passed by these self-same Legislative Assemblies, which the hon. Gentleman nevertheless calls deliberative. I will not at this hour go on to expatiate on details connected with the evil legislative work which has been done by the Councils; but I do say that the Amendment of my hon. Friend would go far towards rendering less farcical some of the pretended concessions of Clause 2. I do not hesitate to say that the clause as it stands pretends to make concessions, but really makes none. On financial questions, where the power of discussion would be most valuable, the concession given with one hand is withdrawn with the other, by conditions and restrictions which may be prescribed, and the same observation applies to the alleged concessions regarding divisions and interpellations. Therefore I say, without hesitation, that the people of India will declare, as we are bound in our places here to declare, that the clause as it stands is a sham, and that the Amendment of my hon. Friend would render the clause really effective, although I do not say that the reform he proposes, if carried, would even then be considered extremely valuable or important. Then, with regard to the objection of the hon. Gentleman to the recording of protests, I join with others who have spoken from this side of the House in expressing surprise that the hon. Gentleman, on the part of the Government, did not make a concession to this very moderate demand. The only reason I can imagine why he did not do so is connected with the whole tenour of the hon. Gentleman's speeches to-night. I think the Committee, and I think public opinion in India, when these Debates are read there, will read a strong lesson as to the opinion of Her Majesty's Government respecting the awful condition of biting poverty, and latent disaffection consequent thereon, in which India is. The hon. Gentleman must be convinced of this, for has he not come forward time after time in these discussions, and met our mild Amendments for the amplification of this Bill by the single declaration, "There is danger in everything you are proposing—danger of nothing less than the wreck and ruin of the Government of India"? Such alarmist language shows, I think, that the mind of the Government is at last alive to the awful state to which India has been reduced by a purely bureaucratic system of Government. The hon. Gentleman has alluded to the remarks of Lord Kimberley in another place, when the noble Lord said that the power of interpellation must be accompanied by considerable safeguards, amongst others the safeguard of an answer not being compelled when deemed inconsistent with the public interest. Well, I am not aware that my hon. Friend provides that Members of the Executive Government shall be compelled to answer dangerous or inconvenient questions. The same custom would, in fact, be recognised in the Legislative Council of the Governor General which is recognised in this House, where a Minister does not feel bound to answer at all times and seasons what he considers questions inimical to the public interest. That custom is well recognised, and I myself have had experience of it when the predecessor of the hon. Gentleman has told me—and I have not disputed his right to do so—that on behalf of the Government of India he must decline to answer certain questions as not being in consonance with the public interest. Then does that fact not render altogether meaningless the objection of the hon. Gentleman to this part of the Amendment? I am perfectly convinced that, when the people of India read these Debates, and especially when they read how this Amendment has been received by the Government, they will be confirmed in the impression that this Bill has been introduced for the purpose of throwing dust in the eyes of the English people. I do not suppose it is intended or even hoped to deceive—and it will certainly not deceive—the people of India. The Government are thinking not at all of the far-off 300,000,000 of the people in India, but of the 38,000,000 nearer to our doors in this country.

Mr. Seymour Keay

(11.40.) MR. MORTON: I am sorry to find the Government persist in refusing this very mild Amendment. I gather from the speech of the Under Secretary for India, that not only is the Bill a sham, but that the Indian Councils are also a sham; for he tells us that everything must be left to the Governor General in Council, and beyond that he cannot go. I do not blame the hon. Gentleman; he but follows the determination of the Government to shove the Bill through without any Amendment. The last speech of the hon. Gentleman was, I think, incomplete, because he did not give us the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian on this point. Perhaps he will supply this omission. As the Bill stands, I confess I do not see what actual power the Councils will have when, in regard to financial proposals, members are debarred from moving resolutions and taking divisions—a most extraordinary proposal to be accepted by this House of Commons. How can the opinion of a Council be expressed without a division? Speeches may be made, and those speeches will be officially reported, and I suppose the Governor General may eliminate from the reports what he considers dangerous matter. Even then the speeches are not read in this country, if any of the Indian people read them. But what does it all amount to more than the mere talk of a tea meeting? Really, it is difficult to understand why the Government take up time in resisting this very sensible Amendment. Is there anything unreasonable in the suggestion that a minority on the Council should have the right to record a protest? The House of Lords claims and exercises the right for a minority to record a protest, be that minority ever so small, and I do not know that that has ever been considered an improper proceeding. Surely the Tory Party might allow a custom of their pet institution to be carried out in India. Or is it that they consider the House of Lords cannot long survive, and that it is not wise to carry any of its customs into another country? Have not Members of the Tory Party, and notably the late Leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith), argued in favour of the record of a minority protest in this House? Practically, we have the power of making a protest by the right to take a Division, and I really cannot understand the fears of the Government which prevent them from conceding the right to the Indian Councils, nominated as the members will be, as men thoroughly to be depended upon by the Executive. If members were freely elected by the people I could understand the Tory fears of what the Council might do. For my own part, I am not at all afraid of the people. I am inclined to think, with regard to these Councils, that the more you take these people into confidence—the more you trust them—the better will be the Government of the country, the less will be the cause for alarm as to what may happen. To show the people we have some confidence in them the Government might well accept this Amendment as indicating we are not afraid to allow them a bona fide and actual share in the little matters of administration in which these Councils are concerned. I cannot say I hope the Government will make this concession; but at least we, the Radical section of this House, have endeavoured to show the people of India that we are anxious to do away with the necessity for holding that country by the sword. We would give the people some share in the government of their land, and the people of India may rest assured that the democracy of this country are anxious to do this justice.

(11.50.) DR. TANNER: I think we might have expected from the Under Secretary some answer to the remarks of the hon. Member near me (Mr. S. Keay). The hon. Member has accused the Under Secretary of trying to mislead the Committee. I listened with that attention which is due to the remarks of a responsible Minister, but I failed to understand how the hon. Gentleman supported the statement that these are merely deliberative Councils, and not legislative assemblies in any sense?

SIR R. TEMPLE: They are.

DR. TANNER: Of course we are dealing with questions of taxation, where they have no legislative power; but in dealing with other matters we have been distinctly told that the Councils have power to make laws, they have the power to vote, and therefore the power of veto; and, if so, what becomes of that part of the speech of the Under Secretary, in which he spoke of the impossibility of allowing a defeat of the Executive Government?

MR. CURZON: These Councils are legislative, with full power of speech, of moving Amendments, and of voting, but the suggestion of the hon. Member has reference to financial discussions and the right of questions thereon.

DR. TANNER: That is the first clear explanation we have had, and if it had been given earlier we might have decided on the Amendment half-an-hour ago. We are not all experts on these Indian subjects, and have a right to expect plain business-like explanations on matters we are required to deal with from a paid Under Secretary of State. But I must say I think the hon. Gentleman has trifled with the time of the Committee.

Amendment negatived.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. Member (Mr. Schwann) move other Amendments?

MR. MAC NEILL: We propose to take a Division on the present Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: A Division was not challenged.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg pardon; it was, Mr. Courtney.

THE CHAIRMAN: I put the Question that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause, and this was assented to.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again,"—(Dr. Tanner,) put, and negatived.

*(11.58.) MR. SCHWANN: I wish to move the Amendment to the end of the clause in reference to the presentation of a record of the proceedings to Parliament. I do not think I need enter into any long explanation. The expense will not be large, and I hope the Under Secretary can accept this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, at the end of the Clause, to add the words, "A record of all proceedings at the meetings of the Viceroy's Council, as now published in the 'Gazette of India,' and of the Presidency and Provincial Councils, shall be published in separate volumes and presented yearly to Parliament."—(Mr. Schwann.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

*(11.59.) MR. CURZON: This, I think, is superfluous. A copy of these proceedings is always furnished to the Library of this House, where any Member can refer to it. I do not see that anything will be gained by introducing the Amendment.

MR. SCHWANN: With the leave of the Committee I will withdraw the Amendment.

(12.0.) DR. TANNER: But I think the hon. Member must have known that there is this copy available, and our view is that the reports of the proceedings are meagre and insufficient.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Thursday.

ROADS AND BRIDGES (SCOTLAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL [Lords].—(No. 232.)

CONSIDERATION.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

(12.2.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I am not going to move any Amendment, nor could I now do so; but I wish to give notice that I intend, on the Motion for Third Reading, to move that the Bill be re-committed in order that a provision may be inserted restraining road authorities from destroying or injuring places of public interest in Scotland under powers they at present possess.

Motion agreed to.

Bill, as amended, considered; to be read the third time upon Thursday.

PLUMBERS REGISTRATION (Re-committed) BILL.—(No. 95.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Wednesday, 29th June.

NAVY (VICTUALLING YARD MANUFACTURING ACCOUNTS, 1890-91).

Annual Accounts presented,—of the Cost of Manufacturing, Provisions, Victualling Stores, &c., at the Home Victualling Yards for 1890-91, with the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General thereon [by Act]; to lie upon the Table.

DUBLIN BARRACKS BILL.

Ordered, That Mr. Barton, Mr. T. M. Healy, and Mr. Brodrick be Members of the Select Committee on Dublin Barracks Bill, with Two Members to be added by the Committee of Selection.—(Mr. Brodrick.)

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Lord Advocate, Bill to amend "The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890," as to Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate and Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 293.]

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICIARY (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Lord Advocate, Bill to regulate the Sittings of the High Court of Justiciary in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by The Lord Advocate and Mr. Solicitor General for Scotland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 294.]

ADJOURNMENT.

(12.10.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it may be for the convenience of the House if I make a statement as to the Business for Thursday. On the Tuesday when we separated for the Easter Recess, I stated that on Thursday we proposed to take the discussion on the Budget; but I regret to say that I have just had a notification from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he will not be able to be present in the House on Thursday, he being confined to his residence by sickness. The Business, therefore, for Thursday must be changed, and I propose to ask the House to take the Second Reading of the Clergy Discipline Bill. I do not make this an absolute arrangement, or give an absolute pledge that this will be the first Order; but I think it will be convenient to give the earliest notice of the change which will have to be made.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 26th April, 1892.

QUESTIONS.

STOLEN POSTAL ORDERS.

MR. R. CHAMBERLAIN (Islington, W.) : I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the fact that the public have suffered loss from the circulation of genuine postal order forms (said to have been stolen from a post office), but with forged postmaster's signature and date stamp of issuing office; whether, in this case, any compensation will be made to the innocent holders of these orders, who have given value for them; and whether any measures will be taken to prevent the perpetration of similar frauds in future?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N E.) : A small number of blank postal order forms were stolen from a post office in London in January last and by forgery of the kind described in the question were made to appear as if they were complete postal orders. Taking advantage of the readiness with which postal orders are accepted as currency, even where the regulations prescribed by Parliament have not been complied with, the thieves passed them off on tradesmen and others. Steps meanwhile had been taken to put all paying offices on their guard and in several cases where the forged orders were presented at post offices payment was refused. No doubt the immediate holders of the forged orders are innocent in the sense that they gave value for them; but in accepting them as currency, and that, too, from persons whom they did not know, they did so at their own risk, and of course the Department cannot be responsible for the consequences. Measures are being taken which will tend to prevent frauds of this kind in the future.

THE VACCINATION COMMISSION.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Interim Report of the Royal Commission on Vaccination will be printed and distributed?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's) : I am informed that the Commission have made a preliminary Report, and I have no doubt it will be printed and distributed within a very short time.

MICE PLAGUE IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CHANNING : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether his attention has been called to the increasing discontent among agriculturists in the South of Scotland as to the "mice plague," and to the alleged urgent danger of sheep stock owing to the serious deterioration of hill pasture; whether he has considered the resolutions passed at a meeting at Moffat, on Saturday, 16th April, regretting the refusal of the Board of Agriculture to take action in the matter, and calling for "a more exhaustive and systematic inquiry"; and whether he will either cause such an inquiry to be set on foot without delay, or will introduce or support a Bill temporarily prohibiting the further destruction of birds of prey and vermin which have usually been found to keep mice down?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford) : My attention has been called again to the ravages of the mice plague in certain counties in Scotland, and during the holidays I have received further communications on the subject from my hon. Friends the Members for Lanarkshire and Kirkcudbright and from meetings of agriculturists in that part of Scotland. In deference to their representations I have directed a further inquiry to be made, although I am not sanguine as to our being able to add much to the information we possess already. With regard to the Bill suggested for the purpose of temporarily prohibiting the destruction of birds of prey and vermin, I apprehend that what is required is some remedy for the plague which should take immediate effect; whereas the operation of any such Bill could only be distant. I have no reason to believe, so far as I am at present informed, that the sudden appearance of the mice plague is due to the destruction of birds of prey and of vermin, which has been the practice for years. But if it is shown upon further inquiry that a remedy can be supplied either in that or any other direction by legislation, I should be prepared either to introduce or support any measures which promised to be effective for the purpose. I am perfectly sensible of the gravity of the situation in which sheep farmers in Scotland are placed by this plague, and the hon. Member may be assured that anything that can be done shall be done; but the difficulty at present is to devise any remedy which is likely to be adequate to the occasion.

PROVISIONS IN THE MERCANTILE MARINE.

SIR E. HARLAND (Belfast, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the Report for the year 1891 of Her Majesty's Consul General at Havre, in which he states—

"I have observed that much is being said of late, and a good deal of criticism passed, about the food and accommodation furnished to seamen. I cannot call to mind any complaints which have been made to me on the ground of bad food, and the few cases which have been brought to my notice have been where some article was given out during the voyage, with the result that a money compensation has been paid to the men in respect thereof;"

and whether he has any reason to doubt the correctness of those statements; if not, whether he will encourage any further legislation on the subject of provisions at sea until such has been found desirable after full inquiry by, say, a Departmental Committee of the Board of Trade?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): My attention has been called to the Report referred to, and I see no reason to doubt that the extract quoted in the question of my hon. Friend correctly represents the experience of the Consul General at Havre, but the Consul General also admits that there are cases in which there is ground for complaint. I do not regard the absence of complaints at Havre as conclusive evidence of the good quality of the provisions supplied to all British ships, nor do I think it necessary to postpone legislation in order that such an inquiry as my hon. Friend suggests may be held.

CORDITE SMOKELESS POWDER.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the patent for cordite smokeless powder is Specification No. 5614, A.D. 1889, "An improvement in the manufacture of explosives for ammunition"; and, if so, on what date the patent was assigned to him; on what date did he certify to the Comptroller his opinion that, in the interest of the Public Service, the particulars of the invention, and of the manner in which it is to be performed, should be kept secret; on what date was the complete specification left, and on what date was it accepted; in what foreign countries have Sir Frederick Abel and Professor Dewar patented cordite; whether the foreign patents are secret or open; and to whom the profits of these foreign patents are to go?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The patent referred to relates to cordite, and was assigned to the Secretary of State on 24th June, 1890. On 28th June, 1890, the Secretary of State certified that it would be for the public advantage that the particulars of the invention should be kept secret; but he has since decided that such secrecy is not now necessary. The complete specification was left on 2nd April, 1889, and was accepted on 2nd July, 1889. I am not able to answer the last three paragraphs of the question.

COUNTY COUNCIL POLLING PLACES.

MR. BONSOR (Surrey, Wimbledon): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to the inconvenience arising from the uncertainty of the law as to whether a County Council has power to appoint a polling place for an Electoral Division outside the limits of that Division; and if he will state whether the County Council have any such power?

Mr. Chaplin

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): There is, in my opinion, no uncertainty in the law. A polling place must be situated within the boundaries of the Division.

MR. BONSOR: May I ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will consider the advisability of introducing a short Bill to remedy this inconvenience?

MR. RITCHIE: I think it would be extremely hazardous for the Government to undertake to amend the Local Government Act this Session.

PARLIAMENTARY REGISTRATION.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in the event of Her Majesty's Ministers intending to advise Her Majesty to dissolve the present Parliament between the month of September and December of the present year, they contemplate bringing in a Bill to enable all persons being qualified after July next to vote?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The contingency to which the hon. Gentleman refers is remote and uncertain, and the Government have not thought it necessary to consider if any, and what, steps should be taken in the event of such a contingency arising.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Do I understand that if such a contingency does occur the Government will act in such a manner as I suggest?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman can hardly make that deduction from what I have said.

PARLIAMENTARY REPORTING.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he intends to name the Committee upon Parliamentary Reporting that he promised would be nominated after Easter; and whether he has considered the advisability of appointing a Joint Committee of both Houses?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If I may take the Question as indicating a desire on the part of the hon. Member or of other Members for the appointment of such a Committee [Mr. LABOUCHERE assented] I will, of course, in consonance with the promise I gave, appoint the Committee. I think that the further suggestion contained in the second paragraph of the question—namely, that the Committee should be a joint one of both Houses, is well worthy of consideration; but I can hardly give an answer until next week, when the House of Lords meets again. Meantime I will consider the matter.

BUSINESS ON THURSDAY.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): Perhaps the First Lord of the Treasury can now inform the House what is to be the business on Thursday next?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The first Bill to be set down for consideration will be the Clergy Discipline Bill.

PERSIAN TOBACCO MONOPOLY.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table of the House all Correspondence that has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Directors of the Tobacco Concession Company in Persia, between Her Majesty's Government and Her Majesty's Representative at Teheran, and between Her Majesty's Representative at Teheran and the Persian Government, in regard to the indemnity to be paid to the Company in consequence of the abrogation of the concession; whether he is in a position to state who were the persons who obtained the tobacco concession, and what they paid for it; whether they sold this concession to the Company now claiming compensation for £300,000; and whether this £300,000 is included in the amount of compensation which Her Majesty's Representative at Teheran urged the Persian Government to pay to the Company on abrogating the concession?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): The Papers referred to are being prepared, and will be laid when the communications, which are now passing with the Persian Government, are closed. The concession was obtained, as Her Majesty's Government were informed, from the Persian Government by Major Talbot, but without the intervention of Her Majesty's Government, or their knowledge. They have no information as to the amount paid for it. Her Majesty's Government are informed that it was transferred to the Imperial Tobacco Corporation of Persia for the sum of £300,000. The Papers, when presented, will show the action taken by Her Majesty's Representative at Teheran, which has been directed to an attempt to bring about an amicable solution of the difficulty.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Can the hon. Gentleman say when we may expect these Papers?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I have said they will be laid on the Table as soon as negotiations now passing between Her Majesty's Government and the Persian Government have arrived at a definite result, but when that will be I cannot say; very shortly, I think.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Are we to understand that the presentation of these Papers is to be deferred until the Persian Government have paid this sum of money?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: No, I did not say that, I said until the negotiations have arrived at some definite issue.

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR), INSPECTORS' REPORT.

MR. CHANNING: Will the President of the Board of Trade say if he will grant the Return in reference to the hours of labour of railway servants, notice of which I have on the Paper?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: It really amounts to a collection of extracts from Papers already laid before the House, but I have no objection if the hon. Member presses it.

MR. CHANNING: I will move for the Return now.

Return ordered—

"Of all instances in which the Inspectors of the Board of Trade, in their Reports on Railway Accidents inquired into by them since and including the year 1884, have represented that the hours of any of the railway servants on duty on the occasion of such accidents have been unduly long, stating the name, date, and nature of such accidents, and the Railway or Railways on which they occurred, and giving in full the Passages in such Reports relating to such unduly long Hours.—(Mr. Channing.)

Mr. J. W. Lowther

THE INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. BRYCE: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he proposes to finish the Committee on the Indian Councils Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is true the Committee discussion of the Bill was not actually finished last night; but, as the hon. Gentleman knows, practically all the controversial part of the Bill was concluded, and I hope the Bill will pass through Committee in a few minutes this or next week. It is but the fag end of the Bill that remains to be disposed of, but I cannot pledge myself now as to when it will be taken.

MOTIONS.

COAST COMMUNICATIONS.

SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): In bringing forward the Motion which stands in my name in reference to coast communication, I do not think the House will expect from me any apology for taking up a short time with the explanation of such a subject, nor do I think the House will turn a deaf ear to the appeal I make on behalf of the seafaring interests for the better protection of life and property around the coasts of the United Kingdom. It may be thought that in consequence of the answer given by the First Lord of the Treasury to a question I put to him a short time since, there is no necessity for me to bring forward this matter; but I think it will be more satisfactory if it is formally dealt with by the House after a short debate, on which both sides may have an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the proposals I have to make. It will, I think, be a matter of astonishment to everybody, both in the House and outside, when we consider the fact that England is so far behindhand in regard to this question of the protection of life and property at sea by means which have been adopted in many other maritime countries. We occupy the proud position of being the first maritime Power in the world; more shipping comes to the ports around our coasts than to any other part of the world, and it is matter of wonder that we have so long delayed this matter, and have taken no steps to bring it to a final conclusion. I do not desire for a moment to condemn any Government that they have not taken up this question before this, but inasmuch as every disaster that has taken place around our coasts, where there has been loss of life, must be the subject of official inquiry, a melancholy long list of disasters pigeon-holed at the Board of Trade, must be in existence, and it would be a matter of public interest if it were known, which it probably never will be, to what extent the Board of Trade officials have brought pressure to bear upon various Presidents of the Board, urging that steps should be taken to bring this matter before Parliament. We boast over and over again of the extent of our Mercantile Marine, and we are justly proud of being the ocean carriers for the world. Each year we show the growth of our shipping tonnage; but as regards protection from loss of life in the seas around our coasts we show no progress. Whether it is due to one Department or another—the Board of Trade, the Admiralty, or the Post Office—this question has been shunted from one Department to the other, and no action has been taken. One Department under the Board of Trade has, I think, acted as a convenient buffer for that Department—Trinity House. They have been handicapped to a very great extent by not being supported by Parliament in a liberal way, and what might have been done in the past in regard to communication with light vessels and out-lying lighthouses has been checked by the action of the Treasury. In the result, we occupy a humiliating and unfortunate position, having to admit to the world that while little Denmark, with an import and export trade of 30 millions, has long since successfully dealt with this question of coast communication, and other maritime nations have done much in the same direction, Great Britain, with its annual import and export trade of £743,000,000 sterling, has done but little. The House will see that in the Motion to which I invite attention I have divided the subject into two parts: I have dealt with coast communication proper, and also with the question of cable communication between light vessels and outlying rock lighthouses and the shore. Inasmuch as the latter question has already been partially dealt with, or at all events experiments have been carried out from time to time, I prefer to deal with this part of my subject first. What I ask for in regard to floating light vessels and outlying lighthouses involves engineering and financial questions, and these should in the first instance be dealt with by a Royal Commission. But as regards the practicability of carrying out a system of cable communication with floating light vessels that has been absolutely proved, has been shown to be absolutely feasible by the experiments off the coast of Essex by cable communication with the Sunk lightship. Communication with this vessel was established in 1884, and in 1887 the then President of the Board of Trade appointed a Departmental Committee to inquire into the question whether or not it was desirable to continue this cable communication with the sunk light vessel, whether it was likely to lead to the preservation of life, and into various other matters connected therewith. I served on that Committee, together with the late Colonel King-Harman, who, as Member for the Isle of Thanet, naturally took a deep interest in questions concerning the preservation of life at sea in connection with the dangers of the Goodwin Sands. We unfortunately found ourselves in a hopeless minority on that Departmental Committee; the Board of Trade opinion was all-powerful, and we were swamped. I regret that I felt obliged, when we came to consider the final Report in 1889, to draw up, and, after Colonel King-Harman's death, to sign, a Minority Report, because the conclusion arrived at by the majority of the Committee was that, inasmuch as there had been a considerable amount of money expended, and there had been little result in the saving of life, it was not desirable that the expenditure should be continued. I have never for a moment regretted that I signed a Minority Report in which I strongly declared my opinion that the experiment ought to be continued over another five years, and that Parliament ought to vote a further and adequate sum for such experiments. As a matter of fact, during the trial there had been no severe gales of wind at all, it was proved beyond doubt that there had been exceptionally few disasters on the sands adjacent to the Sunk light. The Trinity Corporation were adverse to the continuation, because they felt that the money devoted to this cable communication would be better expended in lighting dangerous sands around our coasts, and one fact which came out in evidence might possibly have influenced the Trinity Corporation. On one occasion, soon after cable communication was established between the Sunk light and the shore, the official in charge of the Sunk light was hailed by a passing vessel the master of which desired to send a communication to land. He came very near the light vessel, and the Brethren felt that the lightship was in some danger; but the Elder Brethren were slightly shocked by the communication the master of the homeward bound vessel desired to send. The captain was a newly married man, and he asked the officer in charge of the light vessel to communicate to the shore a message for his wife that he was safe and sound and would be in port in a few hours. Well, the Trinity Corporation were, as I have just stated, shocked, and this incident, I believe, had some influence in bringing about the unfortunate Report of 1889, which led to the stoppage of the communication between the Sunk lightship and the land. The feasibility of keeping up such communication has been proved beyond doubt. It was proved that the men in charge of the light vessel were perfectly capable of working the cable communication while they could undertake the splicing of the cable and other repairs, and I know, having been on board the Sunk lightship, that it is as easy to communicate through the telephone to the shore as it is to speak through the telephone anywhere on land. As regards whether or not it is better for the preservation of life that there should be cable communication, I have only to point out that in the case of snow-storms or fogs, when rockets are not able to be seen from the mainland, the officer in charge of the light-vessel can telephone the exact position of any vessel in distress, and thus put a stop to that which has almost always been the case when a lifeboat goes out in response to a signal of distress, so that they will be able to go direct to the vessel in distress, instead of going to the lightvessel and asking where the vessel is, and probably to be informed that they heard the guns firing from a certain direction, or that they saw rockets in such a direction; and that delay is of the most serious consequence as regards the lifeboat service. I might, in passing, just quote some extracts from telephonic messages which were received on the mainland through the Sunk cable as reported to the Committee of the Board of Trade, the Departmental Committee to which I have referred. On 7th September, 1886, a message was received at Walton, in Essex, from Sunk lightship, by telephone that a "Vessel was ashore on the South-West part of Long Sand, or on Kentish Knock."

Sir E. Birkbeck

On 17th April, 1887—

"Signals of distress seen on the North-East part Long Sand or Sunk."

On 24th September, 1887—

"A schooner in distress on Long Sand bearing S. by W., a little westerly."

On 24th June, 1888—

"Can hear guns firing in direction of 'Knock.'"

On 22nd March, 1889—

"Barque ashore on lower part of 'Sunk,' bearing South-South-West."

On 16th May, 1889—

"Guns firing at five minutes interval in direction of 'Shipwash.'"

Now I quote the case of a vessel that was lost only last week, on Easter Monday morning. It was off my own coast of Norfolk, eight miles from the shore on the north-west part of the coast, on some sands known as Burnham Flats. The vessel came from the Baltic. It was seen by the lifeboat crew at six o'clock in the morning; the lifeboat was launched, but it had eight miles to go against a gale of wind and a heavy sea. If there had been telegraphic or telephonic communication with the Coastguard it could have been communicated to the Lincolnshire coast at a place called Skegness; and the lifeboat might have been able to go off to the exact spot with a fair wind, and would have saved at least three hours, and in all probability might have saved seven lives that were unfortunately lost out of a crew of eight. Bearing upon this question of communication with lightships, I have only to remind the House of the unfortunate case of the German emigrant ship Deutschland, that was wrecked on the Kentish Knock, 24 miles from the Essex coast, in thick weather. The total crew and passengers numbered 230 men, and of these 173 were saved by the Harwich tug boat, and 57 were lost. The vessel stranded on the north-east of the Kentish Knock at six o'clock in the morning of the 6th December. Guns and signals of distress were at once fired, but they were not seen from the Kentish Knock for three and a-half hours. These signals were not observed on the Sunk lightvessel, 13 miles distant, till 5.30 in the evening; and the Cork lightvessel had the intelligence conveyed to Harwich, five miles distant, which it reached at 7.30 in the evening, 13 hours after the vessel had been wrecked. The lifeboat from Broadstairs arrived too late to save any of these 57 lives. Had there been cable communication in that case, undoubtedly they might have been saved. Then we have the case of the Indian Chief, which was wrecked on the 5th January, 1881, on another well-known sand, the Long Sands, 18 miles from the coast of Essex. The crew numbered 29; there were twelve saved by the Ramsgate lifeboat, but 17 were drowned. That is another case where there was a very long delay indeed. I think it was something like 28 hours before the Ramsgate lifeboat arrived at the scene of the wreck. And now we come to a case of a far later date. On the 11th of December of last year the steamship Enterkin of Glasgow was wrecked on the Galloper Sands, 25 miles from the Essex coast and 30 miles from Ramsgate. Out of a crew of 30 there were 27 lost; one was saved by a Ramsgate smack, and two by a passing vessel. Here again the vessel was wrecked at 5 o'clock in the evening. The poor unfortunate crew were lashed to the rigging; and it was not till 3 o'clock the next morning that a fishing boat, Britons' Pride, passed the wreck and saved one hand; at 7.30 o'clock the other two were saved by a passing vessel. There are numbers of such cases; but there is no necessity for me to refer to more than these three. As regards what lightvessels ought to be placed in telegraphic communication with the mainland, that is a matter for a Royal Commission to inquire into and consider; and also the rock lighthouses. Undoubtedly the Fastnet, the Tuscar, the Eddystone, the Bishop, and the Bull Rock are all points of very great importance as regards the saving of life. Of course I might be told that in the case of the Fastnet, where communication was made and was in existence for a short time, but ultimately broke down, that it would be very difficult and very expensive to carry it out; still, the Engineers' Reports and the evidence given before the Departmental Committee of the Board of Trade show that it would be perfectly possible to carry out the work there and to carry a cable down below where the wash of the waves would be liable to break the cable, and that there is no difficulty whatever, in an engineering point of view, in carrying out this work. Now, coming to the question of coast communication proper, I take up that on behalf of two great life-saving services—the Lifeboat Service and the Rocket Apparatus Service. Everyone who is engaged in the lifeboat service, whatever the crews may be, are only too ready to risk their own lives, if there is the remotest chance of saving the lives of those who are in danger; and nobody regrets more than the lifeboat crews when they come ashore after a fruitless errand, and have been told that had they received earlier communication they could have undoubtedly saved lives. And it too often occurs that when a lifeboat or a rocket apparatus has got to the spot where a wreck has taken place they only find pieces of the wreck left, and possibly the dead bodies of the poor crew, who might have been saved, and are being washed on shore. All that the lifeboat crews and the men in charge of rocket apparatus ask for is that there should be as rapid and instantaneous communication as possible with the mainland. There are so many cases where these two services have been sent for either by messengers on foot or on horseback; but in the case of inquiries where loss of life has taken place it has been proved that a foot messenger, or even a messenger on horseback, would not have been able to give the information in time. One well-known case bearing upon this subject is that of the steamship Lymington, which was lost in February, 1889, at Lee, not 30 miles from the Hartland quay on the North Coast of Devon, simply from the want of wire between the Morthoe and Ilfracombe Coastguard stations and the Bull Point lighthouse. At the Coroner's inquest, which took place, the following evidence was given:—

"Williams, a boatman, was on the cliffs shouting to the crew. He was there from 12 to about 3.20 a.m. Words of encouragement were shouted, and the crew seemed hopeful and quiet until they found the tide was overtaking them, then their shouts became more frequent; as the tide advanced they increased their calls for help and entreaties for assistance. Each time they were told to keep up hope, as help was coming. When the tide was probably up to their feet, and they knew their vessel must soon break up, their cries became agonising, and as many as four distinct voices, some more powerful and pleading than others, were heard. At last the sea had reached its height, and about 3.15 a.m. a crash and screams were heard, and all was silent. Hours of agony and their lives might have been saved but for the delay of the rocket apparatus, which for want of wire communication only arrived on the spot after the ship had broken up without a single soul upon her reaching the shore alive."

Then there is the well-known case of the s.s. Schiller, that was wrecked so far back as the 7th May, 1875, on the Retarrier Rocks, three quarters of a mile E.S.E. of the Bishop Light, five miles West of St. Agnes Island. In that case out of 364 passengers only 44 were saved, by shore boats from St. Agnes, and 320 were drowned. It was proved at the Coroner's inquest that had there been cable communication in all probability all the lives lost in that disaster might have been rescued by the lifeboats and other means. I need hardly say, as regards the Lifeboat Institution, there have been cases where as many as six lifeboats have gone out to one signal of distress. Had there been cable communication from the adjoining lightvessels probably only one lifeboat need have gone out, and the other five lifeboats and their crews need not have run the risk which they naturally run whenever they do go out. I do not mean to say, in stating that, that the Lifeboat Institution desires for one moment to stop men from going out whenever there is a case of a vessel in distress; but, nevertheless, if there were means of communication between the lightvessels there would be over and over again cases of telegrams to adjoining lifeboat stations giving the information that there was no necessity for the adjoining lifeboats to launch, because one had already gone out to the vessel in distress. But then we have another aspect of this matter to consider, and that is the case of where a steamer or vessel is passing some well-known headland and she is sighted by the lighthouse authorities. She is seen to be in distress; she drives before a gale of wind and is approaching nearer and nearer to the shore, and it is too late to get the adjacent lifeboat out, because the vessel will be driven far beyond their reach by the time the lifeboat is launched. But I am quite certain that if there was a wire to inform a lifeboat station or rocket apparatus ten miles off, the lifeboat there would be prepared to launch and would meet this vessel so driving before the gale of wind; or there might be a telegraphic or telephonic message sent ordering one or more tugs from some adjacent port to proceed to sea and save the vessel. There are numbers of cases off the coast of South Wales where vessels have been lost, and where the crews might have been saved had there been an opportunity of communicating by wire with the tugs to go out and tow them in. In a commercial point of view undoubtedly it has been proved over and over again that there might have been a vast amount of property saved if this coast communication was in existence around our shores. I can quote one case which I saw myself. One of the North German Lloyd's steamers, the Werra, was passing down the Channel one Sunday morning. It ran aground at Dungeness, about a quarter of a mile inside the point. It had over 600 passengers and crew on board. It was perfectly smooth, I admit; and as I was going down the Channel in a yacht we lowered a boat and asked the captain if we could render any assistance. He stated that he ran aground about 10.30 in the morning. He sent a boat ashore at once in order to telegraph for assistance. He was told by the authorities that the office had been closed at 10 o'clock, and would not be open again till Monday morning. He asked us then to proceed down Channel to Hastings where we sent off a telegram to the post office asking for tug boats to come to his rescue. The vessel was ultimately got off as the weather was smooth, or else undoubtedly she would have been lost. In the case of the Eida, which ran aground this last winter on the South of the Isle of Wight, there was no means of sending information except on horseback some distance inland to the telegraph office, and when the captain signalled at seven o'clock in the morning for the lifeboat to proceed to his assistance the crew of the lifeboat at once launched; but a messenger had to go off on foot—I think in one case on horseback—to ask the two adjacent lifeboats to come to their assistance. That is another case where, in a commercial point of view, it is absolutely important that there should be instantaneous communication. Then at Lundy Island there was cable communication, but, unfortunately, it was laid across the tide, and was broken, and has never been repaired, but it was proved that there is no difficulty whatever in the way of its being properly laid. A French steamship, Tunisie, ran aground this winter on the 19th February, 1892, at Lundy Island in a snowstorm on a Friday morning, and it was not known on the mainland till the Sunday; though I am bound to admit that all the lives were saved by lines thrown from the cliff in that case. But, in a commercial point of view, there was no power to communicate with the mainland as regards that disaster till the Sunday. I hope there are some hon. Members representing the Naval Service here who will admit the great importance of this question from a Naval point of view. When his Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh terminated his duty at the Naval Reserve Office he wrote a very important Despatch, calling attention to the absolute necessity of having coast communication between all Coastguard stations around the coast of the United Kingdom; and I am glad to think that the present First Lord of the Admiralty during the last few years has added, I think, upwards of 100 stations to the 50 that were in existence prior to his term of office. But though the Admiralty can boast of 150 stations at the present time that are in telegraphic communication, I think they must admit that it is only during the naval manœuvres that there is communication open day and night and on Sunday; and that during the rest of the year this communication is only open from eight in the morning till eight in the evening, and two hours on Sundays. The House will remember the case of Her Majesty's ship Banterer when coming from Ireland to Plymouth in a gale of wind took refuge under Lundy Island. There was consternation that no intelligence was received of her whereabouts, and two or three vessels were immediately ordered to proceed from Plymouth to her assistance. Had there been communication between Lundy Island and the mainland the Naval Authorities would have known at once where she was. I contend very strongly indeed that coast communication is of the utmost value, whether it is for the saving of life or property, whether it is for the shipping interest or the commercial interest, for naval warfare, for salvage purposes, or for the fishing industry. It also seems surprising that the warnings from the Meteorological Society's Office in London at the present time are only sent out to 166 lifeboat stations, and that there are 105 stations that never receive any warning at all. The House will ask, what do other countries do? I have referred to Denmark. Denmark has certainly set a bright example to England, and I should like to quote a letter that came before the Board of Trade Departmental Committee from Denmark, giving an exact account of what Denmark has done. Briefly speaking, it is stated that this system was commenced in 1889:—

Sir E. Birkbeck

“There are four stations for communicating with passing vessels—Hawtholm, Hortholm, Skagen (the Scaw), Hammoren (Bornholm). But besides this, there is a great part of our lighthouses and of the saving stations (lifeboat and rocket) connected with our common telegraph system, partly with the view of calling help to ships in peril, partly for communication between fishers and their markets, and partly used in the interest of our service, giving notice of ice, so that we can wait to the last moment, sending tugboats to tug in our lightships, to tell if lightships and buoys are not at their due place, and if gas buoys do not burn well, &c., &c. . . . We have no cable connection with any lightship. On the other hand, our most isolated island lighthouses are connected with the telegraph system. . . . Where there is no telegraph station near the lifeboat or rocket stations these are generally connected with the nearest telegraph station, or with each other by telephone wires. By this means we are nearly able to follow a ship in danger of being set on shore by a storm, and the lifeboats and the rockets can be in place nearly at the moment of the running on shore. Steamers can be called to a ship that has been run on shore, and this ship can then often be taken off shore again before the sea rises and breaks it down."

Then, as regards America, America has done a great deal more than probably the House has any idea of in a certain quarter. I am now quoting from a letter addressed to the Chief Inspector of the Royal National Lifeboat Institution by the General Superintendent of the United States Life Saving Service, dated 26th May, 1890. There are 56 lighthouses connected in the Gulf of the Lower St. Lawrence. He states—

"Many notable instances of the saving of life have occurred on the coast of the United States, one of the most remarkable being at the Lewes Station, at the entrance to Delaware Bay, on 10th and 11th of September, 1889, when the keeper by summoning to his aid the crews of the two nearest stations was able to rescue, without the loss of a single life, the crews of 22 vessels, an aggregate of 194 souls. Had not the telephone been used it is likely that for the want of the early presence of the neighbouring crews many lives would have been lost. The resources of the three stations were employed to the utmost, and nearly all the hawsers, lines, and other movable gear were used up. Another advantage of the telephone is that it enables a station to warn others along the line of the approach of vessels that seem likely to go ashore in their neighbourhood. It often occurs that a vessel may be seen driving past a station and beyond the reach of its crew in a manner indicating that she is likely to strand some ten or 15 miles away. By timely warning the crews in the chain can be on the ground ready to begin operations as soon as she comes within reach, thus saving valuable time and increasing the chances of successful work."

Sir E. Birkbeck

Then Holland has had since 1885 the whole of her lighthouses connected with the mainland by wire. At the Cape we have five lighthouses in telegraphic communication, and the Indian Government have carried out the same system. I could go, if necessary, through a number of cases of the most disastrous loss of life around the coast of the United Kingdom, in which telegraphic or telephonic communication would undoubtedly have been the means of saving a great many lives. I think it is only right to say that when the London and North-Western Railway Company were applied to by the Lifeboat Institution to allow their telegraph wires to be used on the North Coast of Wales, in the case of any vessel being seen in distress, they at once assented, stating that their stationmasters had been given orders to immediately communicate in such cases with the Lifeboat Institution, and the Board of Trade. In 1887 the Superintendent of Lloyd's gave evidence before the Board of Trade Committee to the effect that a number of their signalling stations had been the means of saving lives. The Deputy Master of the Trinity Corporation, Captain Sir Sydney Webb, gave important evidence before the sub-committee of the Lifeboat Institution. He was asked—

"Supposing a large steam vessel were in distress in a fog in the vicinity of one of your lighthouses, and the lighthouse keeper knew the lifeboat station was about a mile off, and that probably lives would be lost unless the authorities were warned, and the boat sent out in time, would your man run down one mile to the lifeboat station to warn them?"

His answer was—

"Certainly; a messenger would be sent."

He was then asked—

"If the vessel was seen to be in a sinking condition, and passing the point, and there were telegraphic or telephonic communication, there would not be any great difficulty in warning the lifeboat by this means?"

His reply was—

"No; certainly not."

The third question put to the witness was—

"And if the man were paid by the lifeboat authorities a certain amount as a reward for giving this notice, the objection would be in great measure removed?"

His reply was—

"Certainly."

We therefore have it on the high authority of the Deputy Master of the Trinity Corporation that where a lighthouse is situated at a point likely to give intelligence with regard to a vessel in distress there is no reason why one of the hands belonging to the lighthouse should not immediately telephone to the nearest coastguard station to that effect. The House, of course, realises that at the present time the telegraphic offices around our coast are open only from eight in the morning till eight at night, and on Sunday mornings from eight till ten o'clock; and it is obvious that in order to make postal communication effective it is absolutely necessary that they should be open the entire 24 hours, every day and night of the week, as well as on Sundays. Surely it would be no hardship to have an alarm bell placed in the bedroom of the local postmaster, for it would be perhaps only once or twice in a year that he would be called upon to leave his bed and to proceed to the lifeboat or the coastguard station to see that they had notice that a vessel was in danger. The system of communication round the coast ought to be made as effective as it is in London with regard to the fire-escapes. There is no necessity for going into further details in regard to this matter, because the need for such communication is perfectly clear. Whether it would cost £50,000 or £100,000, or £200,000, should not be considered when it is a question of the preservation of life and property. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a deficit next year he could lay the whole blame on the cost of such a scheme, and I do not think the country would mind it. The unfortunate British sailor looks to the House of Commons to provide further means for the saving of life round our coast. He very seldom has the opportunity of recording his vote at elections, but he thinks a great deal about what is being done in Parliament for his safety when in a gale of wind he has some dangerous sand bank under his lee, or some rock-bound coast on which he may be wrecked. I have not referred to the large number of lives that have been lost on our coast, because anyone can see the statistics for himself; but the number is very large, and I consider it is the duty of the House to do what it can to prevent such loss. I know that the fishing industry are looking forward with very great interest to what the House will do in regard to this matter. From a commercial point of view, the question is one of very great importance. Sixty-six Chambers of Commerce have passed resolutions in favour of providing such communication, and I have not heard one voice raised against it. Therefore, I trust that the House will come to a unanimous conclusion in favour of this proposal, and that we shall let the maritime population of this country, as well as that of other Powers, know that the House of Commons has come to the determination to put an end as far as possible to the awful tragedies and harrowing scenes which are too often witnessed around the coast of England. I am sure that our gallant seamen, of whom we are so proud, will be thankful to the House if it passes this Resolution. It is only fair to say that a great amount of credit is due to those gentlemen who have assisted to bring this matter before the country. I hope that hon. Members have read the stirring articles which have appeared in the Times newspaper from the pen of a special commissioner who went round certain parts of the coast for the purpose of obtaining information on the subject. The House will not expect me to say anything further in support of the Resolution. I will only say that I hope the House will put an end to what I must call a grave scandal, and that it will adopt the course I have proposed. I beg to move the Resolution that stands in my name.

*MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): The speech of the hon. Member in moving his Resolution has made my task in seconding it both an easy and a difficult one. He has made it easy, because he has so ably stated his case and so admirably marshalled the facts upon which he relies, and no one is more capable of dealing with the question than he is, because of his practical knowledge with all maritime matters, and because of his connection with that unique institution—the National Lifeboat Institution — of which I may almost say he is the leading spirit. He has made my task a difficult one, because of the thoroughness of the manner in which he has urged the claimant's necessity for the reform he advocates, and it seems to me that I should be only injuring a good cause if I were to tell a twice told tale in seconding the Resolution. The arguments in favour of the reform advocated by my hon. Friend, indisputable though I believe them to be, self-evident as they must be even to the most careless consideration, nevertheless lie within a narrow compass. I need not go into details with regard to disasters which might have been prevented or mitigated if the scheme which is now recommended had been adopted. Prompt and instant action is just as necessary to cope with the necessities for rescue of life and property from the winds and waves as it is to provide protection against fire. What would be thought of a fire brigade which was not connected with its various stations by the very latest appliances of electrical science? The Parliamentary Representatives of this great maritime nation have the right to claim from the Imperial Government a care for the life and property borne on the seas around our coasts not inferior to that required by any great city from its Municipal Governors for protection against fire. We are the greatest maritime nation in the world. We assert our Navy is, or should be, the match for any combination of foreign Navies likely to be brought against us. Our export and import trade amount to the enormous sum of £750,000,000. We lie in the track of the great sea-borne carrying trade of the North of Europe. We are also in the midst of the very best and most profitable fishing ground in the world. Day and night crowds of fishing boats go out to reap the harvest of the sea. How is it, then, that our Navy, Mercantile Marine, and fishing fleets are required to incur risks which might be materially modified by taking advantage of the appliances of modern science? Is the explanation to be found in a sublime confidence in the

Mr. Marjoribanks

"Sweet little cherub that sits up aloft
To keep watch o'er the life of poor Jack"? Or is the fact that nothing is done due to a jealous rivalry between the Admiralty, the War Department, Trinity House, and the Post Office? Or is it the Treasury which is responsible for this sordid economy? Which risks the ship for want of a "ha'porth of tar"? It is worthy of consideration that this country is behind almost every other country in the world in respect of telegraphic and telephonic communication. What is the reason for this backwardness? Is it because the telegraph and telephone systems are a great monopoly? Is it the dead hand of this great Government monopoly that has stifled our system of telephonic communication and has prevented the extension of the system all along the coasts? Nothing could be more useful for the commerce of this country and for defensive purposes than to have around our coasts a series of closely connected stations from which information could be sent from our ships inland or from the land to the sea. We possess many great advantages for carrying into effect the recommendation of the Resolution. We have a splendid system of lights; the coasts are studded with lighthouses, and we have coastguard stations girdling the land, the average distance between them being only about ten miles. We have a splendid lifeboat service, and our lifeboat men, lighthouse and coastguard men, are only too anxious to undertake any duty that may be imposed upon them; and yet for the want of a little organisation, of a little energy in availing ourselves of the discoveries of modern science, which would render all these forces highly serviceable in respect of coast communication, our position is not so good as that of many foreign countries. It is the old story of the bundle of sticks, which, separate, were weak and useless, but, bound together, were strong and unbreakable. It may be urged that our lighthouses and coastguard stations are already connected by a system of signalling. That is true. They have semaphores, rockets, guns and flags. But this system of signalling is often ineffective even under favourable circumstances, and when there are storms or fogs it breaks down entirely. It is, in my opinion, a disgrace to this country that it should still rely on a system of signalling that was no doubt known to Hengist and Horsa when they landed on these shores. I have heard it said that, owing to the strength of currents and other causes, it would be very difficult to connect rock lighthouses with the shore by means of cables, but competent engineers are willing to undertake to surmount the difficulty, and to establish an effectual connection. Another objection which has been raised is that the expense would be very great, but the expenditure of £100,000 per annum for a few years would be sufficient for the complete achievement of the work, and the money would be well spent. The Chancellor of the Exchequer has stated that there is still remaining a surplus of 3d. in the £1 in connection with the telegraph service of the country. The money required might well be supplied from that source, and no opposition would probably be raised to it. It seems to me that the proposals in this Resolution are the very minimum of what is necessary. I hope that the Government, if they do assent to the Resolution, will put no obstacle in the way of its being carried out, so that there may be complete telephonic communication between all the coastguard stations along our coast. I also hope that the matter of electrical connection between lightships and rock lighthouses and the shore will be referred to a Commission of good engineering experts; and I have little doubt the Report of such a Commission would be in terms consonant with our wishes.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, with a view to the better prevention of loss of life and property in cases of vessels in distress or shipwrecked on the Coast of the United Kingdom, and to give the earliest possible information to lifeboat authorities and rocket apparatus stations, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that all coastguard stations on the sea coast and signal stations should be telephonically and telegraphically connected by Government, and that on those parts of the coast where such stations do not exist the post offices nearest to the lifeboat stations be telephonically or telegraphically connected; and that a Royal Commission be appointed to inquire into the desirability of connecting certain light vessels and rock lighthouses by cable with the mainland in order to give information of vessels in distress."—(Sir E. Birkbeck.)

*(458.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. Fergusson, Manchester, N.E.): My hon. Friend the Member for East Norfolk has in his speech once more stated the case, which he has several times before in various ways put before the public, for greater and more speedy means of giving notice to life-saving stations of vessels which may be in dangerous positions on our coasts. No doubt there has been, in some cases, a lamentable want of communication, and disasters have occurred which might otherwise have been prevented or lessened. Although much may be done by the connection of the coastguard stations, it is evident that accidents may occur out of sight of any possible telegraphic station, and that it will be impossible by any legislative or administrative action to do away with the dangers of the sea. But, nevertheless, a desire must be felt by all to give what assistance is possible in order to render more rare the occurrence of accidents which have filled the country with feelings of horror. It is scarcely necessary on this occasion to enter into the ancient history of this question, for the First Lord of the Treasury stated on 29th March, in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for East Norfolk, that the Government sympathised with him in his desire, and hoped that something material would be done towards carrying out the object which he had at heart. The right hon. Member for Berwickshire has stigmatised in somewhat strong language what he considers the backward position of this country in the matter, but if that be so the blame must be shared by all previous Administrations. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman had any desire to reflect on the present Government; but, at the same time, I must tell the House that more has perhaps been done during the last five years to remedy the want than during any previous Administration. A great number of coastguard stations have been connected with the telegraph; and as regards the national defences, from which point of view this question has been noticed, I may say the Admiralty are now satisfied with the amount of communication they possess through these coastguard stations. I take up this question where the First Lord of the Treasury left it, and I think it is desirable that I should inform the House what steps have been taken since the 29th March to give effect to the Resolution of the Government which my right hon. Friend then described. Recognising the necessity of communication on the exposed part of the coast, we have, with some considerable labour, framed an estimate of the cost in respect of connecting telephonically the coastguard stations on the exposed part of the coast from the Isle of Wight to Lynmouth in North Devon. That covers a considerable part of the coast to which attention has been called in late years, and where lamentable wrecks have occurred, and includes the connection of the five outlying islands, the Scilly Islands. Approximate calculations have been made as to the expense of carrying out the work, and the amount is something over £16,000. That estimate of work will be continued all round the coast, and I do not think that the House will be surprised that the engineers of the Post Office have not been able to accomplish more during the present month. But the fact of my addressing the House on the part of the Government will show the House that the matter has got beyond the stage of contemplation, and that we are taking actual steps to carry it into execution. Of course there are coastguard stations that are less important than others. Some occupy very exposed positions where ships are liable to be stranded, and from these it is extremely necessary that speedy communication should be made to the life-saving stations. Hence Her Majesty's Government propose to proceed at once with the erection of wires in such cases. We have already put in hand the surveys of several of these works of the more pressing kind, and some of them will be immediately commenced. I may say that one point—Morthoe—which has been referred to just now on account of a lamentable wreck which occurred there not very long ago, will receive early attention: and that an extension of the telegraph to the neighbouring post office is already being carried out. As I have said, surveys of these works are in progress, and our officers have been in personal communication with the Lifeboat Institution, with a view to select cases, which are of pressing importance. Amongst those which it has already been decided to carry out may be mentioned the following:—From Morthoe to Ilfracombe on one side, and Croyde on the other; from Hartland Quay to Clovelly on the one side, and Bude on the other; from the Lizard to Cadgwick on the one side, and to Mullion and Porthleven on the other; from Swanage to Studland Bay on the one side, and to St. Alban's Head, Bottom and Kimmeridge on the other, combined with an extension of the existing wire between St. Alban's Head and Corfe Castle to Poole, in order that the lifeboat there may be brought within call of the coastguard stations as well as the lifeboats at Swanage and Kimmeridge. The apparatus used in these four cases will be telephones. Then again, a point very much pressed is that of Beachy Head to Eastbourne and Seaford. Extension of an existing A B C circuit between Kingsbridge and Prawle, to Salcombe on the one side and to Rickham and Hall Sands on the other, is also to be mentioned. In harmony with the plan which has been discussed with the National Lifeboat Association, but independently of their views on the subject, it has also been decided to give telegraphic communication to Pennan, a village on an exposed part of the Scotch coast, midway between the lifeboat stations at Fraserburgh and Banff. A number of extensions to outlying parts of the coast are also now being carried out by the Post Office for the Admiralty, and they will doubtless prove useful for the purpose of saving life. These are only the beginnings. Of course we cannot take everything in hand. We have not only to meet the wants much felt, but I hope shortly to extend the system to other points in England and Wales. In addition, arrangements have been made with the London and North-Western Railway Company and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company in order that expeditious communication may be made to stations on those lines of ships in distress. A rough estimate has also been made of the cost of establishing telegraphic communication with all lighthouses and lightships, which will be a proper subject for inquiry. The cost of this part of the scheme will approach the sum of £300,000. My hon. Friend speaks of our being far behind other nations as regards electric communication with lighthouses and life-saving stations, but I do not believe that we are so far behind as is sometimes supposed. In the first place, a great many of our coastguard stations are in telegraphic communication already, and many more are situated so near the telegraph that they may be considered in connection. Of 290 lifeboat stations, 170 are now within one mile of the telegraph, and of 273 coastguard stations, 207 are similarly situated, so that it is very evident a person can in a very short time reach the telegraph station. My hon. Friend the Member for East Norfolk is, I think, in error in stating that the terrible results at a recent wreck might have been modified by coast communication, because the evidence showed that the result was not due to want of telegraphic communication. It is certainly not more than three miles from the bay in which the ship was stranded to Ilfracombe, and in fact the officer of the coastguard ran the distance between the two places in 25 minutes. While I am anxious to say nothing in depreciation of that admirable class of men who man the lifeboats, I think it is only right to say that blame was attached to the men in charge of the lifeboat on that occasion for not launching it in time to rescue the crew, instead of waiting until the tide had got into such a condition that it was impossible to do so. It is true that in the United States there are twelve places, outlying lights, in direct or indirect communication by telegraph, and 27 shore lights, but neither America nor any other nation has connected its lightships with the shore. Denmark has 14 outlying lights in connection with the shore and all its shore lights, but France has none at all—neither outlying lights nor shore lights, nor life-saving stations, though it has signal stations, which are probably for naval or commercial purposes. I think my hon. Friend was in error, for I do not understand him, in saying that the outlying lights of Holland were connected with the telegraph, because my information is to the contrary.

Sir J. Fergusson

SIR E. BIRKBECK: I said they had absolute coast communication throughout the whole coast.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: My information is that neither lightships nor outlying lights are in telegraphic communication. We should not think what other nations have done. We are the greatest maritime nation, and, therefore, there is every intention on the part of the Government to meet this claim that has been made. I say that we do see the necessity of connecting all the important points which may be useful in connection with our life-saving apparatus; and I need not add anything further beyond saying that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to appoint a Commission to inquire into the means and feasibility of connecting outlying lights with the shore, but it is not so easy as the right hon. Gentleman supposes. Her Majesty's Government are happy to assent to the Motion, and I earnestly hope we shall be able to accomplish the object in view—namely, to prevent, as far as our power extends, the recurrence of lamentable cases in which life might have been saved had timely relief been procured.

MR. PENROSE FITZGERALD (Cambridge): Telephonic communication following the line of coast round the United Kingdom is, in the first place, what the Society of which the hon. Member for East Norfolk is the head—the National Lifeboat Society—thinks to be of most gigantic importance. But it is an entirely different subject from the question of connecting lighthouses on rocks or lightships; and as far as I read the proposal of the hon. Member, he desires to leave the second part entirely to the Commission which I understand Her Majesty's Government are about to grant. He does not tell us whether he intends to allow the first part of his Resolution to pass or not. If he does, it will not be necessary for me to say much about it.

SIR E. BIRKBECK: I do.

MR. PENROSE FITZGERALD : It is not alone the question of lifeboats—which, of course, the hon. Member for East Norfolk is most interested in—but it is also a question of which of the two means of saving life shall be used. That is a matter of great importance. From time to time the lifeboat goes afloat, when had there been telephonic communication between the nearest lighthouse or coastguard station it would have been unnecessary for the lifeboat to be launched, because it was known that the wreck, or probable wreck, was one which could only be approached by the rocket apparatus. Another reason is that in having a line of telegraphic or telephonic communication you will be able from your signal station to communicate with your rocket apparatus, which, as the House knows, is on wheels, and worked, not by the lifeboat authorities, but by the coastguard authorities. Owing to the absence of coast road it is often extremely difficult to get the apparatus to the required place, and unless the exact position of the wreck is known it is frequently necessary to make a considerable detour before the scene of the wreck is reached. The Postmaster General has alluded to the commencement which is being made by the Government to temporarily connect some of these stations; but, as a matter of fact, neither the mouth of the Thames nor that of the Mersey are included. Now, I think these are two particular places of which we should like to have information.

SIR J. FERGUSSON : It was only possible in the present month to accomplish the survey and estimate for the part of the coast I have mentioned; but we have resolved also to connect Beachy Head with other places immediately, and also certain places on the coast of Aberdeen.

MR. PENROSE FITZGERALD : The establishment of this communication in such places as the mouths of the Thames and Mersey would be of enormous importance, because there you have already got one class of experiment going on—the whistling buoy and the gas buoy. If the master of a vessel calculates on making one of those buoys and misses it on a foggy day the chances are the vessel goes ashore. At the Nore and other places where there are light vessels they are in sight of many of the standing beacons and buoys of the kind mentioned, and were one of these beacons or buoys out of order the master could telegraph or telephone to the immediate port whence warning could be issued. I am extremely glad that the Government have consented to give us what we have asked for.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.) : I am sure it is with great satisfaction that the House learns the Government accedes to the Resolution proposed by the hon. Member for East Norfolk. We know that from time to time accidents to vessels do happen, and we have the further distressing knowledge that had communication existed valuable lives would have been saved. It is, therefore, gratifying to find that the Government are endeavouring to end loss of life in that particular. I am not myself careful to discuss the question of cost. I believe that the necessity be proved the House of Commons, and the country generally, will be ready to meet that cost. Resolutions have been passed by the Chamber of Shipping of the United Kingdom, and the Association of Chambers of Commerce representing 76 centres of commerce have strenuously affirmed this want, and asked the Government to provide for it. I am pleased with the figures the Postmaster General has given, because it is evident that this most important work will not cost any enormous sum of money. As regards the question of connecting the lighthouses, I am perfectly at one with the Postmaster General that it is not necessary to connect them all, nor the whole of the lightships, but there are certain of them which should be so treated. While bowing to his superior knowledge, I am under the impression that the French lighthouse at Ushant is already in telegraphic connection with the shore. In reference to the question of connecting with the outlying lighthouses, I think it is raising a bogey to say that if we connect them with the shore the enemy in time of war will knock them down. I want to know where our Fleet is to be at that time? Even supposing the enemy could do such a thing, I think the chief injury would be to themselves, and I venture to say that we ought not to sacrifice an actual advantage in time of peace for a problematic disadvantage in time of war. I believe the difficulties will all vanish, and rejoice to think that before long there will be perfect communication. This maritime nation has a right to demand, not only for the sailors who navigate our vessels but also for the passengers who travel by them, such conditions of safety as would be afforded by the carrying out of the proposed Resolution.

*MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I should like also to add my satisfaction at the announcement which has been made by the Government. I conclude that the inquiry to which the Government has assented will embrace the entire subject. The Motion appears to propose different treatment of the two branches of the subject. In the first part it is proposed to request the immediate carrying out of certain work, and that the subsequently appointed Royal Commission shall go further into the matter. I believe the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Loder)—who unfortunately, through circumstances he cannot control, is not able to be present—had an Amendment on the Paper which is to a considerable extent embodied in the amended Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for East Norfolk. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol has referred to what he calls the bogey of a possible danger to this country in time of war if we connect our lightstations and lightships with the shore, and I must own that I was surprised to notice some remarks recently made by the President of the Board of Trade which gave encouragement to a theory which his colleague in the representation of Bristol very aptly describes as a bogey; for it is obvious that if an enemy arrived at the conclusion that it was to its interest and was within its power to injure this country by destroying lighthouses or lightships, it would carry out that policy without regard to the incident of telegraphic or telephonic communication being in existence or otherwise. In a matter of this sort we are bound to have some regard for the public purse, but the figures mentioned show that the amount required even at an extravagant estimate is relatively of so paltry a character that I do not think my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—who, I hope, will shortly be back amongst us in restored health—would give even a passing thought to such a trumpery item in the preparation of his Budget next year. My right hon. Friend the Postmaster General stated that the entire cost at the highest estimate would be £300,000, and that the annual sum required to keep the system in working order would be extremely small.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not think that was stated from this Bench. I believe it came from the right hon. Gentleman opposite.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER: Well, I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say £300,000, and in fact he first said £300,000 per annum, but corrected himself to stating that it would be a capital sum of that amount, and I trust the Chancellor of the Exchequer will next year make his Budget in accordance with the suggestion. As to the practical effect of an arrangement of this kind, it must be well known to the House that while in certain instances loss of life would occur under any conditions, still there are cases in which life and property would in all human probability be saved if a better system of communication were established. I feel sure there will be a feeling of great satisfaction at the Government having willingly consented to take so strong a step in this direction, not only by, as I understand, proceeding with the inquiry with all possible dispatch, but also by taking the important step referred to by the right hon. Gentleman without waiting for the inquiry.

(5.35.) LORD H. BRUCE (Wilts, Chippenham): Although I have never minimised the value of our lighthouses, I think there are other provisions that should be made for the safety of sailors of perhaps equal importance. For want of harbours of refuge, for instance, many poor fellows have been drowned. More than 700 men and boys die yearly within sight of our shores, and yet the Royal Commission on Harbours of Refuge of 1858 and 1859 has been ignored. As to the lighthouses on our coast, I would point out to the House that there is no lighthouse from Beachey Head to the Isle of Wight, a distance of 57 miles. There is a lightship, but that light is only visible ten miles, and, therefore, if you pass the Isle of Wight ten miles off you do not see it. On the French coast there is a lighthouse nearly every 20 miles, and I want to know if they can do that why we cannot do the same in England? Now, Sir, I will just refer to the harbour of refuge called Dover Harbour, and which, I maintain, is no good to our sailors in a gale of wind. The entrance will be only 300 feet wide, although 600 odd acres are to be enclosed. How on earth can a sailing ship get in there during a gale of wind, with a tremendous current running at the rate of three miles an hour? If the harbour had been constructed at Dungeness some good might have been done, and at less cost. But, Sir, with regard to these harbours of refuge generally, there was a Royal Commission appointed—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I do not want to interrupt the noble Lord, but harbours of refuge are outside the scope of the present Motion.

LORD H. BRUCE: Well, Sir, all I can say is this, that although we have some powerful lighthouses, our coast is very deficient in that respect, and I hope the Resolution before the House will be passed, and that everything possible will be done to save life at sea. So far that has not been done, inasmuch as the proposals of the Royal Commission of 1858 and 1859 have not been carried out.

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PLACES OF WORSHIP (SITES) BILL. (No. 135.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): The Bill of which I now beg to move the Second Reading was originally brought forward by my hon. Friend the Member for West Nottingham (Mr. Broadhurst) in the years 1884 and 1885. When he became a Member of Her Majesty's Government in 1886, he asked me to take charge of it, and I did so. During that year it was read a second time without a division, and in the year 1887 a division took place upon it, when it was lost by a comparatively small majority. The Bill consists of eleven clauses and one schedule, but as will be seen by any one who looks at it, the gist of its provisions lies in some five or six clauses—from the fourth down to the eighth or ninth. The Bill contains a clause for the acquisition of sites for places of religious worship otherwise than by consent. That is compulsory acquisition of land for this purpose. By Clause 5 a requisition in writing must be served containing certain particulars, and on the receipt of that requisition, after a certain time has elapsed, a memorial is to be presented to the Council which is the authority in the place—either the County Council or the Town Council, as the case may be. And by Clause 7 the Council to which the memorial is presented shall appoint a time for the hearing of it, and certain consequences ensue. If the order be made, within six months of that time the site is to be conveyed. Provision is made for the payment of a sum to show the bona fides of the applicants, and that has to be placed in the hands of the Council. The last two or three clauses are more or less formal, and deal with matters of title. The Schedule contains the form of requisition, which must be signed by a number of persons of whose status and bona fides there can be no question. The Bill is comparatively brief, and as it has been more than once a matter of discussion here before, it is not necessary for me to dwell long upon it. I venture to think it contains all the provisions and safeguards which are necessary to provide against any wrong being done to a single individual. Of course, Mr. Speaker, it will be perfectly possible when the Bill gets into Committee to amend any particular provisions. But the principle now before the House is a very simple one, and the question I ask the House to determine on this Motion for the Second Reading is whether members of a religious denomination other than the Church of England, as by law established, shall have the same power of compulsorily obtaining land for places of worship as that particular Body has. I hope I may appeal to every hon. Member in this House, whichever side he sits on, in a matter of this kind. As I view it, it is a matter of simple justice that every religious denomination should have the same power in this matter as the one particular denomination to which I have alluded. I notice that the hon. Member for Wigan has, since the introduction of this Bill, introduced a Bill taking away from the Church of England the power they now have of compulsorily acquiring land. When that was introduced in another place three or four years ago it did not meet with much respect. And I think it is much better to impartially extend this power to all other denominations than to take it away from the particular Church which now enjoys it. The principle underlying this Bill is contained in the word of which we have heard so much at various times during the discussion of another Bill—namely, compulsion. I believe the mere fact that there is compulsion in an Act of Parliament will be its own remedy. I remember very well, many years ago, going to the then agent of a great nobleman in the Midland Counties, who was almost the sole owner of all the eligible plots of land in a country village, for the purpose of acquiring a site for the School Board of which I was then chairman. He listened to my request, and after I had pointed out the particular site I wanted, he intimated that the nobleman in question would not be able to consent to any such use of the land. His view of the School Board was that it was not needed, and therefore he opposed it. Well, I listened to all he had to say, and then I pointed out to him the powers of compulsion in the Act of 1870. This settled the matter, and we got the piece of land, and that is what I think would happen if we had such an Act of Parliament as this. I hope I do not take too sanguine a view when I express the hope that Her Majesty's Government will see their way not to oppose this Bill. I believe that during my absence on a particular Wednesday the First Lord of the Treasury alluded to this Bill, and said that it might well go to a Committee. If he said so I gather that he really does not oppose the principle of the Bill, and that he would be prepared to send it to a Committee, with the view to its details being discussed and possibly amended. The object of this Bill, Mr. Speaker, is to afford persons, otherwise unable, the opportunity of securing for themselves an eligible place in which to worship in the way their conscience approves. I am not going into particular incidents that I could give of people being unable to obtain suitable sites for places of worship up and down the country. I do not wish to do anything on the present occasion to arouse any feelings or create any hostility against this person or the other. I rest my case on the broad ground of justice, that what is right for the Church of England to possess—in this case the power of compulsorily acquiring land—is right for every other religious denomination in the country to have. I do not think I need add any more to the brief explanation of the Bill I have given, and I will therefore move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Lord H. Bruce

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. John Ellis.)

*(5.50.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I have read this Bill through, and I must say that it seems to me of great importance to know what the Body is which is to carry out its provisions. The Bill is supposed to be founded upon two Acts, one passed in 1873 and the other in 1882. Now, if any hon. Member refers to the Act of 1873 he will find that there is nothing at all compulsory in its character. Its object was simply to empower landlords having limited interests to convey land as sites for places of worship. As to the amending Act of 1882, that was passed simply for the purpose of removing doubt as to whether conveyances could be made by Corporations and other Public Bodies. What I desire is that the body which is to have the compulsory power should be defined. But I do not oppose the Second Reading of the Bill on this account. I have always, I trust, dealt with questions of this kind in anything but a narrow spirit, and if I were convinced that any real difficulty was now experienced in obtaining proper sites for places of worship, I certainly should not oppose this Bill in any way. We have had charges made over and over again—we see them in the papers sometimes—against illiberal landlords, and we hear of the impossibility of acquiring sites for Nonconformist places of worship, but I have always found these charges are vague, and that when they come to be examined they fall to the ground. The hon. Member instead of saying he would not give the cases of difficulty in obtaining sites should have taken care to have done so. If it be necessary to force people to part with their land, well and good, but it must be under some rational and defined system. I do not know what the Council referred to in the Bill for carrying out its purposes is to be. It may be of a character that would not recommend itself to many Members of this House.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: It says either the County Council or the Town Council.

MR. KELLY: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I have looked through the Bill and I am afraid I missed the clause altogether. However, I do not know why this power should be given to such a body. If, as the hon. Member supposes, the County Councils in the different counties would be inclined to give any site which Nonconformists may claim, then I venture to ask the House to consider whether a measure of this character should be agreed to unless some very good reason is shown for it. The hon. Member did not show any reason, but, on the other hand, he carefully avoided doing so. I believe myself that this Bill is out of date altogether. There may have been, and possibly was, a time when certain landlords did place unfair difficulties in the way of Nonconformists when they wished to obtain sites for their places of worship. I question very much, however, whether such people exist now. As far as my knowledge goes, I can safely say I have never heard of any well-founded complaints on the part of Nonconformists that they were unable to acquire sites with the same ease as members of the Church of England. I ask the House to reject the Bill because it is utterly unnecessary, and also because it casts an unfair slur upon the landowners of England. I beg, therefore, to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

*(5.58.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I wish to second the Motion of the hon. Member who has just sat down. So far as I am aware this Bill is entirely without precedent. There have been enactments passed from time to time enabling a Local Authority, or a public company, to acquire land or property belonging to others when the object has been to benefit the entire community or a whole neighbourhood. The Bill now before the House, however, is to give power to acquire the property of another person for the benefit of, not the entire community, but a certain sect of individuals. I hope the House will pause before granting anything of the kind. As regards the necessity of the Bill, I am not aware that members of the various religious bodies have any difficulty in acquiring sites for places of worship. The number of such buildings proves that there can have been no difficulty in acquiring sites. I assert that there is no necessity for this Bill; but even if there were, you are going beyond the principles already established. I think there is no more melancholy sight in the country districts than the places of worship which have fallen into disrepair, when the necessity or demand for them has ceased. I see no provision for such a misfortune in this Bill, and I consider it is a misfortune that any landowner, large or small, should have his property disfigured by dilapidated buildings of this kind. The Act of 1873 provides for such cases; and I think, when an entirely novel proposal of this kind is made, there should be at least the same facilities to meet this contingency as have been given in former measures. Some Members of the House are disposed to make sport of the fact that there are a very large number of different denominations; but I am not one of those. I regret that religion should cause men to separate into so many bodies, and believe it would be highly advantageous to the cause of religion if the number of denominations were smaller. But I think it will be admitted that all denominations are not entitled to the same consideration. I presume the Mormons would claim to be considered a religious body; but it would be a strong measure for any hon. Member to bring in a Bill to enable members of the Mormon denomination to acquire sites compulsorily, and to establish themselves on a firm footing to disseminate their most pernicious doctrines. The County Council is to determine whether there is any just demand, and to have regard to all the circumstances of the case. Surely that is a large and comprehensive demand. They have to settle whether or not a site is required by a denomination, and I believe no County Council can fairly judge a question of that kind. The promoters themselves may know whether it is required or not, or they may be ambitious beyond the requirements of the neighbourhood; but it is impossible that a County Council can act with any certainty in a matter of this kind. Nothing is more uncertain than the success of a new place of worship. Sometimes a place which is started under the most favourable auspices goes to decay, and in another case you find that out of a small beginning a magnificent structure will spring up. A further question is whether any undue injury will be caused to the property which is to be acquired, and this is a problem which is most difficult of solution. What injury is due and what is undue is a question which is not easily decided; and I think, in asking a County Council to decide questions of this kind, you would be putting upon that body a power with which it was never contemplated that they should be entrusted. They have not the judicial power of summoning witnesses and putting them on oath. These are some of the difficulties which have occurred to me in considering this measure; but I regret that I have laid them before the House in a somewhat imperfect manner, as I was taken by surprise that this Bill should have been reached so soon. My great objection to this Bill is the introduction of the principle of compulsory purchase, not for the benefit of the entire community, but for one section of the community only. This is, I believe, an entirely new principle. I regard it as a mischievous principle, and I hope the House will not sanction it by agreeing to the Second Reading of this Bill.

Mr. Kelly

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Kelly.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(6.9.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have listened to the observations with which the hon. Gentleman who proposed this Bill introduced it to the notice of the House. I admit that he gave a very clear though very brief explanation of the measure; but what he failed to do was to lay any facts before the House indicating the necessity for passing such a Bill at all.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: That has already been done in this Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware whether that is so or not; but the fact that a Bill has been debated on a previous occasion does not absolve us, when a measure is brought forward, from explaining and justifying the proposals that we make to the House. So far as I am concerned, if a necessity were shown for compulsory powers under proper safeguards for the purpose of acquiring sites for religious denominations who are otherwise unable to obtain them, I should not offer any opposition to a proposal of that sort. The proposals really are two. One is that a large number of religious bodies desire to obtain land for the purpose of erecting buildings in which they can conduct services agreeable to their own consciences, and the hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Ellis) also proposes that where they are unable to obtain these sites they should have compulsory powers given to them. If it were shown that religious bodies desired to obtain such sites and could not obtain them, and that such a desire existed on a large scale, I should be glad to see any well-considered proposal for relieving them of that disability. But the hon. Member, I think, must be aware, and would agree with us, that compulsion ought not to be gratuitously introduced into any Bill unless the necessity for that compulsion existed; and if it were introduced it should be provided for in such a manner that the rights of any individual concerned, especially of those individuals from whom land is compulsorily obtained, shall be amply safeguarded. The hon. Gentleman appears to me to have satisfied neither of those two conditions. He has not given us any indication that any pressing necessity exists, and he certainly has not shown either that the rights of individuals are safeguarded, or that the machinery by which he proposes to carry out the objects of the Bill is really the kind of machinery to the institution of which the House of Commons ought to consent. For what is the machinery proposed? The machinery is not a judicial body which shall inquire the fair price of land and give a decision on the subject. It is not a jury or a properly constituted Court, before which evidence could be taken on oath, and bound to look at the matters which come before it from a judicial point of view. But, as far as I understand the machinery which the hon. Member proposes, it consists of the County Council of the county in which the site is desired; and, with all respect to the hon. Member, a body less fitted to carry out judicial functions it would be hard to conceive. By hypothesis, however, this Bill is only required where the landowner refuses to sell land for the site of a place of worship either from religious prejudice or other causes connected with unfortunate religious differences which prevail in parts of the country, and where the Nonconformist Body could not obtain the site they desired to obtain. If, therefore, the matter is one of acute controversy in the district, how can you go to the County Council elected by the ratepayers and expect a judicial decision? The County Council might have a strong religious bias adverse to the particular sect which desires and ought to have the site. That is possible; it is, perhaps, even in some cases probable, and in that case how can the County Council, elected on Party lines, animated possibly by Party feeling, possibly influenced by strong religious prejudice, calmly and impartially decide a question as to whether a site is required, and a question as to what are the rights of the parties in the matter? The County Council in some cases might defeat the object which the hon. Member has in view. We can suppose a County Council animated by the exactly opposite view, by strong antagonism to the landlord who has refused a site, who would use the enormous powers given by this Bill, not merely for the purpose of supplying the want which exists, but for the purpose of annoying some particular owner of property. Moreover, the hon. Gentleman has suggested that a County Council, a body consisting of 70 or 100 members, shall sit and take evidence on oath, and look into all the details connected with the purchase of some site, and the religious necessities of some denomination. Is it possible that you can turn a body of 50 or 100 gentlemen into a tribunal for taking evidence on oath, and deciding matters of this kind? The hon. Member (Mr. John Ellis) will, therefore, I think, see that the machinery he has devised cannot possibly carry out his objects, or even be so altered in Committee as to be made to carry them out. The machinery he proposes is fundamentally bad, and for that reason I think he will feel that the Bill in its present shape cannot possibly receive the assent of the House. I will go a step further. As I said in my opening sentences, this House, before it gives compulsory powers for the acquisition of property, has always hitherto taken the most ample safeguards for protecting the rights of the individuals from whom property is thus compulsorily taken. What safeguard does the hon. Gentleman lay down? From such study, which I must admit has been rather hasty, as I have been able to give to this Bill, I can find not a single word about price or value, or ascertaining the price or ascertaining the value, or of compensation to the owner of the property from the first clause of the Bill to the last—from its first line to the end of the Schedule. I presume, though the hon. Gentleman has not touched upon that subject in his Bill, that the County Council of 50, 100, or 150 gentlemen who are to take evidence on oath and hear all the case for the applicants and the owner of property are to decide by a Party vote, or by a vote which may be a Party vote, as to how much money is to be given for the land thus compulsorily taken from the property owner. I think he will see that to charge a County Council with the determining of the amount of money or compensation to be given in such cases is to give them a power which they are totally unfit to exercise, and which may lead to the gravest abuses and the gravest unfairness.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to ask him whether the County Councils have not quasi-judicial powers?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Member will be extremely puzzled to find any case in which a County Council, acting as a body, have judicial power at all, and certainly not judicial power of the kind that is given to them in this case. I will guarantee that the hon. Gentleman will not find a precedent for such an extraordinary and abnormal power given to any public body as that of settling whether land shall be bought compulsorily, and then deciding what price is to be given for that land. I do not believe that this Bill, as it stands, would work at all. I am sure it would work badly, but I think it would not work at all. Under the existing process County Councils cannot administer an oath; and I apprehend that the words in the 7th section of this Bill which says that they may take such evidence in such manner as they think fit, upon oath or otherwise—I apprehend that those words casually introduced would not place County Councils in the entirely novel position of being able in their corporate capacity to administer an oath to a witness. Therefore it appears to me that this Bill errs in almost every respect in which a Bill of this kind can err. The necessity for it has not been proved. The particular machinery by which it is proposed to carry it out is unworkable machinery; and even if it were a machinery that could be worked, there is no protection that it would be worked with justice or equity to the owners of the land taken. There is every reason for believing that it would be used either against the Nonconformists or against the owners of property according to the prejudices, passions, or political or religious views of the County Council, or according to the views which might sway or incline the majority of the members of that body. If, however, the hon. Gentleman thinks that a case can be made out for a compulsory Bill, I hardly think he will endeavour to carry this compulsory Bill, and I shall be prepared to have the matter investigated by a Committee of this House, and to put before that Committee both the proposal of the hon. Gentleman and a Bill introduced, I think, by some Gentleman on this side of the House, for depriving the Church of England of the power in this respect which it at present possesses, but which it has not so far found necessary to exercise. The question is one which deserves consideration, but it cannot possibly be settled by the Bill which is now before the House. I am quite prepared to admit that if a case can be made out, if it can be shown that the Nonconformist Body as a whole desire sites and cannot obtain them; that they are deprived of the power of carrying out their own religious worship in their own way by the difficulty of obtaining land on which to erect places of worship—if that can be shown, and if some method can be contrived of carrying out that object with equity both to the Nonconformists and to the owners of property, I should be very glad to accept it. But I think that this Bill in its present shape cannot be passed, and I would suggest to the hon. Member that he should give his adhesion to the proposal I have made.

(6.22.) MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): The hon. Member for Wigan has described this as a novel proposal, but I would remind the hon. Gentleman that 22 years ago, before he came into the House, I brought forward a Bill on all-fours, as far as principle is concerned, with this Bill, and that was read a second time without opposition. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Balfour), in all fairness, I admit, objected to this Bill on two grounds—first, that no case had been made out for compulsion, by which I suppose he meant that no case was quoted in which landlords had been asked to sell land for the purpose of erecting places of worship, but had refused.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No actual case has been quoted.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: That may be so. The second objection was to the machinery. I will try to deal with these objections. I confess this Bill has come upon me by surprise. I had not the least idea that it would be reached so early, and I am sorry that there is not a single Member from Wales present beside myself, or they could have given the right hon. Gentleman cases, especially from Wales, where the land belongs in the main to two or three great landowners, in which land had been required for sites for chapels, and had been refused by the landlords. I am not prepared now to quote cases, but they have been mentioned to this House, and cases could be quoted to this House which would abundantly prove the necessity for some Bill of this kind. The second objection was to the machinery. The only other machinery which could possibly be provided for carrying out such a measure as this is the Lands Clauses Act; but that is a matter of the greatest possible expense, and thoroughly unfitted for a purpose of this kind. In the Bill I brought forward 22 years ago I did avail myself of the machinery of the Lands Clauses Act; but it was pointed out in the debate that that machinery was wholly unsuitable in small cases where economy was desirable. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman has formed such a low opinion of the County Councils, which, after all, are the creation of his own Government.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As judicial authorities.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: He seems to doubt whether it would be possible for a County Council elected by popular representation to deal fairly between the landowners and the ratepayers. I entertain a better opinion of the County Councils than the right hon. Gentleman. The rest of his objections were really purely matters of detail. The right hon. Gentleman cannot have carefully read Clause 7, which distinctly gives the power, by implication at all events, to take evidence upon oath or otherwise. But if there is any doubt as to those words being sufficient, I am certain that my hon. Friend who has charge of this Bill would not for a moment hesitate to introduce words which would make the clause properly effective. Then, with respect to a further objection, it seems to me to be quite impossible that you can have words more carefully guarding the rights and interests of landowners; but if you want more words by all means let them be inserted. But these questions are, after all, purely questions of detail, and therefore questions which ought not to be raised on the Second Reading of a Bill, but should be raised in Committee. The hon. Member for Wigan talked about the danger of the Mormons coming to England and the scandal which would be caused if a section of the Mormons were to insist on a compulsory site. That is an argument which has done duty over and over again, and I think was last heard from the lips of the hon. Member himself in the Debate on the Burials Bill. Surely it is merely trifling with a subject like this. I know that the matter is one about which there is a deep feeling in my own constituency and in my own Principality, and, after all, you must bear in mind that the Bill is founded upon a demand for equality. We are merely asking for the Nonconformist denominations the right which the Church of England, whether it chose to exercise it or not, has under an Act more than 60 years old. It seems to me that to grant a thing to the Church of England and to withhold it from the Nonconformists is, to say the least, invidious. If the whole matter is to be inquired into, I trust my hon. Friend will agree to the suggestion of the First Lord of the Treasury; but I would suggest that the Second Reading be pushed to a Division, if only for the purpose of showing that the House of Commons of 1892 is not less liberal than the House of Commons of 1870.

*(6.30.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I cannot allow the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury with respect to the machinery of the Bill to pass unchallenged. His objections do not go to the root of the Bill, but apply solely to the machinery by which my hon. Friend proposes to carry out the principle. As to the judicial functions of the County Council, the right hon. Gentleman was himself a Member of the Government which endowed all County Councils with judicial functions, and they are now called upon to decide judicially in cases of licensing, and, more than that, the London County Council has decided judicially between Local Bodies and individual citizens. I sat upon a committee of that Council to decide between the Vestry of Paddington and an individual ratepayer, who thought the Vestry was wrong in asking him to make some sanitary improvements in his property. The Committee decided against the ratepayer, who was consequently put to some expense. All these judicial or quasi-judicial powers are now in daily exercise by County Councils. The hon. Gentleman says no evidence has been brought forward to justify the demand. The case has not, perhaps, been prepared with very great care, but evidence was given before the Town Holdings Committee and in the Debates on the Enfranchisement of Places of Worship Bill.

MR. KELLY: The hon. Member for Denbighshire referred to some evidence in that Debate, and I challenged him to give a name, but he did not do so.

*MR. LAWSON: There was evidence by Welsh witnesses that they could not get sites, and some of the witnesses from rural districts and Wales went so far as to give reasons for a Bill of this character, although outside the scope of the Committee's inquiry. My hon. Friend asks for nothing more than to bring the whole case and law into a logical form. Under the Act of 1818 Commissioners acting for the Church of England can obtain land for a new site or for the enlargement of a church compulsorily; and my hon. Friend asks that the same power may be given to other religious bodies, and that they may be placed on a footing of equality. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Wigan (Mr. F. S. Powell) proposes to repeal the powers in the case of the Church of England, not because that Church is unworthy to possess them, but because other bodies think they should receive equality of treatment. I think the First Lord of the Treasury would be acting more fairly if he allowed the Second Reading to pass, and then referred the Bill to a Select Committee, and I do not see why the Bill of the hon. Member for Wigan should not go to the same Committee.

(6.35.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I rise to ask whether the First Lord of the Treasury proposes to read these two Bills a second time and send them both to a Select Committee, or whether he intends to oppose both Bills and refer the question to a Select Committee? If the former is the position he takes up, it would be satisfactory to many Members on this side; but I do not see that there would be much gain in adopting the other course.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman has asked which of two possible courses I recommend the House to adopt. It is, perhaps, my fault that I did not make myself sufficiently clear. I do not believe this is a possible Bill, but I have no objection to the principle if the necessity for it can be shown before a Select Committee. Under these circumstances, I see no reason to object to the Second Reading, it being distinctly understood that we take that view, and that the whole question be threshed out before a Select Committee.

(6.38.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I hope it is understood that the whole question is open; that the whole question is to go before the Select Committee. I do not think that hon. Members quite realise that the Act of 1818 has only been acted upon once, and one of the grounds urged for repealing it is that there is now no religious feeling in this country which will prevent the acquisition of sites without compulsory powers. The theory of hon. Members opposite is that the whole country is divided up amongst large landowners; but even if that be so, there may be small occupiers who may be affected by this Bill, and I do not see any provision for compensating them as distinct from the owner. The right hon. Member for East Denbighshire (Mr. Osborne Morgan) contended that the procedure under the Lands Clauses Act would not be applicable, as it was so expensive. I would ask him to consider the nature of the inquiry to be held by the County Council as proposed here, and he will find that that would not be inexpensive. I should like to know what the position of a small owner would be. It might be that the animosity of two local religious bodies might go so far that one might feel pleasure in bringing the property of a member of the other body before the County Council. There is also nothing in the Bill which requires those persons who acquire sites to use them for religious purposes; it might be used for the erection of houses or anything else. I think it would be a distinct advantage to get these matters investigated before a Select Committee.

(6.42.) S^R W. HARCOURT (Derby): After what the First Lord of the Treasury has said, there seems to be little occasion for further discussion. But I confess it does seem to me an odd sort of arrangement to refer to the same Committee another Bill which proposes to take away from another denomination the power this Bill proposes to give to Nonconformists. It brings back to my recollection an incident of some years ago when a similar Bill was before the House, when I ventured to point out that the Church of England possessed this power. That was violently denied by the whole of the clergy of the Church of England. I was denounced with bell, book, and candle by a right rev. Prelate, who said I had invented a Statute for the purpose of attacking the Church of England. I ventured to refer him to the Statute Book, but I do not think he had the grace to apologise. The Church seems to have become aware of this power, and wants to get rid of it. But the Church of England is not in the same difficulty in getting sites from landowners as are the Nonconformist Bodies, and it is ridiculous to say that one rule should apply to both—in Wales, for instance. To say there is no grievance is contrary to my experience and the testimony I have heard. I have often heard the question discussed; and though the right hon. Gentleman does not seem to be aware of the instances which have occurred, I have seen them over and over again. If the question goes before a Committee I hope it will end by giving all denominations power to acquire compulsorily sites for their places of religious worship, and that it will not be urged that the Church of England will give up its power if you will continue the disability of the Nonconformists. I hope the Bill will go to a Committee with the view not of narrowing its limits, but rather of enlarging them.
Mr. A. J. Balfour

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I presume my Bill will be referred to the same Committee.

MR. SPEAKER: Not now.

Bill committed to a Select Committee.

DIVORCE BILL—(No. 123.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(6.45.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I beg leave to move the Second Reading of this Bill. Since 1858 there has been no legislation in this House on the subject of divorce in England and Scotland; and though I agree that frequent legislation on the subject would be highly objectionable, I think after so long a period it is not unreasonable that the opinion of the House should be taken upon this somewhat narrow but important point. The Bill provides for the assimilation of the English and Scotch law on two points. The law in Scotland has been unchanged since the Reformation. It may be said that the law of Scotland is not absolutely defensible on logical grounds, because it provides the relief of divorce in certain cases and not in others where equally strong reasons might be urged, but it is a settlement which has stood the test of 300 years. I think it is desirable on the question of divorce the law of two peoples, who frequently intermarry, should, if possible, be the same. By the law of Scotland, desertion, in the strict legal sense, for four years is a ground for divorce, whether the husband or wife be deserted. The other provision of the Bill deals with the question of immorality. The matter was argued at great length on the passing of the Divorce Act, and it was decided finally that the husband should get a divorce for adultery only on the part of the wife, but that the wife should only get a judicial separation for adultery only on the part of the husband. The Scotch law puts both sexes on an equality in this matter. In 1857 the hon. Member for Midlothian, who opposed the Divorce Bill, defended the principle of absolute equality for both sexes on this point. The Bill will no doubt be attacked by those who object to all divorce, but they are a small body; and as the principle has been adopted by the English law, it ought to be applied with fairness and equality between the two sexes, and that equality is desirable in the highest interests of morality. And it will be attacked with more force, perhaps, by those who say you cannot stop at those two points. No doubt, if we were discussing the question de novo, there are other grounds, such as habitual drunkenness, imprisonment for a long period for serious offence, and insanity, on which it might be urged divorce should be granted. The ground for my particular proposal is that it has stood the test of 300 years, and no expansion of the law has apparently been desired. The House is in possession of two interesting Returns, one obtained by the right hon. Member for Midlothian showing the precise number of divorces in England since the Act of 1857, and the other obtained by myself, giving the corresponding figures for Scotland. The Returns show that, although the Scotch law is so much wider than the English law, the percentage of divorces to population in both countries was almost absolutely identical. We may, therefore, draw the conclusion that the Scotch law is not only sound in principle and just as between the sexes, but that in practice it does not lead to a great multiplicity of divorces. In justice to those who suffer under the inequalities of the English law, it is only just that relief should be provided, at least, so far as the Scotch law goes. I will not occupy the time of the House in giving the numerous cases of hardship which have been brought to my notice, but will simply move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hunter.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*(6.55.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I listened with interest to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend, and I confess I am not surprised that he has not been able to suggest to the House any other reasons for a relaxation—if I may use the term—of the conditions under which divorce is to be obtained in this country. He has told us that the Scotch law differs from the English law in this respect. I cannot speak from experience of the Scotch law, but I am extremely doubtful whether or not there are any large number of divorces for the causes which come under this Bill. I have had some little experience in the Divorce Court in this country, and from that and from the information brought to my notice since I have been in office, whatever may be the opinion with regard to the work of the Divorce Court, I should hesitate, and I respectfully and strongly advise the House to be very slow, to render more easy the means of getting dissolution of marriage. My distinct belief is—and I say it with extreme regret—that the number of collusive divorces which come before the Court, and which do not reach the Queen's Proctor, is very large. The information on this point coming before me as Attorney General has surprised and shocked me. Now, there are three changes proposed in the Bill. The first is, that the wife should be able to obtain dissolution of marriage, as distinct from judicial separation, on the ground of the husband's adultery alone; the second, that she should be able to obtain a divorce for four years' desertion; and the third, that the husband should be able to obtain a divorce for a similar desertion by the wife. My hon. and learned Friend proposes that four years' desertion without reasonable excuse should entitle the wife to dissolution of marriage. Let us consider, from the point of view I have put to the House, what the objection to that would be. We know very well that under the circumstances of many cases desertion is a very great hardship, and is most cruel; and in cases where the husband has himself been guilty of adultery, it is a ground for divorce. But my hon. and learned Friend proposes that simple desertion for four years should be sufficient. I wish he could have given us a little more information on there have been under the Scotch law during the last ten years. That is information that would have been valuable—mere general observations do not carry the case any further. But we must look at this matter from a practical point of view. Take the case, which I would remind the House in my opinion occurs very frequently, of persons being only too willing to separate from one another, and to break the marriage tie if they can do so without any unnecessary stain on their character; or the case of a husband whose business constantly takes him away; or cases might arise in which what after all is only separation by consent might be turned into desertion without reasonable excuse. I cannot imagine any test less likely to limit the operations of the Divorce Court than that such a short period of desertion, and that the circumstances of desertion only should be sufficient to obtain a dissolution of the marriage. In some cases it has been said that judicial separation is scarcely an advantage; but, on the other hand, a large number of persons agree to live separately by separation deed rather than go into the Divorce Court at all. What I have said with regard to a petition for dissolution of marriage against a husband on the ground of desertion obviously applies with very considerable force—I may almost say with increased force—in the case of so-called desertion by a wife. Incompatibility of temper and living away from one another would, in many cases, be turned into desertion by a wife; and I doubt whether desertion would apply in the case of a wife in the same way as it applies in the case of a husband. With regard to the other ground which is to be sufficient to justify the Court in decreeing a dissolution of marriage, I confess, apart from the proceedings in the Divorce Court, and apart from what may be called the legal proceedings of divorce, I sympathise, to a great extent, with the argument of my hon. and learned Friend. Everyone, I imagine, can conceive persons, can conceive persons holding the view that the punishment, if it is to be called punishment, in the case of the husband's adultery ought to be as great as in the case of the wife's adultery; but, unwilling as I am to use an argument in this House or outside this House to lower the standard of morality in one case or the other, I think it is not possible, as experience in the Divorce Court shows, to treat or argue the case on what may be called purely moral or philosophic grounds. We must look at the matter practically, and I have not the slightest doubt that immorality on the part of the husband is not regarded as so serious an offence as immorality on the part of the wife. There are reasons why, from a practical point of view, I think it is not an unfair thing to say, human nature being what it is, that the wife cannot ordinarily be subjected, and is not ordinarily subjected, to the same temptation as the husband is, if there is any liability to failure in the case of one or the other; and when dealing with this question, and considering the grounds upon which persons are justified in obtaining a dissolution of the marriage contract, we cannot shut our eyes to the views taken by high-minded people from a practical standpoint. But, as I have said, regarding the matter from an abstract point of view of right and wrong, or on moral or religious grounds, I admit there is a great deal to be said for the view that the punishment of the offence should be as great in the one case as in the other. I am not sure that it would be desirable in the interests of the wife that the Court should be bound to dissolve the marriage on the ground of the husband's adultery alone. Of course, my hon. and learned Friend may meet that by saying that there should be a discretion given to the Court; but I think there would be a great objection to give that discretion to the Court, having regard to the protection which is afforded to the wife by a judicial separation, by increase of alimony, and by the custody of the children. The opinion I have formed—and I have given some thought to the question and I give my opinion with great deference to the opinion of others—is, that it would be undesirable that there should be an alteration of the law in the manner indicated by my hon. and learned Friend who moved the Second Reading of this Bill. He will, of course, appreciate the distinction I make. I have already said that I have not any objection to it from what I may call the moral view of the case; but I consider that an alteration of the law, even in that respect, is undesirable, and that, being undesirable, we ought not to relax the conditions under which the dissolution of marriage can be granted, unless a very strong case can be made out. I trust that hon. Members who have experience of the working of the Divorce Court will follow me in this Debate, if it is thought necessary to continue it; but knowing, on previous occasions, that the question was going to be raised, I took steps to inquire from those whose opinion I value, and from those whose opinion I am sure the House would consider entitled to very great weight, as to what would be the practical working of a change in the law in this direction; and certainly the great majority of those who have experience of the working of the Divorce Court to whom I have spoken have concurred in my opinion that a relaxation of the law in this respect would be undesirable. I cannot part from this branch of the subject without again referring to the question of collusion. It has been impressed forcibly upon my mind repeatedly during the last five or six years. I want my hon. and learned Friend to consider how the question of collusion bears upon this question of the relaxation of the conditions under which dissolution of marriage can be granted on the ground of the husband's adultery alone. Parties very often have no objection to be charged with adultery when they want to be divorced. It is not an uncommon thing for a wife to allege cruelty in order to turn judicial separation into a decree for the dissolution of marriage. The husband not unnaturally is unwilling to admit that he is guilty of cruelty. Therefore we have one safeguard, though it is a slight one, against collusive divorce, because if the husband has been guilty of adultery, and not guilty of cruelty, only a judicial separation, and not divorce, can be obtained. If the alteration of the law proposed by my hon. Friend were carried into effect then a divorce could be obtained on proof of the husband's adultery alone; and I am satisfied that, in the case especially of both parties wishing to get rid of one another, the door to collusive divorce would be much more freely opened, and we should hear more of it. Speaking with some little experience of the Divorce Court—though I give my opinion with all deference—I think it is undesirable, speaking of the procedure of the Divorce Court, to relax the conditions on which dissolution of marriage can be obtained, and to make the facilities for obtaining the dissolution of the marriage contract more easy. From the point of view of morality, from the point of view of perjury, and from the objection I take from my experience of the working of the Divorce Court, I think this relaxation would not be a wise step. The only argument, if I may venture to call it an argument, that my hon. and learned Friend used is based upon Scotland—a country for which I have the greatest respect; and for the laws of Scotland I have the greatest admiration. But I feel that it is not by calling attention to a law which has existed in Scotland for 300 years, and was, therefore, well known at the time that the English Divorce Act was passed, and was no doubt taken into consideration—it is not by calling attention to that, but by showing, if it can be shown, that within a reasonable period divorce or dissolution of marriage for lesser offences has prevailed largely in Scotland, that some ground would have been shown for the Second Reading of this Bill. But it appears to me that the House should not agree to the Second Reading of this Bill, and that at the present moment it is not desirable that the law should be altered in the manner proposed.

*(7.17.) SIR J. MCKENNA (Monaghan, S.): I rise for the purpose of moving the Amendment which stands in my name on the Paper. I venture to say that this is one of the most audacious Bills introduced to Parliament since I have first had a seat in this House. What this Bill proposes to do is to make it easy to obtain a divorce by the simplest collusion, and without the slightest impairment of the character of either party. That is the premium that is held out. A duly married couple have only to separate for four years, and then they can obtain a divorce as a matter of course. One of the greatest obstacles that now lies in the way of availing of the Law of Divorce is this: that it cannot be done without a certain amount of punishment, social and otherwise, hanging to one party as a result of the decree of the Court; but what does this Bill say? If either the husband or wife deserts—that is to say, keeps out of the way for four years—that will amount to legal desertion of the party who complains, and who may be the great offender, and gets completely rid of all impeachment of character of either party, thus offering a temptation to the innocent one, and holding out a premium of immunity to the guilty one; for if there is guilt in any case under this Bill, however serious, there is no provision whatever for the Queen's Proctor intervening. In cases of this kind nothing could be easier than collusion. An infamous offender might, in fact, force his wife to take the only remedy open to her—namely, proceedings for divorce, which carried no punishment. Under the pretence that it is desirable to assimilate the law of England to the law of Scotland, the hon. and learned Member introduces this Bill, which purports to apply the same condition now applicable in Divorce under the law of Scotland to the Law of Divorce in England. The hon. and learned Member has not explained how the Marriage Laws of England and Scotland have been so different for centuries and are so still; but it came about in this way. The Christian Law of Marriage was early promulgated in England, but was never proclaimed in Scotland at all; not even the latest summary of the law, that of the Council of Trent; thus when the Reformation came upon these countries, whether for good or whether for ill, the Marriage Law of Scotland was radically different from the Marriage Law o-

Sir R. Webster

England. I may say for the information of my hon. Friends that the Marriage Law in Scotland was, before the Reformation and in Catholic times, what it has been ever since, with the exception of a few modifications that have been introduced in the course of the last 20 years. The Law of Marriage stood before the Council of Trent in this way—it was left undetermined whether the Sacrament of Marriage was performed by the parties themselves or should be by the intervention of a priest in orders. The Council of Trent decreed that for the future in every country in Christendom in which the Council of Trent should be proclaimed—but not till then—the marriage between the subjects of the Church and of the State should be in faciem ecclesiæ—in face of the Church; which, interpreted into ordinary language, meant that it should be in the presence of the priest of the parish, where the ceremony purported to be effected. The marriage law, as laid down by the Council of Trent, was proclaimed in England; it was proclaimed in France; and it was proclaimed over all the Continental countries of Christendom; but it never was proclaimed in Scotland, and, the Council of Trent not having been ever proclaimed in Scotland, they have nothing to modify, and they have had no occasion to do a number of things there which the ancient law of England since Saxon times made absolutely imperative in order to validate or which, being omitted, might afterwards invalidate a marriage. We are now asked to assimilate the law of England and Scotland with respect to marriage; but the hon. and learned Member cannot say that the law of Scotland is now exactly what he proposes that the law of England and Scotland should be when this Bill is passed. Well, I now understand the hon. and learned Member does say so, but even if this be the state of the law in Scotland, I would ask to be informed what advantage and how many times advantage has been taken of that law in Scotland for the purpose of carrying out divorce on principles that would be made easy for both England and Scotland? That would be more pertinent to the argument by which the hon. and learned Member attempts to support his Bill. That fact would be more pertinent than anything else—how many people in Scotland have felt so aggrieved for the last 300 years that they availed themselves of the facilities for divorcing themselves from one another on the ground of mere desertion? How many have availed of it? If very few have availed of it, then I say that there should be no temptation held out to the people here, who are of a different constitution from my Scotch friends. Then there is another ground on which I say this Bill ought to be rejected. There has been no warning of it, and there has been no inquiry on the subject. Even if there were a justification in the minds of the majority of this House for bringing in such a Bill and sending it to a Committee, it would be a most serious thing to stamp it with the seal of a Second Reading in this House without its having been submitted previously to any test except the test of the judgment of the five Gentlemen, which is not altogether infallible, whose names are found on the back of the Bill. I beg to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

* (7.29.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to second the Motion of the hon. Member. I am not at all in favour of dealing, and I trust the House will not deal, piecemeal with the Marriage Laws. I admit that there are cases in which divorce is most improperly denied, as for example in cases of insanity, of habitual intemperance, and of long terms of penal servitude. In the case of penal servitude for life I think that the relief should be given which is now denied; but I am not prepared—and I trust that the House will plainly say that it is not prepared—to enter upon this large question of reform for the mere purpose of making changes. I admit that on the face of it there appears to be some injustice in saying that while a husband shall be entitled to a divorce from his wife on the ground of her immorality, the wife shall not be similarly entitled. Theoretically the cases are the same, but practically they are not. It is manifestly of the greatest importance to the children that they should have their mother living with them and caring for them. The immorality of the husband, although it may be a bitter and cruel wrong to the wife, cannot, and does not, inflict the same wrong as the adultery of the wife does, not only upon the husband, but upon the children of the marriage. The circumstances are not the same. This Bill, therefore, can scarcely commend itself to one's mind, because it makes an alteration in the case of adultery in favour of the wife. As to the desertion of a wife by her husband, the House must be aware that if the husband has also been guilty either of adultery or desertion of his wife for only two years, the wife is now entitled to go to the Court and to obtain the relief she requires. The wife, if she cannot, as the Bill proposes, obtain a divorce on the ground of her husband's desertion for four years, has a remedy; for, after two years' desertion, she can have a decree of judicial separation from him. The question of desertion is one of such minor importance that the House will decline to alter the law in regard to it. I would remind the House, if necessary, that we have not far to go to see what the result of tampering with the law of divorce has been. Hon. Members should remember how the United States stand in regard to this matter. The law there practically varies in every State. Almost without any sound reason—in fact with none, except a mere unwillingness to live together—people are divorced by dozens and by hundreds every year in particular States of America. And, indeed, even in France there was a case the other day in which a wife of 80 sued for a divorce from a husband of 80 on the ground of incompatibility of temper. I once met with an American in a railway carriage who explained that he had been divorced five times, and who said he only regretted that he had not sooner known that a divorce could have been obtained for $45. Such a state of the law must be a scandal, not only in our eyes, but also in those of all thoughtful Americans. People from the States often congratulate us in England upon our having had the good sense not to tamper with the sanctity of the marriage rite. By refusing to enlarge the grounds upon which marriages may be dissolved in this country, we shall, I trust, do something towards preserving the sanctity of the marriage tie, for which England has been perhaps more honoured than any other country.

Mr. Kelly

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir J. McKenna.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(7.38.) MR. McLAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I cannot allow the House to divide without saying how strongly I wish to see this Bill carried. I do not approve of the provision that divorce can be obtained for four years' desertion, but that is a detail for Committee. The essence of the Bill seems to me to be, that whatever the law as regards the cause of divorce against a wife may be it should be the same as against the husband. I regret that there should be a feeling in the House against the alteration of the law proposed by the Bill. The law in Scotland has always worked perfectly well; while in France an Act has been recently passed on the same lines as this Bill, which is also working well. Therefore, there is no reason why we should not have a similar law in this country, and I earnestly hope that the Bill will be read a second time.

(7.41.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I hope that the House will not assent to the Second Reading. It has been brought in by a Scotch Member, but English Members have a right to say that they are much better satisfied with the law as it stands in England than they would be with the introduction of the Scotch law on the subject. We have been told that the Scotch law works well in that country; but however that may be, it is no reason why Scotchmen should bring in a Bill seeking to alter the law in England. I am prepared to give my cordial assent to the Amendment, and I hope the House will agree to it.

Question put.

(7.45.) The House divided :—Ayes 40; Noes 71.—(Div. List, No. 85.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

NAVY (HYDROGRAPHER'S REPORT).

Copy presented,—of Report on Admiralty Surveys for the year 1891 by the Hydrographer of the Admiralty [by Command] ; to lie upon the Table.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ALLOTMENTS BILL.—(No. 94.)

Lords' Amendments to be considered forthwith ; considered, and agreed to.

MOTIONS.

GAS PROVISIONAL ORDERS CONFIRMATION BILL.

On Motion of Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade under "The Gas and Waterworks Facilities Act, 1870," relating to Cullingworth Gas, Kempston Gas, Mitcham and Wimbledon District Gas, South Normanston and Blackwell Gas, and Sutton and Hooton District Gas, ordered to be brought in by Sir Michael Hicks Beach and Sir John Gorst.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 295]

SUNDERLAND'S CHARITY BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Barran, Bill to confirm a Scheme of the Charity Commissioners for the application or management of the Charity of Samuel Sunderland, in the parish of Bingley, in the West Riding of the county of York, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Barran and Sir Stafford Northcote.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 296.]

WITNESSES PROTECTION BILL.

On Motion of Sir Charles Russell, Bill for the better protection of Witnesses giving evidence on Parliamentary and other public inquiries, ordered to be brought in by Sir Charles Russell, Mr. Burt, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Fenwick, Mr. John Morley, and Mr. Edmund Robertson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 297.]

GOVERNMENT OF SCOTLAND BILL. (No. 65.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(7.50.) DR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): This is a measure of such great importance that I regret it comes on for Second Reading in a House containing such a small number of Members. I will shortly explain to the House what its provisions are, and what are the grounds upon which it is founded. In the first place, I would point out that this House has far too much work to do in regard to Imperial matters, English matters, and Irish matters, to be able, however willing it may be, to give proper attention to the business of Scotland. We could undoubtedly find the time and the opportunity to manage the business of Scotland for ourselves, without the assistance of English or of Irish Members, in a manner far superior to what can be done in this House. In the second place—and this is the more important point of view—Scotch Members are in a very small minority in this House, and Scotch opinion is habitually overturned and set aside by the English votes. There are 500 English Members in this House, whilst Scotland has only 70, or 72 including the Universities. The result is that almost everything that Scotland wants is refused, and what Scotland does not want is forced upon it by this House. During the last six years a widespread feeling has been produced in Scotland that something should be done to secure the better management of the affairs of that country. I will spare the House to-night a recital of Scotch grievances, and will at once explain that the main provision of this Bill is that the whole legislative work of Scotland should be done in Scotland by the Scotch Members of Parliament ; that these Members should meet in the autumn to dispose of the business ; and that the Bills that they pass should become law with the sanction of the Crown, and without the interference either of this House or of the House of Lords. The sphere assigned by the Bill to the Scotch Legislative Body is almost precisely identical with that which was provided for Ireland in the Bill of 1886.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present.

DR. HUNTER: It is proposed that if there is any doubt as to whether the Scotch Legislative Body has transgressed the limits laid down for it the Bill shall be laid before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and hon. Members should take the advice of that Committee, and not give their consent to the Bill if the Committee decide that it is a violation of the limits laid down. This plan, I think, would be most advantageous, as it avoids the difficulties which exist under the United States Constitution. At the same time, it provides a most competent and able tribunal to determine whether Bills passed by the Scotch Legislative Body are within its powers. Then there is another provision with regard to the relation of Scotland to England in the matter of taxation. It is provided in the Bill that, after the Scotch Legislative Body has been appointed, Scotland should pay towards the maintenance of Imperial establishments in the same proportion as England and Wales, having regard to the relative wealth and number of the population. Now, from our point of view, this is a most important provision, because on an examination of the figures which have been supplied to this House by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to the taxation of Scotland, Ireland, and England, it appears, after a proper account is taken of the sum Scotland actually pays and the sum which she would pay, having regard to the number and wealth of her population, that Scotland would be at least a million and a half richer than she now is. A million and a half is no doubt a very small sum so far as England is concerned, because she is a large and wealthy country; but to a small country like Scotland, with only 4,000,000 of population, the sum is a large and serious amount. I hope the Government may appoint the Committee which they have promised to inquire into the subject during the present Session, and no doubt that subject can be better discussed by a Committee than by the House itself. There is one reason which to many of us is in itself sufficient for the passing of this Bill. Under the operation of this Bill, if it become law, the Scotch people, without the interference of the English people—and, above all things, without the interference of the other House—would be able to pass such measures for the good government of their country as they might feel just and necessary. And if there is one grievance felt in Scotland more than another it is the tyrannical majority of the English Members who, naturally, vote on Scotch questions according to English ideas. If, however, I take a lesson from them and endeavour to impart a little of the enlightenment and liberality which exists in Scotland, they turn round and denounce me for interfering with English questions. That is a question which I hope they will take to heart. What we complain of is that we are over-ruled and overridden by an English majority which is totally indifferent to either the feelings or interests of the people of Scotland. Then how do the Government propose to meet this universally acknowledged evil? Why, they introduce Private Bill Procedure for Scotland—a measure so ridiculously inadequate and so inconvenient and preposterous in its provisions as a first instalment of Home Rule that it is laughed at from one end of Scotland to the other. I shall not detain the House longer, but move the Second Reading of this Bill.

Dr. Hunter

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Hunter.)

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,—

House adjourned at a quarter before Nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 27th April, 1892.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE (EXTENSION TO WOMEN) BILL.—(No. 36.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(12.20.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): The subject of the Bill of which I now move the Second Reading is no new one to the House of Commons. For upwards of a quarter of a century it has been debated upon Bills and Resolutions, and this gives the House the advantage of familiarity with the question; but it has some disadvantage for myself, since it forces upon me a conscious contrast with much more able men who have on previous occasions introduced this matter to the House of Commons, the advantage of whose assistance I am glad in many cases to have to-day. All I can hope to do is to contribute some municipal experience which may be useful, since the Bill is based on municipal precedents and example, which have been too much ignored in previous debates. One new aspect is given to the question by the letter which has been addressed to the hon. Member opposite (Mr. S. Smith) by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). I realise that such a communication is naturally very forcible, and I shall treat it with great respect; but if I may make one criticism upon it, it is that I think it does not discuss the proposal from the standpoint from which it is now made, but seems to be based rather upon communications of a similar character addressed to the newspapers, and also, I think, to a constituent by the hon. Member for Flint (Mr. S. Smith), and to be a reflection of his opinions rather than a discussion of the principles of the proposal we make. But, at any rate, that pamphlet has had one advantage. If this subject—which I cannot conceive—has not received sufficient public attention, the letter has secured it. There is another and even a greater benefit attaching to it, in that it invites and sets an example of a more serious discussion the subject, and I am quite sure the tone of the letter in this respect will not be lost sight of. I have said the subject is not new to the House of Commons, but I am glad to-day to be free from one reproach which has, on former occasions, been addressed to those who have stood in my present position—that the Bill has been brought before one and the same Parliament Session after Session. On this occasion it may be said that the measure has not been before this Parliament at all; and when I recall the fact that in the last Parliament the Bill had the advantage of the advocacy of the hon. Member for Hanley (Mr. Woodall), and passed the House without division, I think I am justified in bespeaking for it a statesmanlike consideration to-day. A further change in the position is that the Bill has quite a new form. I have carefully read the debates and the criticisms passed upon former measures; and, if I may venture to say so, I think those discussions and criticisms have generally been of a too high-pitched abstract character, and I do not recognise them as applicable to the proposal in its present practical shape. They seem to me—those criticisms—to have exaggerated and distorted both the subject of the proposal and the objections to it; and I repeat that, even in the case of the recent letter to which I have referred, that old ground seems to have been taken once again—that, in the words of the hon. Member opposite, this is a proposal “revolutionary in character,” “a reversal of the order of nature,” that it is “such a change as has never been made since the Creation,” and now “put forward for the first time in the world’s history.” All these expressions are addressed to the proposal to confer upon women a vote for Parliamentary elections which they have long exercised, and exercised with advantage in relation to municipal government. Revolutionary! Why, Sir, this proposal is not even an innovation; for if I remember my history correctly, the franchise, both Parliamentary and municipal, was possessed by women in former times on the same lines as those I suggest to-day—at any rate it was exercised by women from time to time in the election of knights of the shire for Yorkshire and elsewhere. If I wanted to found myself on good constitutional ancient authority, I would remind the House that this was so in the days of the Plantagenets, and certainly of the Tudors, and that ought to be good enough for some hon. Gentlemen on this side. Then, on the other hand, to influence hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, I might say that this was put an end to by Judge-made law; and having in mind expressions of opinion upon Judge-made law during the recent Debate upon the Law of Conspiracy, I commend that fact to the consideration of such hon. Gentlemen. It is also a coincidence that may strike both sides of the House that, while this Judge-made law emanated from a Member for Liskeard (Coke), we to-day shall have the advantage of the aid of another Member for Liskeard (Mr. Courtney) in favour of this proposal. And, if this privilege of voting by women was extinguished because of its disuse, I must remind the House that the cessation was due to the association of the vote with services in kind, and that those services have since been commuted, with the result that qualified women do just as much for the Army as most men—namely, help to pay for it. But these criticisms, however forcibly they may have applied to former measures, can have no application to this Bill, which aims, as I say, at a practical—and the only present practicable—solution of the question, and which is based distinctly on the, natural, and ultimately inevitable, development of our principles of representative government. If I may quote a political authority for this, I should use the words of Sir Henry Maine, who, in his Early History of Institutions, says—

An Asterisk (*) at the commencement of a Speech indicates revision by the Member.

“The civilised societies of the West, in steadily enlarging the personal and proprietary independence of women, and even in granting to them political privilege, are only carrying out still further a law of development which they have been obeying for many centuries.”

May I remind the House this is an age of successive and successful franchises, successful in securing attention to, and proper precedence in the consideration of, the interests of the classes on whom votes have been conferred? And so we hope this extension will secure proper regard for the interests of those who are now unrepresented among the electorate. It was once said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, speaking of a large class of men, “They have no votes, and so may be safely neglected.” I heartily accept this expression as applicable to those with which this measure deals. Illustrations of such neglect are not wanting. The middle-class Parliament formed in 1832 did nothing for popular education, or very little; but the election of the Household Suffrage Parliament of 1867 was followed by the passing of the Education Act of 1870 and the Labour Statutes of 1875, which have materially improved the conditions of life of the labouring classes. So, too, the County Franchise Act has been quickly followed by the Allotments Acts and by the Bills which are at the present time before the House for discussion, one of which is to confer upon labourers in rural districts the advantage of acquiring small holdings. Again, enfranchisement has hitherto proceeded on two great main lines:—the possession of qualifying property and contributions to taxation. Time was when taxation without representation was spoken of as tyranny. That was then the tyranny of Kings, but the tyranny is not the less if it is the tyranny of the multitude; it is then a multiplied tyranny. On the ground of representation with taxation these votes are asked for. The principle upon which the franchise has been extended is the possession of evidence of citizenship; mere manhood is not sufficient; a man must have, even in the minor cases of the lodger and service votes, a house of some description and contribute to the payment of rates and taxes. Whether a different principle may be adopted in the future we cannot say. The basis of the franchise now is the household and contribution to the national burdens, and upon that basis we claim the extension of the franchise to qualified women. Manhood suffrage may or may not come; it is a matter, after all, only of opinion; speculations based upon it are irrelevant to the present question; we may leave that to future Parliaments. We must not, as I think the hon. Member for Flint (Mr. S. Smith) suggests, treat future Parliaments as automatic machines to carry out the behests of the Parliament of to-day. We must have sufficient faith in future Parliaments to know that they will act rightly and with the advantage of knowledge of the conditions of their time; that they will do what is just and expedient as we do what is just and expedient to-day. We cannot bind future Parliaments; we cannot prophecy what they may do; we must do our duty by giving the franchise where it is right and due, and we must rely on future Parliaments doing their duty in protecting that privilege, and in the establishment of good government, not carrying the principle to illogical and improper conclusions. We must not, therefore, on the faith of any such speculative assumptions, refuse to fulfil the franchise of citizenship by admitting to it qualified and capable women citizens; we must not decline to do right because others may seek to do wrong; we must do our duty in the conviction that our successors will do theirs and no more than theirs; and indeed, judging from the present state of electoral law, the fear is not that Parliaments will push matters to too logical conclusions, but that they may be only too well trusted to retain any number of illogicalities and anomalies. Now, we are told that this proposal to confer the franchise on qualified women is, to use the word of my hon. Friend, "revolutionary." We are asked when and where was such a change ever made; and the practice in former Debates has been to quote instances where such a franchise has been conferred. It has been asserted that there has been a partial exercise of such a franchise in Italy, and reference has also been made to Denmark, and to the existence of the female franchise in Wyoming and other places. I will not dwell on these instances, though I may mention that

Sir A. Rollit

Wyoming is now a State, and the franchise has the approval of high official authority, and the right to vote there carries with it the right to hold any public office in the United States. But I pass to an illustration nearer home. I have a letter from a member of the States of Guernsey, and my correspondent mentions that a Bill has recently passed the island Parliament, and is now law, giving a vote to lady householders—who pay rates and taxes as householders—on the very lines of this Bill. Women, my correspondent adds, are not eligible for any office, nor can they be members of the States. There you have the principle in both respects upon which this Bill is based; but the right to vote carries with it no right to hold office or to sit in Parliament. The measure, I am informed, works very well in Guernsey. I might also refer to the case of the Isle of Man, where there is a similar franchise. The Colonial Confederation Scheme of Sir Harry Parkes contemplated such an extension of the franchise, and some colonies, including South Australia, have nearly passed such a measure. It is suggested to me that in New Zealand the proposal was only defeated by the votes of two Maoris. I mention this because my hon. Friend opposite has imaginatively pictured the battle of our eleven millions of women against our ten millions of men, and the defeat of the latter; and if that be possible, one may also imagine Macaulay's New Zealander contemplating from London Bridge not the last man—but the last woman. I do not rely, however, on these instances or on these illustrations as arguments; we have ample practical experience in the United Kingdom in our Municipal and County Council elections; and, looking at the development of our constitution, I would ask where should we look for such a completed franchise if not to our own country, the home of representative institutions, from which, as such, this franchise is asked for qualified women, and for such and such only? Next, much has been said of the manner in which this proposal has been advocated, and I am not concerned to defend all these methods. But the arguments of our opponents are too often contradictions in terms. If women press for this extension, then "they are agitators, and their demand should not be complied with;" if they do not agitate, then "they are indifferent on the subject." If many Petitions are presented, then "they are got up by organisation;" if the Petitions are few, then "you see women do not want this extension." If the platform is occupied, then "there is reason to fear the invasion of Parliament by the advocates of female suffrage;" if the platform is not resorted to, then "there is no popular feeling in favour of the proposal." The allegation that it is not wanted has invariably been urged against the extension of the franchise to any class. It is based on the fallacy of universality. It is not true to say that women do not want the franchise though some may be indifferent or opposed to it; but the exercise of the franchise will be optional—there is no obligation to use the vote or to follow the example set by those who think it gives the proper protection of their own interests, and those who do desire it ought not to be debarred from it for the sake of those who need not exercise it. With regard to the methods by which the present proposal has been advocated, all I can say is I have taken no part in any agitation. I have attended no meetings on the subject; happily, not the one held last night, the proceedings of which I thoroughly disapprove. Very many Petitions have been presented—some, no doubt, open to the criticisms which can always be directed against this form of expression of opinion. These Petitions have emanated frequently from large bodies of people, and are signed by Presidents and other officers, who represent very large constituencies. The Petitions have been largely signed by those who belong to all classes, and very many of whom are obviously in humble positions. Resolutions have, at one time or another, been passed by the great political organisations of both Parties, at Leeds, at Birmingham, and elsewhere; and though it may be said that women should not take part in political campaigns, they have been urged to do so by the leashes of both Parties; their assistance has been welcome, and most of us are grateful for it. Petitions have been presented from some 160 branches of the Women's Liberal Federation, some of them this morning. The attitude of the Press towards the proposal has in London been critical but just, and not unfavourable in many cases; the Provincial Press has been eminently moral, especially in Scotland, and I do not hesitate to say that from the Provincial Press we get a good index of the public opinion of the country and of its probable development. This, therefore, is a constitutional concession constitutionally asked. Though I have incidentally referred to Parties, let me say as emphatically as possible that this is in no sense a Party matter, and the names attached to the Bill show that. The tendency of the influence of women voters will be to modify Party feeling, which, however necessary under our existing system, is, in my opinion, too often a disfigurement of our natural life; and I hope for the time when it will be more generally felt that he does best for his Party who does best for the State. On the other hand, woman must not be sacrificed to Party exigency; and I trust that they may be the hope of each Party, the prey of neither, and the sport of none. I gladly leave this part of my remarks for the moment to tell the House how the Bill carries out the principles under which it is introduced, for it appears there is much misapprehension in some minds as to what the Bill does and what it does not do. It enacts that—

"Every woman who in Great Britain is registered or entitled to be registered as an elector for a Town Council or County Council or who in Ireland is a ratepayer entitled to vote in the election of Guardians of the Poor, shall be entitled to be registered as a Parliamentary elector, and when registered to vote at any Parliamentary election for the county, borough, or division wherein the qualifying property is situate."

These words "qualifying property" follow the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882, and this is the basis of the existing female franchise. What will be the effect of accepting this? And what will be the results—not by mere prophecy, but by necessary inference? In England and Scotland, under the Municipal Corporations Electors Acts, every inhabitant occupier—that is, practically every householder who for twelve months has been rated and has paid rates—is qualified for, and entitled to, the franchise; and the effect will be to give just the same, no less and no more, to a woman who is similarly qualified, subject to two exceptions which I will deal with in a moment. In Ireland, where there is not yet a Local Government Act, but where we hope that under the auspices of one Party or the other there soon will be, there will then be an easy application of the same principle for conferring the franchise on women, and I think the Local Government Bill for Ireland contains that provision. Meanwhile, the closest analogous Statute, the Poor Law Act for Ireland, 1 and 2 Vic., c. 56, has been taken as giving the nearest approach to the franchise to be conferred on women in this country, and it will thus be conferred on all those who are duly qualified as ratepayers or as county cesspayers to vote for the election of Guardians of the Poor. The Bill, if passed, would add about a million to the electorate, as against some 300,000 to 400,000 under previous Bills—a million of women who have had a long experience in the exercise of the franchise; and if it be said by my hon. Friend opposite that this will be a large number as opposed to men who are similarly qualified, let me tell the House that they will only be a seventh or an eighth of the constituencies, subject to a large deduction for those who are said not to wish for the franchise and who assumably will not vote, and in the event of such a pitched battle as he anticipates the forces will be pretty equally matched with all the advantage of his leadership on that side. A million will be added and no more. And now what will the Bill not do, for I have heard attributed to it a great deal which is not within its purview. It will not “disfranchise” a single person—it is an enabling, not a disabling Bill, accepts the existing Parliamentary lines, the lines of experience and usage under the Municipal, Educational, and other Franchise Acts. It leaves the Franchise Law exactly as it is, and follows those Parliamentary lines under which the franchise has hitherto been exercised. At present married women are not registered as voters for municipal elections, nor can they vote for School Boards. If, therefore, it be said there is an inconsistency and an anomaly in that this Bill does not confer the vote upon married women, it is an anomaly which is the creation of Parliament itself. If it be said, as it has been said by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), that this proposal is “halting and inconsistent,” then I reply that the halting and inconsistency are the halting and inconsistency of Parliament, of the Governments of the right hon. Gentleman which conferred the municipal franchise in 1869 and 1882, creating and training a special class which is thus qualified for further similar privileges, any undue excess of which may well be left to future Parliaments, which will be governed, like ourselves, by practical considerations. May I also point out that the criticisms upon the non-inclusion of married women are generally put in a somewhat illogical way? It is said, first, that the principle of including women in the franchise is objectionable; but, again, it is said, “If you include married women a great objection to the measure will be removed.” In fact, the argument is, first, that we should not include any women; and, secondly, that we should include more. This is too often the reasoning not of sincere friends, but of enemies—sowing tares and tempting us to go further in the hope that we may fare worse. There is no inconsistency on our part; we accept the position as Parliament has made it, and we are quite willing, if Parliament thinks fit hereafter to assimilate the municipal and Parliamentary franchise, we are content to leave that open for future Parliamentary consideration. By an historical accident the municipal and Parliamentary registers slightly differ in some few respects. Among these, the municipal register does not include married women or lodgers, and the municipal register is taken as the basis of this Bill, because of the experience of its working, which offers a strong argument in our support, for we can say the class who have had the municipal franchise have exercised it with such advantage that they are entitled also to the Parliamentary suffrage. We accept the present law and existing experience as a basis, and it has at least this advantage, in that it enables us to avoid the rocks on which previous measures have struck, to escape such differences as these as to the duplication of votes, or differences and discord in the home, the creation of faggot votes, and the like, by accepting the law just as it is, and by not touching such matters of controversy. In Scotland the law gives the vote to married women who are living, as the expression is, "not in family with their husbands," and we take the law of Scotland as it is as indicating that it is in accordance with the general opinion in Scotland and a similar observation may be made in regard to the enfranchisement of the female trader under the custom of the City of London. As I have said, the underlying principle of the Bill is that it accepts and utilises the law as it stands for a still further development of the franchise. That being so, we are able to say the Bill goes past the differences which have hitherto divided the House, and we escape criticisms which are not applicable to the present measure, however they may have applied to previous proposals. We also claim that we proceed on the old constitutional principle of advancing step by step so often resorted to in the legislation of this country, and which no doubt has produced many anomalies. What Parliament may hereafter do is a wholly different matter; but if we look at the manifold complexities and illogicalities in Acts conferring local franchises, it cannot fairly be said that the apparent anomaly here presents an obstacle to this measure. Similarly, in relation to women lodgers the Bill follows the lines of experience and of least resistance; it does what is at present practicable and possible; and though, as in the case of married women, we concede that much, very much may be said on each side, and that many arguments which have been used are based on mere assumptions, still the fact remains and justifies us that the municipal and other registers on which we are proceeding do not include married women or lodgers, that the Bill enfranchises large numbers of women, that it gives additional security for the consideration of the interests of all women, from the woman's own point of view, and that other points may well await what would be a public advantage—namely, the unification of the municipal and Parliamentary registers. In former Debates local experience of a parochial character was chiefly resorted to in support of the claims of women, the right to vote for overseers, and better, the right to vote for Local Bodies, and still better, the right to vote for School Boards and to serve on School Boards. I mention the Boards of Guardians and School Boards to point out that when Parliament intended to confer the right to sit and serve, as well as to vote in elections, Parliament has had the courage to give that sanction by Statute, but when that right is not thus given the inference is that there has been no such intention. The Statute of 1869, passed under the Government of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), gave the right to women to vote at municipal elections, or I should rather say it was revived, for it had previously existed, and was ignored by the Corporations Act of 1835. In previous Debates it has been said that this right of women to vote at municipal elections was given by accident—"by a slip"—at three o'clock in the morning, and, said a former Member for Huddersfield, "You will not catch us napping a second time." This means, if anything, that the opponents of the Parliamentary suffrage for women would, if they had the opportunity, oppose municipal suffrage for women, and would on the same grounds—grounds of prophecy which have been falsified by experience—deprive the country of the advantage which that Act of 1869 is admitted to have conceded. In 1882, notwithstanding all that has been said about slumberous legislation, the Municipal Corporations Act adopted the provision without any opposition. It was, in fact, discussed in the Lords in 1869, and had the able advocacy of Lord Cairns, and, I think, the Home Secretary. Lord Aberdare spoke for it even in the Commons, and it was heartily accepted. The Municipal Corporations Act adopted the proposal, the principle has been conceded, and if there can be any debate now it should be as to the application of the principle, not to the principle, of the right of women to vote. Experience, now for a quarter of a century, completely supports the way in which that franchise has been exercised, and municipal elections have been generally conducted in a manner highly creditable to all concerned, including women. If there had been any objection to women's votes in Municipalities certainly my connection, as President, with the Municipal Corporations Association would have brought such arguments to my knowledge. But experience rebuts nearly every one of the speculative assumptions of my hon. Friend opposite. The proportion of women voters in municipal elections is from 15 to 17 per cent., made up of women of all classes, duly qualified, and two-thirds or three-fourths of whom are women occupying houses rated below £20. Let me refer to a letter I have received from the neighbourhood of Huddersfield. My correspondent says—

Sir A. Rollé

"Many women in this neighbourhood would be enfranchised by such an Act as you propose, and especially widows of respectable working men, who have made such provision for them that they continue to rent the houses they occupied during their husbands' lifetime."

This is important testimony to the fact that this proposal will not enfranchise an exclusive class; it will include a large body of working women. I have many other similar letters. Then much has been said as to the desire or otherwise of women to exercise this franchise, and the answer is, from practice and statistics, that women do exercise the franchise now at municipal elections in the same proportion as men, and that the exercise of the vote by women is increasing, especially in Scotland. Women do not vote in that solid mass which has been suggested, but, on the contrary, the votes are very materially divided. The recent County Council elections, for instance, show that such is the case. And the reason is that women are associated with all the relations of life, and that with this extension there would be no transfer of voting power from one class to another, such as has accompanied previous enlargements of the franchise. Then there is the argument from disaster and from the supposed difficulty in women recording their votes at Parliamentary elections; but where can be the difficulty in women once in some four or five years doing that which, in municipal elections, they do annually—placing a voting paper in the ballot box? Municipal elections have, in fact, been conducted very much on political lines; political considerations enter largely into them, and if there is question of disorder, I should look for that disorder in those small boroughs where strong Party and personal feeling frequently reigns, and yet where women are able to record their franchise without any difficulty whatever. But the fact is that, so far from having an unfeminine tendency, this Bill will enable the quiet and unassuming women to vote, as distinguished from the more active aspirants to the platform. I refer to the exercise of the municipal franchise for one purpose more, and only for one purpose—that is to say, that the municipal vote has not been followed by any general or practical demand for seats in Councils or claims to the Mayoralty. I should be far from endorsing any such claims, and have declined to present them to this House. There is a distinct and permanent difference between the right to vote and the right to sit in a deliberative assembly; the disqualification for the latter has been decided to exist as to women, and it has long subsisted in the case of the clergy and the Civil Service, so I deny the inference that because the right to vote is accorded it must be followed by the right to sit or to hold office. With regard to the right to vote, I may point out to the House that it is one that has been exercised under the conditions I have mentioned without difficulty; and I do not know that there has been any real complaint as to the manner in which their constitutional privilege of the municipal franchise has been exercised by women. I believe the late Mr. Beresford Hope and the Member for Huddersfield said "it has not been a success," and one said that it had been "a mistake." But I quote the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who said "they have exercised the franchise without detriment and with great advantage." And yet it has now been said by the same right hon. Gentleman that this municipal experience to which I have referred is, after all, but a "plausible shadow"! It is coupled by him subordinately with the right to enter the Universities, with the right to intellectual culture; and yet the fact is ignored that women have taken an active and useful and unpretentious part in the public affairs of the country and in the localities, and have earned the appreciative expressions of the right hon. Gentleman himself. There is just one other subject to which I should like to refer, and that is this: that there has been an actual neglect of the interests of women in dealing with the subjects in which they are interested. I notice that one statesman (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), has said, and I think he has said with great truth, that—

"Men have often been the most unfaithful guardians of women's rights to social and moral equality."

But it is said that these grievances have been remedied, and no doubt a great deal has been done for the protection of women; for instance, in regard to the conditions of their labour in mines and at the loom. Nevertheless, a former advocate of women's suffrage, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), said at Wolverhampton only the other night what is certainly true, that—

"The need for reform is as great to-day as ever, and every day develops new claims," and I should like to call attention to one or two matters in which this concession on the part of Parliament is eminently necessary for the benefit and improvement of the position of women. In relation to their property, the right to which is absolute even in such a country as Russia, much has been done; but it took a quarter of a century's fighting to do it, and there are anomalies which still remain to be removed. No doubt Parliament has been rather generous; in some respects even too gallant, for it has given women their property and left men their debts. Perhaps a little prudent administration in this House—perhaps the expression of the wishes of women from their own point of view—may lead us to be a little more cautious in relation to legislation of that description. In regard to the guardianship of children and the protection of homes something has been done; but the Bill in relation to the former was greatly modified in its passage through the House, and there is still room for much improvement. In education men have taken the endowments in a very great measure, and have left little for women. There, again, there have been improvements, but there is still much to do in opening the older Universities, in establishing new ones—as in London—in the work of University extension, in supplying the dearth of teachers, and in technical and industrial training for the army of women who have to earn their own livings and fight their own battle in life. Yet women, despite difficulty and disability, have shown themselves highly capable in all the records of human thought and achievement. The percentage of rejections at the first examination of the University of London, which is close and severe, shows that women fulfil the test quite as well as men competitors; and therefore I need no longer, seeing what has been accomplished, point to those great exceptional cases, which have been sneered at, but which have been the triumphs of the few for the benefit of the many, and which have opened the door for the vast numbers that have followed in their wake. Then the Laws of Divorce, which were discussed here only last night, are still unequal, and women's views could well be expressed upon them with advantage. There is the perennial question of the deceased wife's sister, and intermingled with her the deceased husband's brother. We hear much of the one, but little of the other. Breach of promise of marriage has been proposed to be abolished, but women's Petitions have been presented against it. Surely one of their direct Representatives might be allowed to express his views upon that subject. In relation to the great question of the land, the House, perhaps, hardly realises how many landlords are in the unfortunate position of having lost their husbands, and yet are carrying on their farms, employing numbers of labourers who have votes, while they, though more qualified in every respect, have none, simply and only because they are women! Few know how many women are farmers and graziers—some 20,000—and few, perhaps, realise that the agricultural interest loses through this cause something like 140,000 votes. On questions of the home from which springs the nation; of the sanitation of the house and workshop; of the improvement of the social condition of the people in relation to vaccination, sanitary matters, the Poor Law, the status of women in relation to industry and trade, as to the hours of work in factories and shops, and the legislation which must follow the result of the Royal Commission on Labour, in which women are very deeply interested; on the question of payment of Members of Parliament to which they will have to contribute, but upon which they are not to be heard; women have not, but ought to have a voice through their Representatives in Parliament. Surely these are considerations which would appeal strongly to this House to confer the vote which we ask it to confer upon women. It may be said, finally, as has been said by my hon. Friend opposite, that this vote is beyond the sphere of women's intelligence and knowledge of politics. It is not necessary that women should know—it is not possible that they—or we—or anyone—can know the whole range of politics at the present time. It is not required that women should know all the details of every political subject: what we ask is only that they should be permitted to choose some representative who would be able to consider these matters, and record their views on their behalf. Yet my hon. Friend opposite seriously proposes to apply to women a fancy franchise test which is above even that applied to mankind. He says, "What do they know about Fair Trade?" Of course, they are 'fair'-traders if they are in trade at all. He says, "What do they know about proportional representation?" Why, who knows anything about proportional representation?—except the right hon. Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney). How, he asks, can women understand the mysteries of bi-metallism? Why, that is a subject no man can understand. And that is the sort of test the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) proposes by his letters to apply to women! I think that is carrying the argument much too far. What women can, and do, understand better than men can understand for them is their own interests, which is the only justification of a wide suffrage. There are some subjects to which they can contribute, perhaps, more than any others—namely, a practical view of those social questions, mostly the subjects of the day, in which their experience would be most useful, while without it Parliament is not fully competent to solve such problems. I am sure I have trespassed far too long upon the attention of the House; but I feel that this is a very proper and safe development of the principle of the franchise, and I ask it on behalf of qualified women, for reasons which may be stated finally in a very few words. They are: That it will be an advantage for women themselves by securing the expression of their views from their own standpoint, and through those who may be entrusted with the safeguarding of their interests, for political influence is the only guarantee of legislative justice. It will raise, as we believe, the general moral and intellectual tone of society, and even conduce to a more advanced position than that which women, by their own efforts, have already occupied. We believe, too, that it will be of advantage to Parliament, because it is undesirable that Parliament should fail in the expression of the views of any large portion of the community, or of the thought and industry of any part of the population. And, lastly, we acknowledge that, after all, the object of legislation should be—as we believe would be the achievement of this Bill—good government. We believe that if we give the vote to women it will contribute to that good government; and at least that it will save them from misgovernment. And that being so, we say that this Bill will, as a whole, be of advantage to the community; and though it may not do all that may be desired by some, it would undoubtedly accomplish much for many, and we confidently ask Parliament to sanction that which we believe to be justified by considerations of justice, experience, and expediency.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir A. Rollit.)

*(4.15.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): In rising to move the rejection of this Bill, I wish to pay my tribute of respect to my hon. Colleague. I have listened with great interest to his speech, and I think I may say with truth that I never heard the case of women put forward in a more fair and reasonable manner. I wish also to say that I entertain a very deep respect for the purity of the motives of those who are the leaders in this movement. I believe they have a deep and earnest desire to raise the position of women, and that they believe the franchise to be the most potent instrument for so doing. This movement represents a great amount of genuine philanthropy, and has secured the support of many of the best men and women of the country. It deserves to be treated with great respect not only from the purity of their motives, but for the great ability of its advocates; and I hope that I shall use no arguments against it which are not both honest and respectful to my opponents. I conceive that no issue of equal importance has been submitted to Parliament in our time. This measure, if passed, will carry consequences far-reaching and momentous—consequences which none here can adequately realise. I readily admit there is weight in the arguments in favour of the measure; but I hope to convince the House that there is still greater weight in the arguments against it. I will make the admission that the Bill now before us gives the irreducible minimum of women's demands; it professes only to give the Parliamentary franchise to those women who already possess it for Municipal and County Councils. It excludes lodgers and the service franchise. The hon. Gentleman says that it will enfranchise one million voters. I thought, from such investigation as I have been able to make, that the number it would enfranchise would lie between 800,000 and 900,000.

SIR A. ROLLIT: That is, strictly, more accurate.

*MR. S. SMITH: I am glad of that explanation. It professes to give the Parliamentary franchise to 800,000 or 900,000 female householders in the United Kingdom, who are nearly all spinsters or widows; and I will allow that, if this concession would finally settle the question, there is much to be said for it. No doubt it seems rather illogical to give the franchise for Local Government and not for Imperial purposes, but I remind those who think this to be conclusive that the admission of women to local franchises was very much the result of an accident. It was never properly discussed in this House, and no one foresaw at the time how it would be used as a lever to obtain Parliamentary franchise. Had this been foreseen I doubt whether this women's local franchise would have been given, or this agitation have attained its present proportions. There is, however, an enormous difference between the two franchises. The local franchise is a very limited one, and for objects strictly defined by Act of Parliament; then, the local franchise may be altered or cancelled as Parliament thinks right. Besides, Local Bodies possess merely administrative and no law-making powers, but the Imperial Parliament possesses absolute authority over the lives and property of all within the realm, and indirectly governs 300 millions of people outside the United Kingdom. No Legislative Body that I know of possesses such unlimited powers as the British Parliament. The Legislature in the United States is bound and limited by the written Constitution; and if it act ultra vires can be called to account by the Supreme Court, and its decisions nullified. All the Legislatures in the British Colonies are more or less restrained by statutory obligations, but the British Parliament is as absolute as the Czar of all the Russias, and nothing but the practical good sense of the people prevents it becoming an instrument of tyranny. But the electors are the makers of Parliament; therefore, in the last resort they wield this tremendous power, and no nation was ever so dependent upon a practised and trained electorate. The case for Parliamentary franchise is, therefore, altogether different from that of a local one, and must be justified by far more weighty arguments. The attention of the House should be called to the fact that the previous Female Franchise Bills introduced were altogether different to this one; they claimed that—

“For all purposes of, and incidental to, the voting for Members to serve in Parliament, women shall have the same rights as men, and all enactments relating to or concerned in such elections shall be construed accordingly.”

Another Bill goes even further. It claims that—

“No person shall be disqualified from being elected to, or from filling or holding, any office or position merely by reason that such person is a woman, or being a woman is under coverture.”

That is to say, women are to be eligible to sit in Parliament, to hold office under the Crown as Ministers of State, to become Judges, Bishops, or even Commanders of the Forces. Now, I want to know whether the advocates of female suffrage, in this House or out of it, have abandoned these claims in favour of the more moderate proposals of the Bill now before us? I believe that, with one voice, all the leaders of this agitation will claim absolute equality as between men and women; this is the goal at which they are aiming, and nothing less will satisfy them. Most of those who will vote for this Bill intend at the first opportunity to widen it so as to equalise the franchise as between men and women; and should Parliament pass this Bill, what will be our position at the first General Election at which women vote? The country will be overrun with female orators inciting women to remove the stigma placed on their sex; the 800,000 or 900,000 female electors will be urged to vote only for those candidates who will promise to put men and women on an equal footing; they will be told that we make marriage a disqualification, and so insult all married women; and it will be found that hardly a candidate will refuse the pledge, for in almost every constituency the large female vote will turn the scale. There is not one trained politician in this House who does not know that the grant of the franchise claimed by this Bill will necessitate in the following Parliament the further grant of absolute political equality as between men and women. That must mean before very long universal suffrage of both men and women. Those who read the signs of the times know well that manhood suffrage must arrive here as it has done everywhere else. I do not wish to see it. I believe that most Members here do not wish to see it; yet it will come by the force of the Zeitgeist—that spirit of the age which carries all before it; and as sure as it comes will womanhood suffrage come along with it; and the world will see the first instance in history of a great Empire ruled by women, for, as everyone knows, women largely preponderate in number. It may be estimated that when allowance is made for the far larger number of men who are from home—as soldiers, sailors, and in other capacities—the available woman vote under universal suffrage will exceed that of men by about one million, or ten per cent. No one who has watched this agitation can doubt that women will then claim and enforce their right to sit in Parliament, and we shall then see not only the Mrs. Fawcetts and the Miss Cobdens of the future, but the Mrs. Besants and the Miss Helen Taylors sitting on these Benches. I cannot comprehend the mental altitude of those who say we should only look at the first step we take, and shut our eyes to its inevitable consequences; as well might a man drive a coach down a steep incline with a precipice at the bottom, and say that he had no business to consider the precipice. I insist that the House should view this question as a whole, and not be deceived into swallowing in separate doses what it would reject if given as a single draught. Consider the vastness of the change that is proposed. Our electorate at present consists of about six millions of men, nearly all householders and heads of families; it will ultimately become, if this Bill passes into law, twenty millions of persons, of which increased numbers between nine and ten millions will be men and between ten and eleven millions women. What will be the qualifications of this large mass? When were such responsible duties entrusted to such an incompetent body? Never since the world began. Many of the men are ignorant enough, and the risks run from nine or ten millions of male electors would not be small; but if you add ten or eleven millions of women, it would be overwhelming. Men, as a rule, gain a rough experience of the world; they mix in workshops and clubs, and discuss the politics of the day, and in a rough sort of way make up their minds on the current topics. Nearly all of them read newspapers and attend public meetings, but how few women have either the taste or opportunity of doing this? How few women take an interest in politics, or read speeches, or attend meetings? It is doubtful whether out of the ten or eleven millions of adult women even one million ever read a political speech, or care the least about politics. What are the vast majority of these women? Several millions of them are wives and mothers; the great majority of them are wives of working men, struggling with families of small children from early morning till late at night, utterly unable to study the complicated questions which come before Parliament. What they do read is mostly the religious serial, or the cheap novel, and it is impossible for them to frequent clubs and public meetings without ruin to their children. Of the women who are not married the vast majority are domestic servants, shop girls, factory girls, sempstresses, barmmaids, &c., and I ask this House what knowledge of politics do they possess? If a census could be taken of their reading, I verily believe that not one in ten would be found ever to read a speech or care a rush about politics. The clever political women who really study politics are a mere handful, perhaps not one per cent. of the whole women of this country, and for their sakes we are asked to revolutionise our Government. In arguing this question we have to deal with women in the mass, as with men in the mass. It is no valid argument to say that it is a shame to deny the franchise to a clever intelligent lady, and give it to her coachman or her butler. That is not the question before us. The real question is whether women as a whole are as fit to exercise the franchise as men as a whole, and I deny that they are, or can ever be. But we are told that political education follows the gift of the franchise, and that just as the agricultural labourer is learning politics because he now can vote, so his wife and daughters will equally learn as soon as they get the vote. I hold that this is one of those half truths more dangerous than whole errors. Men as a class naturally take to politics when they get a chance; but women will not, because the bent of their minds is different. They live—that is, the great bulk of them do—by the heart more than the head, and the enfranchised servant girl will continue to prefer the novelette to the Times or the Daily News. There are certain professions and occupations that women can never fill so well as men. They never will make soldiers, or sailors, or policemen, or Judges, or clergymen, though there are occasionally women who can do all those things; and they will never become politicians, because their minds recoil from it. I claim in support of my views the great father of modern Radicalism, Jeremy Bentham. That illustrious philosopher, whose writings have coloured the entire legislation of this century, decides against giving the franchise to women. The House would probably like to hear his acute estimate of the relative capacity of the sexes; a more just estimate could not be given of their respective characteristics—

“The sensibility of women seems to be greater than that of men. Their health is more delicate. They are generally inferior in strength of body, knowledge, the intellectual faculties, and firmness of soul. Their moral and religious sensibility is more lively; sympathies and antipathies have a greater empire over them. The religion of a woman more easily deviates towards superstition—that is, towards minute observances. Her affections for her own children are stronger during their whole life, and especially during their early youth. Women are more compassionate for the sufferings of those they see; and the very pains they take to relieve them form a new bond of attachment. But their benevolence is locked up in a narrower circle, and is less governed by the principle of utility. It is rare that they embrace in their affections the well-being of their country much less that of mankind; and the interest which they take in a Party depends almost always upon some private sympathy. There enters into all their attachments and antipathies more of caprice and imagination; while men have more regard to personal interests or public utility. Their habitual amusements are more quiet and sedentary. On the whole, woman is better fitted for the family, and man for matters out of doors. The domestic economy is best placed in the hands of the women; the principal management of affairs in those of the men."

Mr. S. Smith

What is this but an expansion of Milton's well-known lines—

"For contemplation he and valour form'd :
For softness she, and sweet attractive grace :
He for God only, she for God in him ?"

Our opponents do us the great injustice of thinking that we underrate women's powers, and disparage their character. So far from that, I freely admit that women possess a finer organisation than men—they are more affectionate and unselfish, and, generally speaking, more moral and religious; but I hold that if we wish to preserve these beautiful traits of character, we must not unsex them. We must not force them into an unnatural competition with men, and endanger the real virtues they possess in pursuit of Utopias. Let me remind the House that this agitation in its essence contemplates not merely political equality, but absolute equality between the sexes in all the relations of life. Some of the leaders of this movement take strong objections to the existing Marriage Law and the relation of the sexes as laid down in Scripture and upheld by all branches of the Church. Mrs. Fawcett, in a manifesto she has recently issued, repudiates the authority of St. Paul on this question. She says—

"Much, therefore, of St. Paul's teaching about the position of women and other social matters is not accepted by any Christian Church as a practical guide for conduct at the present time."

Many of the leaders of this movement resent the Marriage Service of the Church of England where the woman responds in the affirmative to the following question :—

"Wilt thou have this man to be thy wedded husband, to live together after God's ordinance in the holy estate of Matrimony? Wilt thou obey him, and serve him, love, honour, and keep him in sickness and in health; and, forsaking all other, keep thee only unto him, so long as ye both shall live?"

This form of service is based upon the most express statements of Holy Scripture. From beginning to end the Bible teaches in the most explicit form the subordination of woman to man, especially in the marriage state.

"The husband is the head of the wife, as Christ is the Head of the Church" is the uniform language of Scripture, repeated in one form or another hundreds of times. Could a greater calamity befall the human race than to undermine this sacred institution? I much doubt that with female franchise will arise an agitation for substituting perfect equality as between husband and wife, and, should that be successful, a time of social chaos would ensue. Since the time of John Stuart Mill, who repudiated the marriage law of the New Testament, an agitation has arisen for what is called the emancipation of women. I look with dread upon this movement. It is at bottom directed against those organic laws for the guidance of the sexes which the Creator has laid down. Europe has had one instance of the effects of the emancipation of women from those natural restraints which God and Nature have placed upon them. In the most corrupt times of the Roman Empire there was a movement for absolute equality between the sexes, and all laws were repealed which recognised any superiority on the part of man. Will the House allow me to quote an extract from the great historian Gibbon, showing the effects of this legislation?

"When the Roman matrons became the equal and voluntary companions of their lords, a new jurisprudence was introduced that marriage, like other partnerships, might be dissolved by the abdication of one of the associates. In three centuries of prosperity and corruption this principle was enlarged to frequent practice and pernicious abuse. Passion, interest, or caprice suggested daily motives for the dissolution of a marriage: a word, a sign, a message, a letter, the mandate of a freedman declared the separation; the most tender of human connections was degraded to a transient society of profit or pleasure."

Under this state of things it was not unusual for a wife to have 20 husbands in succession, and a husband as many wives. I must express my deepest conviction that it is perilous in the last degree to tamper with those Divine laws which govern the relations of the sexes. Out of this movement for absolute political equality between men and women may develop at a later date another movement to replace the marriage law of Christianity by one giving absolute equality to the wife; and I much fear that experiments may be tried which will not tend to the welfare of mankind. No one can doubt that John Stuart Mill aimed at something of this kind, and he may be said to be the father of this movement for women's suffrage. It may be granted that the great majority of those who are moving in this matter have not at present the slightest wish for such changes, but my argument is that they are feeding a movement which contains them in its bosom, and out of which they will ultimately grow. Another argument to be considered is this, and I appeal to hon. Gentlemen in this House who are historians. I see the Leader of the House in his place, and as I know he is one who studies human nature very closely, I wish to lay before the right hon. Gentleman the circumstance that universal history is opposed to the movement; no free country in the world has ever tried the experiment. I am not one of those who decry the formula quod semper, quod ubique, quod ab omnibus. They take a tremendous responsibility who deride the universal experience of mankind. The Mover of this Bill faintly shadowed some attempt in the historical past in which women were allowed to vote. I have never come across it, and I imagine it never assumed importance. My hon. Friend (Sir A. Rollit) has made a great deal of one little experiment tried in that remote territory called Wyoming. As regards Wyoming, I admit the testimony is conflicting, and I quite admit that there are some who give a good account of its operation. But I am going to ask the House to listen to the opinion of the hon. Member for Aberdeen. This newly formed State on the outskirts of civilisation does duty at every women's franchise meeting. It got female franchise by an accident when its population—now 60,000, or about one-thousandth part the population of the United States—was a few thousands, yet none of the other 43 States in the Union have followed its example, or seem likely to do so. It stands alone. As to its working there my hon. Friend (Mr. Bryce), in his standard book on the American Commonwealth, the best and ablest ever written, says—

Mr. S. Smith

"As regards Wyoming alone the experiment has been longest at work both as regards full suffrage and jury service. The balance of such evidence as I could collect seems to be unfavourable."

He quotes from one of his most trustworthy authorities as follows:—

"After the first excitement is over it is impossible to get respectable women out to vote except every two or three years on some purely emotional question, like prohibition or other temperance legislation. The effect on family life seem to be nil, certainly not bad, but after a year or two it is found that the women of the worst classes are those that most regularly go to the polls."

As to the general feeling of the United States on the subject, Mr. Bryce writes—

"There is a widespread apprehension that to bring women into politics might lower their social position, diminish men's deference for them, harden and roughen them, and, as it is expressed, 'brush the bloom off the flowers.' This feeling is at least as strong among women as among men. Of the many American ladies whose opinion I inquired, the enormous majority expressed themselves hostile."

The House will allow that the United States is the most Democratic Republic in existence; the one where human rights are most fully acknowledged; yet it is undoubted that its judgment is quite against women's suffrage; and the same is true of all other existing Republics—such, for instance, as France and Switzerland. Yet in all those countries the problems of life are far simpler than with us. They could make experiments with much less danger. No country ever had so complicated a system of government as ours, with such prodigious duties and responsibilities cast upon it; and surely common-sense would indicate that we should not be the first to turn upside down the experience of humanity for thousand of years. If this revolutionary change is to take place let it be tried by some other countries first, and let us profit by their experience. One strange feature of this movement is that it is most favoured by the Conservative Party. ("No.") My hon. Friend says "No," but I think the voting to day will show that I am right. The Conservative Party once made what was called "a leap in the dark," but that leap is nothing compared to this. One would think that all their traditions were opposed to such leaps in the dark. The motive which probably influences them is the belief that women are more Conservative than men. This may be true as regards the upper classes, and perhaps as regards the majority of the women householders; but let me ask hon. Gentlemen opposite if by their means the upper tier of women, if I may use the expression, are enfranchised and add to the strength of their Party, how long would it be till the Liberal Party sought a counterpoise by emancipating a lower stratum? My own belief is that neither of our great historical Parties will derive strength from the enfranchisement of women. If I might venture a prediction, there are two movements which will be powerfully re-inforced by female suffrage, the one is Clericalism and the other Socialism. In Roman Catholic countries womanhood suffrage would mean the undisputed sway of the priests. In France, Italy, and I think I may say the Catholic part of Ireland, the women would vote as their Father Confessors directed them, and the Pope's supremacy would be made absolute, not merely in the realm of religion, but in that of politics as well. Is that a result which Members of this House, even of the Roman Catholic Communion, would regard with satisfaction? In Ireland you would give undisputed control to the priests.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): They have got it now.

*MR. S. SMITH: I would ask the hon. Member for Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell), whether three-quarters of Ireland would not be completely under the sway of the Roman Catholic priests?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Just as now with the men—absolutely.

*MR. S. SMITH: As to that, I do not agree with my hon. Friend at all. In Protestant countries, like Great Britain, clerical influence would be less, still it would be considerable. This cannot recommend female suffrage to the Liberal and Radical sections of the House; but it may not dismay the Conservative Party. Let me, however, point out that in England at least womanhood suffrage would emancipate masses of women utterly impervious to clerical influences, but very amenable to the politics of John Burns, Ben Tillett, and Mrs. Besant. The programme of the Fabian Society would have immense charms for millions of sempstresses, factory girls, domestic servants, and working men's wives. It is entirely a matter of speculation; but I cannot help thinking that we should see Representatives of the strongest opinions sent to this House under such a suffrage. A Socialist party led by Ben Tillett and Mrs. Besant would not add to the dignity of this House, or make the government of our vast Empire an easy matter. In many political questions the truth may be said to lie at the bottom of a well. The superficial fallacy is far more attractive than the sound deductions of experience. Long controversies, like Free Trade, have been settled by hard and close argument protracted for a generation. How do you know that those settlements may not be reversed when submitted again to the verdict of a preponderating female vote, intensely and hopelessly ignorant of the issues involved. No one could be certain that a single result of centuries of experience, whether political, financial, or commercial, could stand the test of so entire a revolution of political power. Everything would be thrown afresh into the melting pot, and no human being could predict what would emerge from the chaldron. But my main objection to this and all similar Bills is my dread of its effects on the home life of the nation. I hope the House will weigh well the pregnant words of the right hon. Member for Midlothian—

"I am not without the fear lest, beginning with the State, we should eventually be found to have intruded into what is yet more fundamental and more sacred, the precinct of the family, and should dislocate or injuriously modify the relations of domestic life."

I believe those words are perfectly true, and they weigh more with me than all other objections combined. A peaceful and pure home life is the true foundation of all national well-being. That happy home life can only be found when wives and mothers make the family the centre of their being. All that tends to draw them from this is pernicious. The outside attractions are already too strong in this restless age. Why add to them enormously by pushing women into the maelstrom of politics? Already there is a dangerous disinclination to marriage among young men. The decline in the marriage rate is an ominous feature of the times. For the decade ending 1860 it was 16·9 per thousand annually, for the decade ending 1890 it was only 14·9, being a decline of twelve and a-half per cent. I much fear that under womanhood suffrage a still further decline will occur. Most men hate a noisy, turbulent, home life; they do not wish wives that claim equality, and fight for their rights. A silent distaste for marriage might be one of the results of what is falsely called the emancipation of women. I say that it is falsely so called, for it is really a diversion of women from their natural sphere of wifehood and motherhood. I believe the ultimate effect of pushing them in the maelstrom of politics will be to produce an increasing silent distaste for married life, with all the enormous evils accompanying it. I must apologise for having detained the House so long, and wish to say, in conclusion, that the vast majority of the women of this country do not want the franchise or care one pin about it; the active spirits of this movement are a mere handful; and it would be a strange thing, as Mr. Gladstone well shows in his weighty letter on this subject, were we to confer a franchise which most of the recipients did not value. Those women who care for politics are already free to exercise their gifts in every way they choose, except going to the poll. In no country are women accorded greater liberty than here, nowhere do they use the Press and the platform more freely. Some of them have splendid gifts; and no one grudges them a sphere for their use; but why should they insist on forcing the franchise on their unwilling sisters? A clever woman can wield a thousand times more influence by speech and writings than by a vote. Remember, that when once given it will be difficult for any woman to abstain; she will be canvassed incessantly, and get no peace till she pledges herself. And elections will be far more frequent in the future than in the past. In the United States they are, and it will be the same here as Democracy progresses. Fancy a wife receiving a crowd of canvassers in her husband's absence, and probably going with her political associates to one meeting, and her husband to another. How long would domestic life stand such a strain? I ask the House to pause before taking this terrible leap in the dark. It is the most revolutionary proposal of our time. If it prove a mistake it will be irretrievable; once given it cannot be reversed. In my judgment, it will be the commencement of national decline. In any case, it is a desperate experiment. We have too much at stake to make rash experiments. We are trustees for the greatest Empire the world ever saw, and we cannot afford to sap its foundations by reckless innovations. I beg to move the Bill be read this day six months.

Mr. S. Smith

SIR W. B. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North West), in seconding the Amendment, said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks upon perhaps the most important question that could possibly be brought before the House of Commons. I give all those who may advocate this measure every credit for the feelings which they may possess, believing, as they do, that they are simply going to do justice to the women of this country. But I must point out, and point out most distinctly, that before even those who are most anxious for the passing of this measure can arrive at a satisfactory conclusion, far more trouble should be taken to find out what the views and opinions of women are with regard to this question. My hon. Friend the Member for South Islington (Sir A. Rollit) introduced this Bill in a most moderate and fair speech, bringing forward all those arguments which lay within his reach, and stating many things which are no doubt absolutely correct, but at the same time leaving out a great number of things that he should have introduced. I will ask the House whether, supposing this Bill, which is called a moderate measure, is passed into law, they think they are going to stop there; and whether, having started the ball rolling, they will not find it increases its pace; and whether, before very long, we shall not only have all the widows and spinsters with votes, but whether we shall not find married women asking to have votes also, especially those with property? And when we get there, what will be the next thing? We have a right to look ahead, and not be guided by present circumstances alone. Our bounden duty is to see what the eventual consequences of a measure of this kind will be. Manhood suffrage may, and very likely will, be given at some future time, and we shall then find, in the case of this Bill being passed, that womanhood suffrage cannot be neglected. The result would be more women voters than men voters, and I should like to ask the House what the position of this great country would be if placed in that peculiar position? Well, Sir, I, for one, feel strongly on this question. I have talked to many ladies about it. I may also say I have taken part in nearly every Division upon the question. I am sorry to see that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) has gone out, because I was going to say that I have never listened to speeches that have impressed me more than the speeches of my right hon. and learned Friend. He has clearly pointed out that there is something far beyond what is contained in this small Bill now before us, and the difficulties and responsibilities of citizenship which a woman will acquire if she gets the franchise. What I should like to ask the House is, How can she perform all the duties and bear all the responsibilities men are called upon to undertake? I will venture to say that such can never be the case. Another thing I should like to point out is that those who feel that woman, having got the franchise, would not advocate coming into this House, are miserably mistaken, and even you, Mr. Speaker, might have an opponent in a lady, supposing women were admitted to this House. And I will venture to say that we should infinitely prefer to have one with your sound judgment and unbiased mind, and one whom we can most thoroughly trust. Although there may be some women masculine in all their ways, yet the majority of women—those loving and sympathetic women whom we all so much respect and admire—we have to protect, and I, for one, will not place upon them a burden they are unfit and unable to bear. I have said that womanhood suffrage will be asked for if manhood suffrage is given. Look at the meeting held last night. A Resolution was put forward there calling what is proposed to be granted by the Bill now before the House class legislation, and asking that it should be extended and that every woman should have a vote. Well, so long as I feel I am in the right, and that I am acting in the best interests of the country, I will never pander to these views from whomsoever they may come, and whatever form the Bill introducing them may take. I am afraid I am speaking strongly upon this question, but my excuse is that I feel strongly upon it. I am not going to detain the House at any great length, but I may say that I read with the greatest interest the letter of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), and I will take the liberty of reading one particular paragraph of that letter, because I think it is one we should bear in mind in considering this great question. The right hon. Gentleman says—

“There are very special reasons for circumspection in this particular case. There has never, within my knowledge, been a case in which the franchise has been extended to a large body of persons generally indifferent about receiving it. But here, in addition to a widespread indifference, there is on the part of large numbers of women who have considered the matter for themselves the most positive objection and strong disapprobation. Is it not clear to every unbiassed mind that before forcing on them what they conceive to be a fundamental change in their whole social function, that is to say, in their Providential calling, at least it should be ascertained that the womanly mind of the country, at present so largely strange to the subject, is in overwhelming proportion, and with deliberate purpose, set upon securing it?”

I will venture to say that my hon. Friend (Mr. S. Smith) who moved the rejection of this Bill was absolutely correct in stating that a large proportion of the women of this country are against receiving the franchise. Well, let us look for a moment at one point which has never been mentioned, but which I hope will be carefully considered. You are going to put women in antagonism with men. That is a very serious question to be borne in mind. You are going to put them in a relation of life which we have been taught should never exist. They are going to be put in the position of men, and very likely, if the wife is of a different opinion from her husband, the most unpleasant consequences may ensue in that particular family. In this House you shut the ladies up with a grill before them, and do not allow them to look at you if it can be helped, in order that your attention should not be distracted. Do you suppose for a moment that if the ladies got the vote they would not claim to be in the other Gallery, and indeed in every part of the House where strangers are now allowed to sit? These are small considerations for the moment, but they are considerations that deserve serious thought. But, Sir, there is something much more important than this. I should like to ask the House whether they think women would be the most fitting persons to manage this great Empire in times of danger, of anxiety, of panic, and of trouble of all sorts. Well, I will only say that, as far as I can judge, it would be most unwise, and a terrible thing to place them in that position. The real question before us does not require to be elaborated by me. It has been well elaborated by my hon. Friend who moved the rejection of this Bill. It will be unfair of me to go too much into this question, as there are many who wish to speak upon it, but there are three considerations which I think I might mention. The first is the social question, and I will venture to say this is the most important matter for every Member of this House to consider. Whether it will be for the happiness of women to have all the privileges some are asking for is not for me to say. But this much I will say: What would you think of a woman—and we all know there are women of that class—who would leave their families and all they hold most dear and sacred and go into the public arena, and make speeches, and take part in questions about which, perhaps, they know little or nothing? The second consideration is the Parliamentary question. That I certainly need not go into; but, believe me, they will never be satisfied if they do not have all the privileges we men now enjoy as Members of this House. But there is something beyond that, and that is the great constitutional question; and looking at that question as a whole, I say what can be more unwise than to place the future destinies of this country in their hands? The hon. Member (Mr. S. Smith) has said that with womanhood suffrage and manhood suffrage there would be 10,500,000 women with votes, as against only 9,500,000 of men voters. I will ask the House to consider what position this country would be in if at any great crisis, with, perhaps, peace and war trembling in the balance, we had to depend upon the vote of the women of this country. Well, Sir, I will not go any further into this question. I should like, however, to say that, taking women as a whole, we all know and acknowledge the useful work they are doing from one end of England to the other. Talking of that useful work, I am reminded of a story which I think I may mention, the lady being in favour of the Bill. A very pretty widow lady wrote to a Member of this House, and she said—

Sir W. B. Barttelot

"I cannot sit down and knit, and I do not like visiting the poor. I must do something, and, I think, therefore, your Bill will be a great help to me; and I should like to enter into that sort of life if this Bill will give me the opportunity."

That, I believe, is not the view of the large majority of the women of this country. They have other duties to perform, and they know it, and they perform them to the satisfaction of those to whom they are united. All I can say is that if you pass this Bill you will place women in a position for which they are unfitted, and I believe the effect would be most mischievous to women themselves.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. S. Smith.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(3.1.) Mr. WOODALL (Hanley): Those who, like myself, have had any responsibility for the Parliamentary conduct of this question must feel that great service has been rendered to it to-day by the very admirable manner in which it has been presented to the House by the hon. Member for South Islington (Sir A. Rollit). I offer him that acknowledgment the more readily, because, as he knows perfectly well, I have myself felt that after the disastrous defeat last Session, and because of the fact that this moribund Parliament is on the eve of Dissolution, the raising of the question at the present moment is so inopportune that I declined to take the responsibility of it. But as the question has been raised I shall have no hesitation in following my hon. Friend into the Lobby in support of the Second Reading. We are confronted by an extraordinary combination of forces against this Bill, and I cannot but feel that this is an acknowledgment of the meritorious position which has been reached, and as a testimony for which, perhaps, we ought to be most grateful that we have passed out of the region of abstract discussion, and that the question is now recognised by all parties concerned as a measure of practical politics. We have been reminded to-day of divisions and dissensions in the ranks of the supporters of woman suffrage, and reference has been more than once made to a particular meeting last night. I regret exceedingly that anything should have occurred to give force to the argument of dissension; but if we recollect previous movements for the enfranchisement of the people, I think it will be remembered that they have all been accompanied by trouble of a similar kind. Those of us who can remember the struggles for household suffrage know how we were then hampered, and our task made infinitely more difficult by the more extreme advocates of universal suffrage. I regard the Bill now before the House as excellently devised, amongst other reasons, from the fact that it is another step towards a universal register. In the making up of an ordinary register women are left on for local purposes, and subsequently eliminated from the register for Parliamentary purposes; and I say that in that respect, as in many others my hon. Friend has been happy in the form in which he has drafted this Bill. We have listened to an extremely interesting speech from the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), in the course of which he protested that it was unwise to prophesy; but surely no speech has ever been delivered in this House which was so full of prophecy and of dolorous prediction, and three times he warned us against taking a leap in the dark. As I listened to him it appeared as if he had been living for some time past upon the literature of the discussions on former measures of enfranchisement. The measure conferring the franchise upon the working men in the boroughs was opposed on both sides of the House. It was opposed on one side by the extreme friends of manhood suffrage because it did not go far enough; and by those who feared the measure and disliked it, it was opposed in the same sense in which my hon. Friend has spoken to-day as an indication of the danger of the thin edge of the wedge, as a step in the direction of manhood suffrage, from which I think we are as far off to-day as we were then. In the speech of the hon. Baronet who preceded me the arguments against this measure were stated with great force; but I am bound to say, with all respect, that none of these arguments are new. We are told, for instance, that many women would protest against a measure which would expose them to some inconvenience. My hon. Friend reminded the House that in the discussion with regard to the abolition of slavery it was contended that the negroes themselves did not desire the liberty which it was proposed to give them; and I think I can recollect the fact that when the proposals were made to confer the franchise upon the agricultural labourers we were assured over and over again that the franchise was undesirable and undesired by them. But we say that there are a large number of women who do desire it, who have petitioned for it, and have given every conceivable testimony of the earnestness of their desire; and why should they be denied that which we insist is right, because a certain number of others, to whom the privilege will be given, are indifferent or hostile? The women in whose interests we are speaking to-day might very well plead that they are not excused from any of the obligations of citizenship which they are capable of performing. We are warned not to intrude upon the delicacy and purity and refinement of women's lives. But when these arguments are used, it should be remembered how very large a proportion of women citizens have to struggle for their maintenance, to work for their livelihood, to labour under conditions of extreme hardship; they work even in factories, and they are forming associations and combinations very much as men do for the bettering of their condition and improvement of their remuneration. I was astonished to hear the terms in which my hon. Friend spoke in his reference to Mrs. Fawcett, who combated the assertion that what St. Paul wrote in his own day is of equal force now, and whose chief contention was against the apparent preference of the Apostle for celibacy as more honourable than marriage. I wish it were not inconvenient to submit some of the passages Mrs. Fawcett wrote; but perhaps it is sufficient that attention has been called to one of the most admirable and able arguments ever put forward on this question, and I venture to think that Mrs. Fawcett's contention is much stronger and much more practical than that of my hon. Friend. Amongst other things, St. Paul would not suffer women to teach. We have a large army of women workers who are invaluable in our educational work. We find that women are handicapped in every form of industry, in the matter of wages and remuneration. We find their access to the professions impeded by unfair conditions. They have been deprived and defrauded of their fair share of educational privileges and emoluments; and, in truth, what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) said twenty years ago is nearly as true to-day, that Parliament has dealt with women with less than justice. One of the advantages of the Motion now before the House is that it proposes to confer the franchise upon a class of electors who have gone through an apprenticeship. They certainly cannot be considered inexperienced, and yet I may recall the fact to the House that when we extended the franchise to the Irish cottiers and the agricultural labourers we gave the vote to a class who had had no experience at all in local voting. But here, on the other hand, we have the advantage of a trained electorate who have been in the habit for a number of years of going steadily, even annually, to the poll, and who probably know the way of marking their paper as well as any of their male friends. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, in a speech he made in 1870 or 1871, admitted that if the Ballot should be adopted by Parliament it would remove one of the most serious difficulties in the way of women taking part in popular elections. I venture to think that our experience of the Ballot Act is that it has introduced a quieter method of taking votes, and that it has fulfilled the expectations which were formed of it. The irony of the situation is that while so many hon. Members hesitate to confer the vote upon women they are willing to have them associated with them in the rough work of political contests, acting on electoral committees, undertaking the work of canvassing, and persuading men how they are to vote, and in the course of which women have displayed the very highest kind of political acumen, almost amounting to that of professional experts. I shall be very sorry to find, in such a Division as that we shall take to-day, the Members of my own political Party less strong in support of this measure than those who sit on the other side of the House. It has always been to the great honour of the Liberal Party to have initiated measures of enfranchisement; and recalling as we do the enormous advances which have been made in that direction, I confess it is a great disappointment that we have not the advantage of the concurrence and vote of the Member for Midlothian. Some of my friends seem to be alarmed at the zeal with which certain hon. Gentlemen opposite are supporting this particular measure of enfranchisement. I can only say, however, that I cannot reproach hon. Gentlemen opposite who may not be in the abstract in favour of the measure for supporting what they think may give them a tactical advantage, any more than I can approve hon. Members behind me who believe in the justice of the claim, but hesitate to grant it because it may possibly work against them. We admit that a considerable number of the women who would be enfranchised under this Bill have not yet been trained in practical politics; they are still in that respect only the equals of a very large number of the early voters, and in a large degree also of those who have been most recently enfranchised. I should like to ask those hon. Members who say that women do not desire a vote what has been the experience of the use made by women of the vote in municipal affairs? We find that they vote in something like the same proportion as the male voters. Some of my friends fear that the votes of women would be given against them; but cases can be quoted in many parts of the country where the Parliamentary Representative, for whom the women do not vote, is Conservative, whilst the Local Councils are largely Liberal. When one comes to analyse the great programme of Liberal measures on which the Liberal Party is now addressing itself to the country, I cannot but feel that many of those measures of social reform, such as the improvement of the dwellings of the poor, temperance reform, education, and the incidence of taxation are questions which appeal directly to women; and we shall have in them, when the time comes, invaluable allies in forwarding the progress of these measures. We are asking for this Bill for women themselves, not only in order that they may profit by it as the industrial classes and the agricultural labourers have done by the redressing of their grievances through possessing the franchise, but also we claim it for them because it would be an advantage to the whole community and to the best interests of humanity.

(3.20.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I am very reluctant to address the House, but the question is one of so much gravity that I feel bound to state the reasons for the opinions that I hold. Those opinions are far from being hostile to the claims of women to the fullest social equality and the freest entrance into all professions and occupations. Perhaps the House will permit me, in order to justify my own position, to say that it is more than 25 years since I began to work in the cause of women's education. I laboured for some years on behalf of the Married Women's Property Act; I had charge for three years of the Bill which ultimately became an Act for extending the rights of women to the guardianship of their children, and I have always advocated the claims of women to a much larger share of educational endowment in connection with schools and Universities. I should like to say that I do not at all associate myself with a good many of the arguments which are used against this measure, and I will say that I think the question whether the same number of women attain to as high intellectual excellence as men has nothing to do with the matter. I believe the intellectual capabilities of women are amply sufficient to put them for purposes of elections on a level with men. I am far from denying that there are many women fit for the franchise. Again, I desire altogether to repudiate the notion that this question cannot be viewed apart from Party consequences. If women have the franchise it must be given them as a measure of justice, irrespective of whether they will vote for Liberals or Tories. We must deal with this question rather more from the political than from the social point of view. It is the political interests of the country that we have to study. My first objection to the proposal is that women do not want the franchise. I am well aware that there are a good many ladies, active politicians, who do desire it. Some of them desire it because they think it will further political or social objects they have at heart—the cause of temperance for instance. Others go further, and look upon it as a step towards complete equality in all things. One lady went so far in conversation with a friend of mine as to say that what we want is to get rid of the English idea of a home. That is a very extreme expression, and I have no doubt goes far beyond the ideas of the advocates of this measure. But, as far as our own observation goes, I think the women who desire the franchise are a very small minority of the women of the country. We know that Petitions have been presented in favour of this measure, but how many women would be entitled to the franchise? We are dealing now with the enfranchisement of all the women of England, which is more than is contemplated by this measure. At present I suppose there are about eleven millions of women of mature age in this country who would be entitled to the franchise if we came down to womanhood suffrage. What proportion of these have petitioned this House? The percentage could hardly be expressed without going into decimal fractions. Let us take our own personal knowledge, because that is, after all, the only test we can apply to the matter. Let any hon. Member ask himself, out of those ladies whom he knows, how many are in favour of receiving the franchise, and I do not think he will find the number to be more than one in five; and I appeal in aid of my argument to the very remarkable protest published a few years ago in one of the monthly magazines, in which there appeared a number of names of women eminently intellectual, which, I think, far outweighs the authority, high as it is, of the intellectual women brought to bear on behalf of the proposition. Why did these women object to it? Because they thought it would injure their own position. No proof has been given that it will either benefit women or benefit the State. It is not for us to prove that the measure would work ill; it is for the supporters of the measure to prove that it would work some good; and that, I contend, they have utterly failed to do. I have listened to the arguments that have been used in support of the measure, and I find no sufficient ground except the appeal to the fact that women have already exercised the franchise in local affairs without injury to the community. But it is not alleged by my hon. Friend that they have exercised the franchise either with any benefit to the community or to themselves. What are the grounds upon which the franchise has usually been extended? They are mainly two. One was that the Constitution would be stronger and the Government more stable if we included the largest possible number of citizens within the boundaries of the Constitution. Nobody argues now that our policy will be any more firmly based if women were admitted to the Parliamentary franchise, or that there is any substantial discontent in connection with an existing disability on the part of women. Therefore, we may dismiss that at once. The other argument is that the interests of no class will be properly enforced and secured by legislation unless that class is represented. I take it, on the whole, that this is the strongest fact which is advanced by those who are in favour of the change; but my objection is that it rests upon the fallacy of assuming that women are a class. Women are not a class. Who are the women of this country? They are our mothers, our sisters, and our wives. They are not a class, but are members of the class to which their husbands, brothers, and sons belong, and their interests are the same. I think there has been some confusion in this matter. My hon. Friend referred just now to the agricultural labourers; they are a class indeed. They had interests which were not the same, and were generally supposed to be opposed to the interests of the farmers and the interests of the landlords; and no one can doubt that the interests of the agricultural labourers have been more carefully regarded by this Parliament than by any previous Parliament, because the labourers now have votes. But the wives and daughters and sisters of agricultural labourers do not form a distinct class, but are part of the same class. Whatever class you take, you will find that the interests of the women belonging to that class are substantially the same as the interests of the men. There is no such antagonism between men and women in this or any other country as makes women a distinct class. I may be told that there is some unjust legislation applied to women in which, their interests being divergent, the interests of women would be better looked after if they had the franchise. How much unjust legislation is there conceived in the interests of men as against the interests of women? There was a Bill before the House last night for making the English Law of Divorce the same as that of Scotland by establishing equality between the offences of men and women. I voted for that Bill, and I hope it will be passed. I conceive that some people will represent that as a case where the interests of men are opposed to those of women. I do not think it raises that issue. Questions of divorce are of the utmost possible difficulty, and are questions in which the interests of the whole community are involved, and they must not be considered as questions between men and women, and I do not believe Parliament looked upon them in that light. In Scotland that law has existed for 300 years, because the people believed it to be the fairest and most just law. Doubtless there is much to be said against the Divorce Law of the United States, but they have equality between men and women; and in no part of the United States, except Wyoming, do women enjoy the franchise. Therefore, it is not necessary for women to have the franchise to enjoy equal laws. There are other cognate questions, but when they are looked into as a whole they will be found to depend not on the antagonism of men and women, but on social questions of great difficulty on which the most ardent friends of women may hold very different opinions. Then there are some restrictions on the labour of women which do not apply to men, and some hon. Members complain bitterly of the restrictions imposed by legislation on the labour of women, and that they have no voice in determining these restrictions. But these restrictions are not imposed in the interests of men as against women, but in the interests of women themselves, and the feeling of women is divided upon them. So on that point you are not entitled to say that women are a class who require special representation. It is said that in some industrial matters women are exposed to greater disadvantages than men; they get lower wages in some trades and the men's Trade Unions have shown themselves hostile to and have oppressed the women's Trade Unions. I sincerely regret that, but these are matters which legislation cannot deal with; they depend upon the supply of labour and the amount of competition there is. I doubt, Mr.

Mr. Bryce

Speaker, if any considerable grievance is left which can be pointed to as a grievance between men and women which the political power of women is required to remedy. Those who rest their case on this point entirely ignore what has been done for women during the last 25 years. We have had the Married Women's Property Act, the Guardianship of Infants Act—not in so complete a form as I should like, being a believer in the absolute equality of the rights of father and mother—yet in a form to remove four-fifths of the grievances under which they suffered. They have a large share of endowments; they have been admitted to the teaching at the Universities; they are making their way in the professions, and their Trade Unions are making good their position in another direction. When reviewing what has been done in 25 years without the suffrage, I have great confidence that women will get the further privileges and advantages they desire without legislative power, and that the good feeling, justice, and sympathy which has helped them before will in the future have their perfect work. It is said that women would be socially elevated if engaged in political work with men. That is the opinion of my hon. Friend, but others hold a different opinion, and neither he nor I can prove it. So far from believing that women will benefit by politics, or politics be benefited by them, I believe politics will do them more harm than good. Political work is exposed to serious temptations, and there are certain things in the constitution of women which make them more liable to succumb to those temptations than men. I do not lay stress on that part of the argument; but if I am asked to state my opinion, I believe that the participation of women in voting, and that which must follow voting—sitting in this House, and the participation in all the active work of governing—will ultimately lead to a revolution in the social relations of the two sexes which will be not only momentous, but, so far as we can see, disastrous. I come now to the last ground on which I object to this Bill. It is a very bold experiment. It is recommended by certain abstract theories, by certain shadowy notions of benefits to be conferred on women politically, morally, and socially, by giving them a share in the political work of men. I notice that the common argument used is, Why not? We want something better than a "Why not" in this matter; we want a positive reason. All reforms in the franchise have been introduced to remedy or cure some existing defect in our system, and we have been able to apportion the change we made to the cure we desired to effect. Here we are asked to make this great change on pure abstract theory. There is nothing more pernicious in politics than abstract doctrine, and no worse habit can a country contract than that of yielding to abstract doctrine. Why should we make such an experiment, which can have no other effect than to double our constituencies? This little Bill only proposes to admit about a million women, but we know perfectly well the matter cannot stop there. Many ladies object to the Bill because it refuses the franchise to married women. Why should marriage be made a reason for not granting it? The enfranchisement of all women was supported by strong and even physical arguments at St. James's Hall last night. Shall we not be asked in any future extension of the franchise to men to extend it in like manner to women? We are within measurable distance of manhood suffrage, and I say that for this reason neither Party in the State is much concerned to oppose it; nobody can tell which Party may be benefited by it, and it is as likely as not to come from the Party opposite as from the Party to which I belong. I ask the House to assume that we are within measurable distance of manhood suffrage, and I submit that if you concede that you cannot refuse womanhood suffrage also. The distinction between the suffrage of men as men and the suffrage of women as women is a clear and well-marked distinction, and rests on rational grounds. If we once admit the principle of woman suffrage at all, we put ourselves on an inclined plane on which there is no stopping until we are landed in universal suffrage—manhood and womanhood alike. If I were asked whether I think woman suffrage would work well, and whether the eleven million adult women in this country—including, of course, domestic servants, who in some London constituencies would form the majority of the voters—are fitted for the franchise, I should reply to the question with an unqualified negative. I should say that in every class of the community women know less about politics than men do; and whatever class of the community my hon. Friend looks to, he will find that the women are immeasurably behind the men in political knowledge and interest. This is no disparagement of women; it results from the circumstances of their lives, in which circumstances the interests of their lives are profoundly bound up. How many of the ladies in our own circles are in the habit of reading the political intelligence in the newspapers, or of going to public meetings? We can in this way see the difference between the political capacity of men in any given class and the present political capacity of women in the same class. I may be told that the franchise will be an education, and that women will rise to the functions given to them. I think that argument has been pushed too far, and I could show instances in which it has completely broken down. Let that education make some progress before we try the experiment. The arguments I have put forward must have some weight, because they are found to prevail in all democratic parts of the world. There are other countries more democratic than ourselves; there is Switzerland, why does she not try it? Why does not democratic France try it? Our Colonies are democratic in the highest degree: why do they not try it? In any of the 44 States of America where there is the most unlimited facility for trying experiments—why has not somebody been trying the experiment? I shall probably be reminded of Wyoming. That is a very interesting little State; it has a population of 60,000 spread over an area nearly double that of England, and the biggest town has only 9,000 inhabitants. Wyoming has adopted woman suffrage, but I do not think that example—which may be compared with Ross and Cromartie—will have much weight with the House. There is another case more in point.

Mr. Bryce

The State of Washington had woman suffrage for about four years, but when it enacted its Constitution in 1889 it rejected woman suffrage by 35,000 to 16,000. Washington is a wealthy and flourishing State with a population of 350,000, and I think that example will have more weight on one side than Wyoming will have on the other. I feel some little doubt as to prediction in this matter; I do not associate myself with the predictions of my hon. Friend, for the results in changes of this kind are often totally unlike those we expect. I think every Member of the House will admit that as this experiment may probably result in the addition of eleven millions to the electorate it is a very large experiment, from which great results may be expected, and which nobody can say would not affect the government of the country. This is an experiment so large and bold that it ought to be tried by some other country first. I am bound to say we have made changes enough of late in the franchise. We enlarged it in 1867, and again in 1885; let us wait a little while before we make another change. There is, I believe, a very large and momentous change, which is dictated to us by the highest considerations of public policy, which we shall have to enter on in the next Parliament, and which will affect the Constitution of the three Kingdoms. We have the prospect of a period of passionate controversy over these proposals of change; and I cannot think, with this prospect before us, that this is a very happy time to embark on so bold an experiment. I will appeal even to those who are in favour of the proposal to let us wait until the weather is a little more settled before they ask us to launch out into an unknown sea.

(3.50.) MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): The hon. Gentleman has dissociated himself from the gloomy prophecies uttered by those who have preceded him in the Debate, and he does not join in the sheer terror with which the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) views the possibility of the destinies of this country being governed by ladies who prefer reading serious novels rather than the works of Jeremy Bentham, Juvenal, and John Stuart Mill, the rather strangely-assorted library which we are led to infer now guides the agricultural labourer in giving his vote. But at the end of his speech he was unable to refrain from adding a third to the gloomy prognostications to which we have been treated this afternoon. If he does not fear to be governed by women he is desperately afraid of any further move in the direction of reform. We have been much interested in watching the faces of some of his Colleagues while he preached the gospel of caution in sentences which, had the word peasant been substituted for the word woman, might well have been delivered in this House in 1832. The third argument was one of caution against any advance until somebody else had had the courage of their convictions. But I will leave that part of his speech. I do not see why on this occasion we should depart from the invariable usage of this House, and endeavour to frighten ourselves with the possible yet remote consequences of an action the immediate results of which we can gauge by reading this Bill. The second argument of the hon. Gentleman was that the franchise would rather do harm than good to the women who receive it. That he delivered, I believe, as a pious opinion. Other speakers had told us that, though women may take the active interest they do in politics, for them to have the privilege of bringing their opinions to bear on candidates would in some strange way degrade them and do away with that refinement and purity which we are glad to think they now possess. That is a pious opinion, and a pious opinion it must always remain. In other spheres of life—in hospital wards, for instance—women have shown a higher power than men to transcend the brutalities and degradations of their surroundings. I cannot, therefore, doubt that conferring the franchise on women may tend more to sweeten and elevate the atmosphere of political life than to work any degradation to the women who wield that power. The first argument, on which I wish more particularly to dwell, is that for this reform no such case of urgency or need has been made out as for every other reform which has receded it. It is said that the fallacy under which we are labouring is that women are a class. We are told that in past times the franchise has always been extended to a class to add stability to the State, or to defend the recipients from injury, but that since women are not a class they will add no stability to the State, and do not need any special protection. In connection with that I noted one sentence about the home. The hon. Gentleman said it would imperil home life as understood in England, and quoted as a sentiment that some ladies wished to see that home life materially altered. The hon. Gentleman must be aware that a great many women have no home, and can have no home; that the whole status of women—whether we like it or not—is altered; that the daughters, as well as the sons, have to seek employment and to be independent of the protection of their male relatives, which 60 or 100 years ago was doubtless extended to them in every case. It is for these women we appeal. We believe they constitute a class, and will continue to do so, until the same political privileges are extended to women as men now enjoy. Why are they a class? Because the last Reform Act gave a vote to every householder; that was substantially the object of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), who introduced the Bill. But from these householders a class was excluded, and thereby constituted the class of women householders. What we wish to do is to complete the right hon. Gentleman's measure; to approach nearer to that ideal which was his ideal, for in the speech in which he introduced the Bill he said—"If we endeavour to attain an ideal franchise we may be led to giving women suffrage or minority representation." And the right hon. Gentleman, when he contemplated an ideal franchise in 1884, a franchise providing in a certain sense for women suffrage and for the representation of minorities—why did he not then include women householders, as well as men householders? For a very good reason. He objected to what he called "deck-loading" his Bill. He declared that to admit that reform then would but imperil the measure; but does anybody say now when the ship has been sailing safely for eight years, when the cargo has been safely stowed all that time, there is any danger in our rounding off and completing the scheme of franchise by removing the disabilities which now lie upon women householders and upon women householders alone? What led the right hon. Gentleman to select householders as, broadly speaking, the political unit in this country? He did that because he laid it down that every citizen capable of using the vote for his own benefit and for the benefit of the country was entitled to have the vote; and he said that the class of householders although they might exclude some persons who had that capacity at any rate would include very few who had not that capacity. Therefore, if women householders are to be excluded and other householders are to be maintained, it can only be because they are incapable of exercising the vote for their own benefit, and for the benefit of the country. Why are they incapable? Why, we have had some argument advanced to prove that because women as the last resource, are possessed of less physical force than men, therefore they are not entitled to the vote. But physical force is not everything, even in the more ordinary and more obvious pursuits of life, and in such an elaborate and complicated example of society as the exercise of the franchise, physical force is nothing at all. Physical force, unless propelled by the emotions and directed by the mind, achieves nothing in politics; and even supposing the whole fabric of society were to crumble about our ears, physical force never will achieve any good unless it is impelled by the emotions and directed by the mind. And, therefore, if we do not find that women stand on a lower level in moral and intellectual capacity we are not entitled to reject their claim on the ground that physically they are weaker than men. There is another argument or another assertion of the incapacity of women—namely, that they lack judgment, that they are not such good judges of political questions as men are. Surely, when we use such an argument we exaggerate not only the ability but the demands made upon the ability of our fellow voters in this country. It needs no Solon to man or the other when only sented for choice; and even quality of judgment were re even if women possessed less than men that would not involve claim to the vote, for the as every reform has been not increase the power of discern to obtain a more accurate one standpoint, as to many points of view. Then we have consider whether the point these women who are independent earning their livelihood is view which we can afford That is the sole question for answer; and in reply to been argued that a great correlation has been passed for in recent years, and that pretty well off as they are arguments were familiar in of those who were opposed tension of the franchise cultural labourers. It was that the peasants of England happy palaces; and yet told that without allotments, and free education, will be no better than slaves. I think we both sides, attribute the of our eyes in England to the labourer has been given it not only possible but women householders had obtained a voice for their are not householders, that find, even in the legislative so kindly introduced and their behalf, that we had wrong feelings, missed their true lost in an evil day the guide we might have received at I concede that no doubt it was a good one in its day. the position of women in that not only tolerable but not time when the persons and women were not safe in England as the position of the serf tolerable but perhaps not days of feudal anarchy.

Mr. Wyndham

who are pursuing their occupation, whether as clerks or servants, would certainly in 99 cases out of 100 fall within the category of lodgers. Therefore, whatever force there may be in that argument it is entirely irrelevant to the measure now before the House. I confess I think both the House and the country ought to be congratulated that they have at last got an opportunity for determining with precision, as the Division to-day will enable us to do, whether this movement for the so-called enfranchisement of women has advanced or receded within the last ten years. Among all the social and political agitations of our time, it is a movement which has enjoyed, and does enjoy, exceptional advantages. It has been recommended to the country by names of great and just authority. It has been engineered and advertised with a skill and a pertinacity which show, to my mind at any rate, that we have among us at the present day women who, even without the vote, can in that department of political activity teach us many lessons, and whom we can teach very little. And while I do not wish in the least to disparage the genuine enthusiasm which is felt in some quarters for this Bill and for kindred schemes, I am bound to add that, so far as I can form a judgment, it has been very largely accepted not from conviction, but without mature examination or inquiry; in that spirit of flaccid fatalism by which people persuade themselves that a thing must come if only it is shouted for loud enough, if only it drapes and clothes itself in a democratic disguise. I trust that, after this afternoon, we shall examine this question on its merits. I observe in the Press and in speeches which have been made by outside supporters of this movement that they are approaching the Division to-day with unusual heaviness of heart. They are lamenting, and lamenting somewhat publicly, the backslidings and fallings-away of eminent persons who in bygone times used to vote for their Bill, and even advocated actively their cause. They know their own tactics best; but I confess I should not have thought that that was the best way of recommending their claims to the attention of the House and the country. But I suppose, when you have got no proselytes to boast of, the only thing you can do is to denounce the perverts whom you have lost—I say, when you have no proselytes to boast of. I must admit that I rather agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, that some of the arguments both for and against this measure were pitched in rather too high a key. So far from thinking that it will lead to the political millennium which has been described in such graceful and elaborate language by the hon. Member for Dover, I regard it, for reasons which I shall shortly state to the House, as upon the whole a mischievous and injurious scheme; but, on the other hand, I cannot associate myself with all the gloomy predictions which we hear from the hon. Member for Flintshire and others, who seem to imagine that we are passing a measure which will lead to a complete and speedy disintegration of the social fabric. I believe that for some years its consequences would be slight and almost imperceptible. But we have got to consider and to deal, not with its immediate results, but its ultimate tendency. It is admitted that we have in this matter no relevant experience to guide us. There is no civilised country in the world, living under conditions similar or even approximating to those which prevail in Great Britain, which has ever made the experiment of giving women the vote. As to the case dealt with by my hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, the solitary case of Wyoming in the western part of America, I need not repeat what has been already said by my hon. Friend. It will be sufficient to point out that it is impossible to argue seriously from the experience of a rudimentary community, with a sparse population thinly scattered over what they call in America “magnificent distances,” to the case of an ancient, complex, and highly organised society such as our own. Nor is more light to be gained from our experience of municipal elections. The women's vote there may have done good or harm. There is no evidence upon which to pronounce an opinion one way or the other; and the reason for that is that the result has been infinitesimal, either for good or for harm.

Mr. Asquith

No doubt there is a great and growing interest in these municipal contests; but we should be shutting our eyes to facts not to recognise that they are for the most part determined by local and personal considerations. The position of women voters in such contests is fundamentally different from what it would be if, through their instrumentality, an immense addition were made to the Parliamentary register, and if, when a great election was coming on, where every vote was a matter of almost national importance, this large body of untried and susceptible opinion were to be exposed to the influences, solicitation and pressure which cannot be withdrawn from a Parliamentary election. As we have no experience to guide us one way or the other, this change must be recommended on purely abstract grounds; and I do not think I am doing any injustice to the argument of the promoters of this Bill when I say that the main weight of their case rests on the assumption that in a democratic community such as ours, to exclude from the franchise any class of persons—especially persons who pay rates and possess property—is an indefensible anomaly, and a negation of the principle of popular representation. In other words, this Bill is recommended, as the hon. Member for Dover has said, as the logical development and completion of previous extensions of the suffrage. That is a position which, in its length and breadth, I entirely traverse. I assert that, in many essential particulars, the present proposal differs from all other previous enlargements of the franchise. In the first place, there has been no case hitherto in our constitutional experience where the franchise has been extended to a class without clear proof of demonstration being given that that class was, if not unanimously, at least in immensely preponderating numbers, and by an emphatic and clear voice demanding the boon that was to be offered. Now, what is the case in relation to women? It is true that there are some of the best women who are strongly in favour of women's suffrage. It is also true that there are some—I will not say a majority—of the best women who are strongly opposed to it.

But as to the great mass of the sex, the only thing that can be asserted with truth is that they are watching with languid and imperturbable indifference the struggle for their own emancipation. Again, there has been no previous extension of the suffrage except where it has been capable of proof, and where it has been proved, that the class excluded, and whom it was sought to admit, are persons capable of performing, and actually performing, the duties, bearing the burdens, and liable to the calls of active citizenship. That was the case with the £10 occupier, and with the urban and rural householder. They were all men liable to be called upon in the last resort for the defence of their country. They were men to whom, before they got the franchise, most positions of public emolument and trust were already open. They were men for whom the duty and the burden of carrying out, and being actively responsible for, the policy and legislation of the country, existed, and who had no voice in directing or deciding that policy. The hon. Gentleman opposite has spoken with contempt of the argument derived from physical force. But in the last resort, not living in an ideal state of things, the sanction of the law is force; and the law which rests on the opinion of a majority of voices, but which cannot summon to its aid, in case of difficulty and danger, the active assistance of the physical force of the country—that is a law which is made to be broken, and for the performance of which there is no practical or adequate security. I say, therefore, that you are asking for the first time for the introduction into the Constitution of a new and a privileged class. You are asking the House to give women a vote and the power to count head for head with men in the making of laws, in the determining of policy, in the supervision of national administration; and yet, at the same time, you are not casting upon them—because nature does not allow it—the burden which is cast upon every male citizen. I go now to a further point. I say that there is no case in which the franchise has been enlarged where it has not been shown that there was an actual grievance of which the excluded class had a right to complain. One of the worst effects of a limited suffrage has been its tendency to produce class legislation; and it can be shown to demonstration that every extension of the suffrage has led directly, as an almost immediate consequence, to the remedying of grievances and the redress of injustice, or to the opening out of new opportunities, in respect of the class which was then for the first time admitted to electoral rights. It was so in 1832, when the £10 occupier was admitted. That led to the opening of the Municipal Corporations and to Free Trade. It was so in 1867, when the urban householder was admitted. That led to the scheme of national education. It has been still more conspicuous in the case of the last enlargement. For there is no doubt that, but for the enfranchisement of the rural labourer, the country would never have heard of allotments or small holdings, or any part of that large and varied programme of social and agrarian reform which is to be spread before the eyes of the country voter at the next General Election. I have taken these instances for the purpose of challenging any hon. Member who may follow me to show that, in respect of sex, there is, or there has been for the last 30 years, a case of provable injustice in the legislation of the Imperial Parliament. The hon. Member for Aberdeen has dealt with the efforts of Parliament to put married and single women on the same footing in relation to contract and property, and to deal fairly between men and women with regard to the care of children. Is there any case now where the law weighs unfairly on women, and to which the attention of Parliament is not just as likely to be invoked successfully under the present suffrage as under a suffrage which would include women? I do not believe that any such case can be cited. It is the framers of this half-hearted and illogical Bill who are going to introduce distinctions between women and women, and between men and women. They are creating distinctions between women and women because, whereas a Parliament of men have removed every distinction and disability with respect to contract and ownership of property as between married and single women, the Movers of this Bill ask the House to affirm that a woman is perfectly qualified and competent by intelligence and experience to exercise a vote; but that the moment she approaches the altar she constructs for herself a disability which Parliament ought to recognise as thenceforward disqualifying her for a vote. That is not the only distinction; for while it is sought to enfranchise women for the particular and limited purpose of giving a Parliamentary vote, the Movers of this Bill at the same time refuse to take the next step—a step which, if their premises are right, would logically follow—and give them the capacity to sit in Parliament and hold important offices in the State. As the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian has pointed out, there is to be a new class of voters, privileged in one sense, as taking no part in the execution of the law, but in another sense disabled, because, while they may vote, they may not sit in the House of Commons or hold any public office. Now, that is a state of anomalies and inequalities which no Legislative Body, in which male opinion predominates, would ever be guilty of putting on the Statute Book. The question has been asked with considerable force, or at any rate with great superficial plausibility, whether the opponents of the Bill are prepared to assert that there are no women fit for the exercise of the franchise. They have been asked, by way of illustration, whether they will assert that a woman of genius like "George Eliot" was unfit for the vote which was given to her butler and her footman. But legislation must be framed to deal not with exceptions and portents, but with average cases and normal conditions; and when this question of fitness is raised it is incumbent to realise oneself, and to remind others, that fitness is a relative term. We have not only to ask whether the average woman is fit for the franchise, but, if I may use such an expression, whether the franchise is fit for her. I demur to the doctrine that women are unrepresented, or that they contribute nothing to our political life at the present moment. They contribute through their own appropriate agencies quite as much as men do. They contribute to it imagination, insight, sympathy, a host of moral and intellectual qualities, which are impossible to analyse and difficult to classify, but all of which have this common property—that they operate by personal influence, and not by associated or representative action, and that their natural sphere is not the turmoil and dust of politics, but the circle of social and domestic life. I do not say that if this measure were passed women would cease to exercise that influence; on the contrary, I believe they would still exercise it. But exactly to the extent to which the temptations offered by this measure were operative, in that degree they would tend to draw women from the sphere in which they are really powerful, and transplant them to another, where they would play a subordinate, a secondary, and an inappropriate part. I have heard this measure recommended in the name of democracy. But it is not a democratic measure. The doctrine of democracy demands that we should equalise where inequality exists among things fundamentally alike, but not that we should identify where things are fundamentally unlike. The inequalities which democracy requires that we should fight against and remove are the unearned privileges and the artificial distinction which man has made, and which man can unmake. They are not those indelible differences of faculty and function by which Nature herself has given diversity and richness to human society.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Asquith) has made such a very powerful speech that I feel considerable diffidence in rising to follow him; and especially so, as I am aware there are others who desire to join in the Debate. I will, however, briefly deal with one or two arguments he has advanced. My hon. Friend has said this will be an occasion for taking the measure of the progress of opinion on the subject dealt with by the Bill, and he seemed already to congratulate himself that the Division would show a dwindling force into its support. I do not inquire what result to the Bill the immediate decision may be. Whether it be for or against the Second Reading I shall receive the result with an equally unmoved temper, because I am persuaded that this measure, small as it is, is a part of the great movement which, in spite of all the rallying of the opposition, is bound to persevere, bound to go on, and must very soon prevail. The hon. Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith), referring to the extremely able speech of the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Wyndham), said that the hon. Member advanced a new argument against the Bill. The hon. Member for Dover referred to a large section of the women population of this country who, in consequence of the alteration of economic and social conditions, are now themselves forced to earn their own living and are more or less self-dependent, and he argued that was a class whose interests at least deserved consideration, and were liable to be forgotten by this Imperial Parliament so long as women were not represented by this Parliament. "But," says the hon. Member for Fife, "this Bill does not enfranchise women of that character." It is, however, a Bill which will undoubtedly enfranchise something like eight or nine hundred thousand women, most of them closely associated with the working women of whom I have spoken, and who will share their hopes, their fortunes, and know the particular wants of women, and the particular wants which require attention. It may be possible that not many of these working women who are self-dependent will get the franchise under this Bill, although I think there are more than the hon. Member for Fife suspects; but this Bill if passed will establish the great principle that women not only economically and socially but politically must be regarded as persons who are more or less capable of self-defence. And the influence which already operates to a large extent will, from the political operation of the vote, still more be strengthened and affirmed, so that woman in the future working out her own position and dependent upon her own exertions would fortify the Legislature and render it more responsible to her wants. It is said that women have no particular claim to protection at the hands of the Legislature. And it is curious to note that the class proposed to be enfranchised has always already received careful and full attention from the Legislature, but when it becomes enfranchised it is found that they have a considerable right to ask attention which up to that time has been neglected. During the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife, and his argument about women, and still more during the speech of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), who fears the terrors of what will happen if eleven million women are admitted to the franchise, I was reminded of an incident which occurred in this House during the Debate on the Household Suffrage Bill. Some Member on the Conservative side dilated on the frightful consequences which would come if the working classes were admitted to the franchise en masse, and the right hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), animated by a just resentment of that kind of argument, said—

“You talk of these persons as if they were wholly removed from us; as if they were persons who would vote against us. Are they not also flesh and blood?”

I venture to say of women—“Are they not flesh and blood?” Have not they got some sort of interest in what we do, in the laws we proclaim; are they not interested as the men are interested; and, from that point of view, are we to assume with the hon. Member for Flintshire that the final effect of this movement, if now adopted, will be to enfranchise eleven million enemies? It is said that women have no special merits, no special needs. But I would recommend the consideration of the action of women in connection with the representative institutions they could influence. Why, Sir, experience of the action of women as electors in representative assemblies has shown that women are very keenly interested in the character and the conduct of the persons they choose, and they are very keenly interested, too, in the kind of social legislation which affects the happiness of the home, and affects the relations of the wage earner of the home. And who can doubt that if women do get the vote, even under the limited form of this Bill, there will be a considerable addition to the strength of the demand for temperance legislation. As to the needs of women, I have had some small experience as a Member of the Labour Commission, which at least shows there are some wants of women which have not been hitherto attended to, and which I think would receive ampler attention, and more immediate attention, if women had an active voice in the Legislature. There is, for example, such a small matter as the inspection of factories. The mass of workers in the textile factories are women, not men; and they are universally agreed in their demand for women Inspectors, and yet they do not get women Inspectors to help them in any degree. I think if the Home Secretary had women voters at his back he would soon have to come to the House of Commons to ask for an increased inspectorate, and to allow women to inspect the conditions of work in our factories as well as men. Then there is the matter of educational endowment, which has also been referred to, and under which women have not had their fair share. There is also the question of the divorce laws, and the subject of the custody of children still remains in a most incomplete form, inflicting great injury and injustice on the mother. For example, a husband may treat his wife so badly that it is impossible for her to live with him, and yet if the wife separates from the husband the latter has complete control of the children. This Bill is a very narrow and simple Bill. It proposes to declare this—that a woman already entitled to the municipal vote or County Council vote should also be entitled to the Parliamentary vote. “Oh,” said the hon. and learned Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith), “You are creating a new class with exemptions; you do not give the vote to the married women.” We, however, take the situation as we find it. We do not cut out the married women at all. To the women who have a vote we give a vote; and if the hon. Member for Fife is so anxious to remove the disability of coverture there is no reason why he should not endeavour to do so. It is not we who have created the disability; we accept the disability simply as it stands, and we propose to extend the Parliamentary franchise in accordance with the conditions regulating the municipal franchise. I have said this is a very small measure in itself, but it is part of a great movement, which may be pregnant with important consequences. If adopted it will initiate this principle—that woman is a citizen as well as man, and that woman, self-dependent, has the same right to be represented in this House as man. And in that respect—aye, small as the matter is—I accept it as one dictated by common-sense and the plain principles of justice, and supported by the experience we have had; and whatever may be the ultimate consequences to which we are moving—I am not bold enough to prophecy—I am satisfied with the movement itself. No doubt we have gone through an age of the emancipation of women. From the time when men, in the plenitude of their strength, put to death the surplus female infants who were not wanted, because they were drags upon their action and limitation to their power, from that time to the present we have made great advances, and no doubt there are greater advances yet to be made. What may be the ultimate position of men and women in the society of two or three centuries hence I do not pretend to know. I am satisfied with this one step. This step is a simple one, and it is a just one. This one step is dictated to us by experience. This one step is recommended by the past. The future may take care of itself. This one step we are emboldened to take, because we see in it a step onward in the progress which has been made in the development of woman as a factor in our social system. I am, therefore, induced to give this Bill my support, and I hope the House will give it their support also when it goes to a Division.

*(4.48.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): It is some 21 years ago since I first took part in the discussion of a Bill somewhat similar to the one now before the House. Since then I have so often expressed my views upon the subject, that perhaps those who have followed the discussions on this question will feel I am unduly intruding myself upon their attention. But the sound of my right hon. Friend's voice has aroused me. He has recalled some struggles he and I have had on this subject before. Well, Sir, I admit the skill of his rhetoric and his power in debate have not afforded me many opportunities for answering him this evening. Yet, at the same time, there are some topics upon which an answer should be given. Mr. Speaker, my view is that my right hon. Friend has misconceived the nature of this Bill. I did not enjoy the opportunity of hearing the hon. Gentleman (Sir A. Rollit), who introduced this Bill, explain the strange and fantastic character of it, and the circumstances under which he felt justified in presenting it to this House. I have always understood that one of the principal grounds upon which this measure is based is that women shall be placed upon an equality with men. Some have said they support the Bill because men have been hostile to women. Both the grounds I believe to be untenable. If the hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill is asking for the political equality of women with men, will he, in his reply, state why he shrank from approaching that subject? My right hon. Friend says he supports the Bill in order that redress for women's grievances may be obtained. If so, why does he shrink from Parliamentary equality? The attempted explanation of my right hon. Friend is one entirely devoid of logic. By this Bill it is sought to give to Parliamentary women—if I may use the term—a municipal franchise, while we retain to men the Parliamentary franchise. The municipal franchise proceeds on certain grounds. In dealing with municipal matters you have to deal essentially with the imposition of rates, and the application of those rates. Therefore, in the municipal franchise you have to deal wholly with a rateable franchise. You will not extend it beyond the rateable franchise. You will not allow the 40s. freeholder to vote in the municipality, nor will you allow the lodger franchise to be extended to the municipal voter, nor will you allow the service voter to vote for one and the same reason—that is, because they are not rated. Thus, when in 1888 the House had to deal with this question in the Local Government Bill, they always kept the distinction clear between the Parliamentary voter and the municipal voter with a rating franchise. The promoters of this Bill, whilst extending the Parliamentary franchise to women, yet keep her within the municipal rating area, and refuse to give her the 40s. freehold vote, the lodger vote, or the service vote. You are thus erring exactly in the wrong direction. I listened just now to the eloquent language of the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Wyndham), who drew a picture of a lonely woman, with no one to guide her, without a husband to protect her, and with no paternal roof to cover her. So she wandered into—where? Lodgings, I presume. That homeless lady, the particular friend of the hon. Member, is thus shut out from the franchise of this Bill. You refuse to give Parliamentary equality to that homeless person who needs a vote to redress her grievances, for the simple reason that you are endeavouring, as a matter of tactics, to say that what you are going to give is to be given because it has been given before without any consideration of the reasonableness or the unreasonableness of the different qualifications now existing. Now, Sir, one word more with regard to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney). He says that although this is but a partial measure, he accepts it, and does not care to what it will lead. Should that be the view of any man who desires to take part in public life—that he will look only to the immediate effect of a particular Bill, without considering whether its natural result must be for good or for evil? I say the man who sets the stone rolling at the summit of the hill is bound to see what effect will be produced in the valley. And, Sir, as has been pointed out in the course of this Debate, the House is bound to contemplate the time when, in consequence of the spread of education and the increase of intelligence and political knowledge, which must be factors in the progress of this country, we shall put on one side those evidences of fitness by property qualifications, and ask that every man shall have a vote. I do not contemplate whether the time will be sooner or later when that condition of affairs is reached; but it is in that direction the political forces of the time are drifting. When that day is reached, no one will hear of this timid shrinking from political equality. If you give universal suffrage to men, with the admission by this Bill that you are seeking to obtain Parliamentary equality, then you must give it also to women. Well, Sir, we have 900,000 more females than males in the United Kingdom. That is the proportion of the two sexes, I do not say of adults, and we should, consequently, have a large majority of female voters over male voters. What I ask is, are you prepared to say that the destinies of this country shall be governed and controlled by that preponderating majority? Are you prepared to say that this majority shall have the power of directing a policy which, as my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith) has pointed out, they never can be called upon to carry out? Mr. Speaker, there is also one practical view of this question. What do our politics consist of? Men may be eloquent upon subjects, especially Imperial subjects, from an abstract or theoretical point of view; but in the main our politics are composed of practical subjects, and they must depend for their decision upon practical knowledge. We hear discussed here questions affecting the control of the Army, and we listen to military men on the subject. Naval questions are also discussed, and we have the opinions of naval men to guide us. Commercial life is represented by commercial men, and even legal matters are represented by lawyers. Now, upon none of these subjects can we receive practical assistance from any woman, she not being a member of any of these professions. Yet it is proposed to give the preponderating influence to women, who are unskilled from lack of practical knowledge, while at the polling booth, as well as in Parliament, women will be allowed to take the same share as men in deliberating on and determining questions of which they are totally ignorant. The House must look to the consequences of such a proposal as this. Logically hon. Members must accept the proposition that if women had equal power of voting with men they should also have a seat in Parliament, and should have the privilege of filling many offices. That is the view of the supporters of this Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Had-dington (Mr. Haldane) has introduced a Bill in which he proposes to make it almost a duty of the State to appoint a woman as Archbishop of Canterbury, Prime Minister, and Commander-in-Chief, whether she be competent or not. If the principle of Parliamentary equality is established, all the positions of this House must be open for women, even that of being a "Whip," and I have no doubt she would administer that office against us with great efficiency. The result is that we should be regarded as a nation of women instead of a nation of men. Sir, there is one argument I should have shrunk from if it had not been for some remarks that fell from my right hon. Friend, (Mr. Courtney), and that is as to the fitness of women for this measure. It has been said that one becomes personal if he states that a woman is more unfit than a man to exercise the franchise; but I confess, if I were not afraid of the consequences, I should be disposed to express that view strongly. My right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin (Mr. Courtney) on one occasion made a statement on which I may rely in confirmation of my opinion that women are not so fit as men to exercise the franchise. This is the opinion of my right hon. Friend the Member for Bodmin, who, in moving the introduction of a Bill, said:—

Sir H. James

"The narrowness of women's range of ideas is absolutely deleterious in its effects."

My right hon. Friend went on—

"Our earliest lessons are received from them. Are they not often lessons that we have afterwards to unlearn with great difficulty? We often find a difficulty in freeing ourselves from them, and in emancipating ourselves from the errors of our earliest days."

My right hon. Friend has passed on from the days of infancy to what I hope are happier days.

MR. COURTNEY: Read a little further.

*SIR H. JAMES: Certainly. I am about to follow my right hon. Friend into his later life. Again, he says—

"Of those who enter into the married relation of life, how constantly does it happen that the man's freedom of intellect is hampered, and he is incapable of imparting to the woman with whom so much of his life is spent any conception of his thoughts."

It is true my right hon. Friend uttered these words many years ago, but he goes on to say—

"He does not find in her any companionship, but, on the contrary, a drag upon his aspirations."

My right hon. Friend, referring to women individually, declared that, speaking on behalf of his country, he is willing to give to such women, who have taught us these evil lessons in our youth, the franchise. But at what expense? What time of probation is a woman to go through, and what price are we to pay for this school of treatment? It is at the expense of the Government of this country that this instruction will be given: the nursery will be the polling booth, and the schoolroom this House of Commons. But does it occur to him that there are men who take a different view of the subject, and who believe that those first lessons have not been deleterious to us. There are men who believe that such instincts for good as they have they received from their mother's teaching. It may be that teaching was not always logical, but to that teaching of the child could, oftentimes, be traced all the lessons for good that were applied in manhood. And these women who gave these lessons are the women who never had the vote, and who did not spend their time on the platforms of the country. Upon the second subject on which my right hon. Friend touched, the subject of married life, it certainly is a strange anomaly that whilst my right hon. Friend wishes to teach the mother and make her a better mother he would not extend the benefit of the lesson to the wife. He will allow the drag to continue on an imaginary husband; he will still allow the deleterious effect of the narrow range of ideas to affect a learned husband. If it is the intention of my right hon. Friend to give married women the vote let him say so; let the Mover of this Bill say so. Do not let them take advantage of us by saying that this is a simple and harmless measure, and then say that they are willing to give the vote to married women. If this Bill passes, the natural consequence must be that the married women must have a vote as well as the unmarried women. It is an absurdity otherwise. Whilst men have their professions women have only one, and that is marriage, and yet we are asked to impose a disability upon her as soon as she is successful. The last time I referred to this subject there was great dissent from the view that a woman's destiny in life was controlled by the profession of marriage, and I believe an echo of that dissent was heard from a source which is invisible, though it may be audible (the Ladies Gallery). But my foundation for the statement is that when Lord Herschell brought a Bill into this House to abolish actions for breach of promise of marriage the women of England, under the handwriting of Miss Lydia Becker, protested against the measure, because they said that women's profession, in which she alone could succeed, was marriage, and they objected that the right to bring an action for breach of promise of marriage should be taken away from them. What is the absurdity of this proposition? The timid supporters of this measure would allow a woman, who has been unsuccessful in her profession, to retain the vote; but the one who has gifts and qualities of mind to attract, and becomes successful in that which those ladies termed their profession, the moment she attains the crown she is to be deprived, by her success, of the vote, and disfranchisement is to follow. These are, indeed, strange arguments upon which to found a Bill which is to appeal to the intelligence and logic of men. We are no enemies of women who seek to prevent their inroads into public life. It was a gifted woman who said that the woman who rocks the cradle rules the world, and she who has the power in the homes of England, she who can influence men, she who can, notwithstanding my right hon. Friend's view, enter into the thoughts and guide the actions of men, is a power irresistible in its force. But if she seeks for another mode of action, if she is asking through her advocates for a different power, she must pay the cost of it by losing those influences which proceed from her very inability to enter into the contentions and rough struggles of public life. Whenever she does this she will yield up real forces and influences for good, she will fail to maintain her higher power when she struggles against man, but she will not fail in producing influences which will be destructive and disastrous to the very best hopes and interests of this country.

(5.10.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I should not have thought it necessary or entirely for the convenience of the Debate to have intervened if it were not that I find myself in opposition to the greater number of friends of mine who sit on these Benches, and with whom I am in the habit of acting in the closest agreement on all political matters; and knowing, also, that the opinions I am about to express are not shared by a large number of gentlemen who sit on this side of the House, I am unwilling to give a vote without very briefly stating some of the reasons which influence me in taking that course. The Debate has been an extremely able and interesting one, and the burden of the attack upon the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for South Islington has been borne by two Gentlemen sitting on the other side of the House, the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, and the hon. Member for Fife. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury, though he made a very able and interesting speech, laboured under two or three disadvantages. He laboured, amongst other things, under the disadvantage of having replied to a speech which he had not heard, and he attacked my hon. Friend who moved the Second Reading of this Bill on grounds which he never advanced at all. He supposed that this Bill was introduced in order to produce absolute equality and symmetry in the position of men and women in regard to politics. My hon. Friend would have been guilty of the greatest absurdity if he had advanced arguments of that kind in support of a Bill which, on the very face of it, does not profess to produce that equality. And many of those who are going to support this Bill do not support it on any ground of abstract right or equality, or on any abstract right at all. We support it for practical reasons which I will endeavour shortly to state to the House. Another argument put forward by the Member for Bury was, if he will permit me to say so, fundamentally inconsistent with the arguments advanced by the Member for Fife. The right hon. Gentleman drew a picture of what the condition of England would be when eleven million women had a vote, and only ten million men had a vote. He said—

“You will then be under the subjection of women. Women will control the policy of this country, and we shall be a nation of women and children.”

That implies that the women are all going to vote on one side and the men on the other, and that women would outvote the men. In other words, it pre-supposes that there is a class distinction and cleavage between women and men in matters political which would put all the women on one side and all the men on the other. That is altogether and wholly inconsistent with the argument of the Member for Fife, who told us that to consider this question as one of class distinction was altogether to misconceive the conditions of modern society. Turning from the right hon. Gentleman to the learned Gentleman behind him (Mr. Asquith), he gave us a very good Tory speech of the old tune upon the question of Reform Bills in general, and, in fact, there has been an unexpected vein of Toryism, or, at all events, what is described as Toryism by Liberal critics, in the speeches of gentlemen who sit on the opposite Benches on this question. As the Member for Dover (Mr. Wyndham) has pointed out, had the words “agricultural labourer” been substituted for “women,” some of those speeches were such as might have been heard from the small knot of gentlemen who were opposed to the Reform Bill of 1885, and precisely the same arguments have been used with respect to the incompetence of the class to be admitted, and as to the interests of that class having been hitherto fully considered. These are arguments with which we are all familiar, and have been familiar from time immemorial, the only difference being that they have much less justification in the present case than, I think, they had on previous Reform Bills. The hon. and learned Gentleman mentioned three points in which this particular alteration of the franchise differed from any previous alteration of the franchise that had ever been proposed. He said that in every previous case the class to be enfranchised had shown their very great anxiety to obtain the franchise, and that in this case no such anxiety had been shown. I differ from the hon. and learned Gentleman. I think those who wished to be enfranchised have used the only methods they could use in the matter. That is to say, they have expressed their desire to obtain the vote on platforms and by public meetings, and by whatever other means were open to them. The hon. Gentleman appears to think that there was a widespread desire on the part of agricultural labourers to claim the franchise in 1885. I do not believe the desire existed, and I am sure it was never demonstrated. I am sure it could not be demonstrated; there were no means of demonstrating it except the means which have been used in the present case—platform speeches, public meetings, petitions, votes, and resolutions. Then, Sir, the second point on which the hon. Gentleman says this Reform Bill differs from every other Reform Bill is that the class to be enfranchised on this occasion are not capable of performing the duties of active citizenship as the classes which were previously enfranchised had been. What duties? So far as I know, the main one to which the hon. Gentleman alluded is that of fighting for their country. That duty cannot be performed with efficiency by gentlemen over 60 years of age. At all events, I am not aware that the severest conscription in any country requires any person over 60 years of age to serve under any contingency whatever, and yet I do not think the hon. and learned Gentleman desires to disfranchise them. The posse comitatus does not go out and fight the enemy; the enemy is fought by the disciplined Forces of the country, and the chief duty of the ordinary citizen consists not in shouldering a rifle and going off to the frontier; it consists in paying the bill. That is a duty which the people desired to be enfranchised by this Bill can perform; it is a duty they are obliged to perform; and the mere fact that they cannot enrol themselves in Volunteer Corps does not appear to be an adequate reason for refusing them some control over the policy by which the foreign relations of our country are conducted and means of defence are to be secured. The third argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman was that in the case of every previous Reform Bill there had been a grievance of the class to be enfranchised which required to be redressed, and which could not, and would not, be redressed until the franchise was given to them, and he pointed out with great force that in connection with each of the great Reform Bills the grievances of the enfranchised class came to the front. But when did they come to the front? Did they come to the front before the enfranchised class received the vote or after it? The hon. and learned Gentleman has only to consider the list of cases he has himself given, and he will discover that it was only after the vote was conferred that it was discovered that this House really had a function to perform in modifying legislation in this country in the interests of the new class of voters. Now, Sir, leaving the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and referring to the general course of the Debate, there is one argument which has been used which I desire directly to traverse. We have been told that to encourage women to take an active part in politics is degrading to the sex, and that received the assent of an hon. Friend of mine below the Gangway. It has received the assent of almost every speaker to-day. I should think myself grossly inconsistent and most ungrateful if I supported that argument in this House, for I have myself taken the chair at Primrose League meetings, and urged to the best of my ability the women of this country to take a share in politics, and to do their best in their various localities to support the principles which I believe to be sound in the interests of the country. After that, to come down to the House and say I have asked these women to do that which degrades them appears to me to be most absurd. I do not know much about these matters, but I understand that there are other Associations of the kind of which women are members, and I have heard of a Liberal-Unionist Women's Association; I do not know if it has given my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bury (Sir H. James) that valuable assistance they are always ready to give. There is also, I think, a Women's Liberal Federation. I daresay the learned Member for Fife (Mr. Asquith) has taken part in its meetings.

MR. ASQUITH: Never.

MR. McLAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): Mrs. Gladstone is president.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The House will understand that I do not wish to introduce personal questions at all, but I think I may take it that every section in this House is only too glad to use the services of women when they think they can profit by them, and it does not lie in the mouths of any of us to say that taking a part in framing the policy of the Empire is degrading to the sex. In any other department of human thought than politics such an argument would be described by no milder word than "cant." Cant it undoubtedly is. The argument which appealed most, I am convinced, to those who oppose this Bill is not an objection of this character, but the conviction—the ill-founded conviction, I think—that it must necessarily carry with it, as what they call a logical consequence, the result that women must have a seat in this House, in the Cabinet, and should in all respects, so far as public offices are concerned, be placed on an equality with men. I do not believe a word of that argument. I can quite agree that it is very difficult to stop in such a course—to fix an arbitrary point and say there you will stop—if the arguments for going further are precisely those which made you travel thus far. The point, therefore, for us to consider is, Can the arguments that are brought forward in favour of this Bill be also brought forward in favour of women having a seat in this House? No, Sir; they cannot. There is no fundamental distinction between giving women the right to vote in municipal affairs and giving them the right to vote in Imperial affairs, and yet, though there is no distinction, you have resisted the change for 20 years, and, according to the hon. Member for Fife, you are going to resist it for 20 years more. How easy it would be to resist a change which involved a new departure—a new principle! Everybody must assent to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith) that women cannot engage on an equality with men in a large number of professions. They cannot; and I quite agree that the profession of politics is one of these. In my opinion women could not with advantage to themselves, or to the community, take part in the labours of a great deliberative Assembly like this. That is a reason for not giving them a seat in this House, but is it a reason for not giving them an opportunity of expressing an opinion and giving a vote every four or five years? I do not know what the average duration of Parliament has been during the last 100 years, but I think in the future it will probably not be so long. If you want to prevent further progress you ought to stop at a point where defence is possible, but at the present point logical defence is not possible. Therefore, those who are greatly moved by logical consistency should, I think, move on till they come to a point where further change could be successfully resisted. The Debate has now almost reached its natural termination, and all I will say is that the matter which surprises me in this Debate is the position taken up by hon. Gentlemen opposite. I understand that part of their programme is a great alteration of the franchise, in spite of what fell from the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce). I understand one plank of the Newcastle platform was One Man One Vote. When that is brought forward I believe we shall have all the old flesh-and-blood arguments urged again, all the old arguments for political liberty, and the whole train of commonplaces again thrust before us for our acceptance, by which each successive change in the franchise has been accepted, and yet the very gentlemen who say they are going to bring forward that programme at this moment absolutely refuse to admit the validity of a single one of these arguments when they are directed towards enfranchising not the least worthy class of the community, but what I believe to be one of the wealthiest classes. You will give a vote to a man who contributes nothing to taxation but what he pays on his beer, while you refuse enfranchisement to a woman because she is a woman, whatever her contribution to the State may be. She has sufficient ability to look after lighting and paving, but is not so fitted to look after the interests of the Empire as a man who cannot point out on the map the parts of the world of which that Empire is composed. I think from all I can hear that this Bill is not likely to be successful on this occasion; but, depend upon it, if any further alteration of the franchise is brought forward as a practical measure, this question will again arise, menacing and ripe for solution, and it will not be possible for this House to set it aside as a mere speculative plan advocated by a body of faddists. Then you will have to deal with the problem of woman suffrage, and to deal with it in a complete fashion.

Question put.

(5.30.) The House divided:—Ayes 152; Noes 175.—(Div. List, No. 86.)

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for six months.

ACCESS TO MOUNTAINS (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 213.) SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Objection taken.

(5.45) Mr. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S): May I ask the Lord Advocate to be good enough to state what the objections to this Bill are? The Government accepted the Resolution, and some effect should be given to it. I have not yet heard what it is in this particular Bill the Government take exception to.

(5.45) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E): The hon. Gentleman can hardly expect us to enter into debatable matter at this hour. To attempt to state the objections now would be an unusual course, and is one not to be recommended.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

WOMEN'S DISABILITIES REMOVAL
BILL.—(No. 176.)

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Seventh Report brought up, and read: to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

MOTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PRO-VISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.

On Motion of The Attorney General for Ireland, Bill to confirm two Provisional Orders made by the Local Government Board for Ireland, under "The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878," relating to the purchase of land for burial grounds in the Poor Law Union of Sligo, ordered to be brought in by The Attorney General for Ireland and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 298.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PRO-VISIONAL ORDER (No. 3) BILL.

On Motion of The Attorney General for Ireland, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Local Government Board for Ireland confirming an improvement scheme, under Part I. of "The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890," for the City of Belfast, ordered to be brought in by The Attorney General for Ireland and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 299.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PRO-
VISIONAL ORDER (NO. 4) BILL

On Motion of The Attorney General for Ireland, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Local Government Board for Ireland, under "The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878," relating to the improvement of streets in the Township of Blackrock, ordered to be brought in by The Attorney General for Ireland and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 300.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND) PRO-VISIONAL ORDER (NO. 5) BILL.

On Motion of The Attorney General for Ireland, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Local Government Board for Ireland, under "The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878," relating to the purchase of land for waterworks in the Poor Law Union of Tullamore, ordered to be brought in by The Attorney General for Ireland and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 301.]

POOR LAW GUARDIANS (IRELAND) (QUALIFICATION OF WOMEN) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. T. W. Russell, Bill to enable Women to act as Poor Law Guardians in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Lea, Mr. Thomas Dickson, and Mr. Johnson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 302.]

EIGHT HOURS (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. David Randell, Bill to restrict the Hours of Labour in all trades and industries to Eight per day, ordered to be brought in by Mr. David Randell, Mr. William Abraham (Rhondda), and Mr. Cuninghame Graham.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 303.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

(5.50.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps it will be convenient for me now to state that on Friday I propose to move that Morning Sittings be taken on Tuesdays and Fridays for Government Business, as was the case before Easter. That, I think, was an arrangement which commended itself to the House at that time.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Has the Business for to-morrow been finally decided upon?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; the Clergy Discipline Bill will be the first Order, and the India Councils Bill will have the second place.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when he proposes to bring on the Irish Local Government Bill, or has it been definitely abandoned?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Oh, no; I hope to bring on the Bill as soon as we have advanced a stage with the Small Holdings Bill.

DR. TANNER: Within the next fortnight?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That depends upon the rapidity with which we proceed with Public Business.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 28th April, 1892.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to indisposition.

Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL (GENERAL POWERS) BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time.

* (3.20.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I rise to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months, and I am compelled to take that course, instead of moving an Instruction to omit the 7th clause, by reason of the notice which has suddenly appeared on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Whitmore), of which I do not in the least complain, to refer the Bill to a Special or Hybrid Committee. It is quite obvious that if the Motion of my hon. Friend were carried, and this Bill were referred to a Hybrid Committee it would be quite impossible, indeed, it would be ridiculous for me to move an Instruction to omit a clause to consider which the Committee would be appointed. Therefore, I have to resort to the more old-fashioned method of moving the rejection of the Motion for Second Reading, believing that that course is more conformable to the practice and usage of the House than moving an Instruction to the Committee, which, I understand, is regarded by the authorities of the House as an inconvenient innovation. I have no reluctance in moving the rejection of the Bill on the Second Reading, because, although it contains certain plans for minor improvements in London, the main purport and object of the Bill is to construct a bridge at the end of Cromwell Road, and I consider that the manner in which it is proposed to pay for that is so objectionable, and that it raises a principle so important and far-reaching, that I feel amply justified in asking the House to reject the Second Reading. This Bill proposes the construction of a bridge from the end of Cromwell Road across the West Kensington line of railway, debouching at North End Road in Fulham parish. The cost of the bridge is estimated at £63,000, and it is proposed to pay the cost by dividing it as follows:—One-third to be paid by the County Council, one-third by the Vestry of Fulham, and the remaining third is to be divided among the owners, lessees, and occupiers of houses and lands within a radius of half a mile of the western side of the bridge in such proportionate amounts as the London County Council may by provisional award direct. Now, the only parts of Clause 7 with which I think it necessary to trouble the House are those Sub-sections which relate to the apportionment of the contributions. Sub-section 3 provides that in the award regard shall be had to the greater or less degree of benefit which, in the opinion of the Council and arbitrator will be derived by any lands or premises from the improvement. Where the property to be charged shall have been unoccupied, or in the occupation of the freeholder, at the passing of the Act the Improvement Rate shall begin to be payable from the 1st April or 1st October as may be next ensuing after the date of the award. Sub-section 3 provides that—

(3) In the Award regard shall be had to the greater or less degree of benefit which in the opinion of the Council or the Arbitrator will be derived by any lands or premises from the Improvement.

(4) Where the property to be charged shall have been unoccupied or in the occupation of the Freeholder at the passing of this Act the Improvement Rate shall begin to be payable from the first day of April or October, as the case may be, next ensuing after the date of the Award and shall be payable thereafter half-yearly until redeemed as hereinafter provided.

(5) In determining the Improvement Rate to be paid in respect of lands and premises which shall not have been in the occupation of the Freeholder at the passing of this Act the Council may take into consideration all the circumstances of the case and in particular may consider the several interests in such land and premises, and the time at which they severally expire and may make the commencement of such Improvement Rate dependent on the expiration of any term of years or other period or on the happening of any event as they shall deem fair and equitable and may apportion the incidence of such Improvement Rate as between the freehold and any other estate or interest in the lands and premises during the period of any existing term of years for which the same is held.

Where the commencement of such rate is deferred compound interest at the rate of 4 per centum per annum on the amount of the Capital Charge shall be reckoned from the first day of April or October, as the case may be, next ensuing after the date of the Award up to the date of the commencement of the rate and the amount of the Capital Charge on the premises shall be increased accordingly, and the Improvement Rate payable in respect of the premises shall thereafter be a sum equal to four per centum per annum on the amount of the charge as increased. But such charge and rate may nevertheless be redeemed at any time, whether before or after the date fixed for the commencement of the rate, on payment as hereafter provided of the Capital Charge with the interest and all arrears, if any, of the rate."

Now, I do not know if the House has followed the provisions of the clause, but it certainly is a very remarkable clause because it provides for the accumulation of the fixed charge or debt against the falling in of the reversion. A reversion may not fall in for twenty or forty, or sixty or eighty years, but if the London County Council think fit that the cost of this improvement should be borne by the freeholder they may direct the capital value of this charge, this debt, to remain accumulating for sixty, seventy or eighty years at compound interest until the freeholder comes into his reversion when he will not only be called upon to pay the cost of the improvement but the accumulation of interest at the compound rate of 4 per cent. Now, this clause contains two entire novelties and changes in the law of local taxation. It proposes in the first place to tax unoccupied property, and it proposes in the second place to tax the capital value of one kind of property for a debt which is directed to be accumulated against the reversion, and so is a tax on the capital value of that reversion. Now, it may be right to tax unoccupied premises; I do not think it is because profitable occupation has hitherto been the basis of our law of rating. ("No!") I make that statement, and I challenge the hon. Gentleman to disprove it. Profitable occupation has hitherto been the basis of our law of rating. It may be right to tax the capital value of premises; I do not think it is, because income is a matter of fact, while capital value must always be more or less a matter of speculation, and taxation of capital value in America has led to the perpetration of iniquity and of fraud, of rascality and roguery, and has led to a great deal of litigation. But whether it be right or whether it be wrong to tax unoccupied property, whether it be right or whether it be wrong to tax the capital value of a reversion, these are undisputably fundamental and far-reaching changes in the law of local taxation, which, if once sanctioned and applied in the case of London, will inevitably be applied to all lands and all houses and property by every Local Authority throughout the Kingdom. If these changes in the general law of taxation are to be made, if this proposal for revolutionising the law of rating—for it is little less—is to be made, it ought not to be made in a clause of a Private Bill introduced to the House by a private irresponsible Member, but it ought to be made in a Public Bill brought in by the Government of the day, to be debated by the whole House. There is another reason why we ought not to pass this Bill, that is, that this Bill is not the measure, is not the plan, recommended to the London County Council by the Improvements Committee, the Committee having charge of Metropolitan Improvements. The Improvements Committee recommended a very different plan to the London County Council. The Improvements Committee recommended that the contribution of owners' property of one-third of the cost should be paid by way of an improvement rate in one sum or by instalments within 25 years from the completion of the bridge, and it provided also that the owners should be the persons entitled to the rack-rent on the expiration of the existing tenancy. Now, I think there might be a good deal said in favour of that proposition, because it might be argued that the burden would fall on the persons deriving the immediate benefit from the improvement. It might also be argued that the whole of the debt would be extinguished, while the advantage of the improvement would be appreciated. But this proposal was submitted to the Parliamentary Committee of the London County Council, which is under the malign influence of Mr. Charles Harrison, and this Committee altered the proposal in the manner now embodied in this Bill, by which it is proposed to lay a perpetual rent-charge upon property—redeemable it is true—but no one but the ground landlord will find it to his advantage to do so until the property reverts to him. Thus it will continue payable until the long leases fall in, it may be in seventy or eighty years when the value of the improvement may, owing to local changes, have become wholly exhausted or may have disappeared. The estate that will be at present affected by the improvement is long leasehold; and if this is so, it is the owner of the rack-rents who will benefit by the increased rental value of the property; but he will escape by a trifling payment of 4 per cent. on the charge or rate, leaving the capital sum to be ultimately redeemed by the ground landlord. I have heard it stated that nine years ago the owners were willing to make this bridge at their own cost, and very likely they were, but that was before the building estate was covered by houses. Very likely before the houses were built owners were willing to make the bridge, for they could have recouped themselves out of the rents and out of the prices at which they would have sold their leases, but that is a very different thing from imposing a charge of this kind on the owner of the reversion after he has parted with his lease and sold the houses he has built. I do not know whether the owners agree to this proposal or not; they ought not to be allowed to agree. No body of individuals outside this House ought to be allowed to change the general law of the country by an arrangement with the London County Council. Though I am obliged to move the rejection of this Bill I am anxious that this bridge should be made, for I believe it will be a real improvement. I am anxious that the bridge should be made because it will connect South Kensington with West Kensington, "that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveller returns," except perhaps my hon. Friend the Member for Fulham (Mr. Fisher). So anxious am I to have the bridge made that I take it on myself to suggest to the London County Council that the method by which the Northumberland Avenue, the Shaftesbury Avenue, the Embankment, Southwark Street, the Charing Cross Road, and Queen Victoria Street were made by their predecessors ought to be good enough for them, I mean that method well known as the method of recoupment by which the local improvement authority obtains power to purchase compulsorily more land and houses than are wanted for the improvement and then recoups itself by the re-sale of this property at an enhanced value. Why, Northumberland Avenue was made by this principle of recoupment not only without cost, but actually at a profit to the ratepayers, and Parliament Street is now about to be widened by a commercial company at a cost of a million sterling upon this well-understood principle of recoupment. The fact is all these urban improvements are in the nature of land speculations, and the Local Authority has no right to drag individual owners and occupiers into such speculations without their consent and then to throw upon them the cost of possible failure. If the improvement succeeds, if the land speculation is a success, the improving authority can recoup itself by re-sale at enhanced value; but if it fails the authority which makes it should be responsible and should pay the cost of the failure. With regard to the Vestry of Fulham, which, if recoupment were adopted as the method of making the bridge, would have to pay half instead of one-third of the cost of construction, I would suggest to the Vestry that it could recoup itself by an enhanced assessment of property which will result if the improvement be a success. We have a quinquennial valuation of house property in London, and the assessment is already a year old. I suppose this bridge cannot be made for at least two years, therefore, within a year or two of the completion of the bridge the Vestry of Fulham will have ample opportunity of recouping itself by an enhanced assessment, and by the increased rates which would be leviable over the area if it be true that this bridge is going to enhance the value of the property in question. But we are told by the friends of "betterment" that the law of "betterment" obtains in America. It is very curious how our modern Progressives are always running across the Atlantic to draw examples from America, from the country which of all countries that are governed by the Anglo-Saxon race is governed most corruptly and most tyrannically. But, Sir, there are three points about this law of "betterment" as it obtains in America we should do well to remember. In the first place, by the American law of "betterment" there is compensation for damage as well as contribution towards the cost of improvement; in the second place, by the American law of "betterment" there is an appeal to a Court of Law from the award of the Local Authority; and, in the third place, by an organic law of the United States no Municipality or State can make a law which affects existing contracts relating to land. But in this Bill there is no provision for compensation for damage. If you do not acquire the adjacent property there will inevitably be depreciation as well as enhancement of value, and if you do not buy you ought to compensate. In the second place, there is in this Bill no appeal to a Court of Law, the common law right of every Englishman whose property is affected. True, there is an appeal to an arbitrator, but an arbitrator appointed by the London County Council the very Body from whose award the appeal is made.

Mr. Baumann

MR. LAWSON: Subject to the approval of the Local Government Board.

*MR. BAUMANN: Subject to the approval of the Local Government Board I admit. Now, is "betterment" a success in the United States? The opinion of very many American lawyers is hostile to the law of "betterment." When a project was before the House in 1890 with regard to the widening of the Strand, a very eminent Boston lawyer who has written many luminous and voluminous works on American law, wrote to a firm of solicitors in London, and from this letter I may quote briefly. Mr. Stimson, this eminent New England lawyer, said—

"My own opinion is that such laws while they are defensible in special cases, are very dangerous, and should be more restricted with us than they are. I will close with brief examples of things that happen. A client of mine had a small estate not five miles from New York City, an estate of ten acres in the centre of a village inhabited chiefly by Irish and German labourers, who for the sake of obtaining employment voted for and finally constructed a road through the estate. When this was done the estate was so injured that no tenant will take it since. The compensation awarded to my friend in this case was two thousand dollars for the land demanded, but a 'betterment' tax was imposed of nearly double that sum for benefit done to the estate, and so this landowner had to pay $1,500 for the privilege of having his country seat ruined."

Then here is another instance—

"The City of Boston, a year or two ago, established a public park of nearly a hundred acres, four miles from the centre of the town, and imposed a 'betterment' tax on all the surrounding landowners. Without a single exception, so far as I know, every landowner refused payment and brought suits to contest the validity of the demand. There is an old equity doctrine," says Mr. Stimson, "about improving a man out of his estate, and there are a great many modern American doctrines which it would be well for you not to imitate."

The fact is, so long as you stick to definite areas of taxation, you are safe, but when once you come to lay an exceptional tax upon individuals, and particularly when taxes are levied by a popular body, elected, as unfortunately all our Local Bodies are now, upon political Party lines, you inevitably get on to most dangerous ground, and it is almost impossible to avoid jobbery, corruption, injustice, and consequent discontent. Now, I know very well what my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board will say. He will support the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Chelsea, and he will say, in veiled Parliamentary language, this Bill is so bad, so monstrous, that I know no Committee will ever pass it, therefore let us push the responsibility of rejecting it on to the shoulders of a Select Committee. He will say it is a question of evidence that can only be tried upstairs. Sir, it is not a question of evidence. This is a question of principle which goes to the root of our whole system of local taxation. Does this House approve or does it not approve of taxing unoccupied property? Does this House approve or does it not approve of taxing the capital value of a particular kind of property? Sir, this is a question so important as affecting the local taxation of the whole country that it ought not to be withdrawn from the judgment of the House. This House ought not to shirk, and still less ought the Conservative Party to shirk, from pronouncing an opinion on a principle of such cardinal importance and far-reaching operation. Besides, I must remind the House that a very similar Bill was introduced in 1890, in regard to the widening of the Strand. That Bill was referred to a Select Hybrid Committee, and that Committee reported against the "betterment" clause, and rejected it. Now, I want to know are we always, year after year, to go on sending "betterment" Bills to Select Committees until some fine day we get a Committee which will pass this most mischievous principle? My apology is sincere when I say I feel I have already made a very large draft upon the patience of the House, and, therefore, I will say nothing in conclusion about the character of the Local Authority into whose hands this novel and dangerous weapon of taxation is proposed to be intrusted. The hostility and animus of the London County Council against ground landlords are too well known to require any emphasis. Verily I say if the last London County Council chastised us with whips, the present Council chastises us with scorpions, and its little finger is thicker than the loins of its predecessor. The Bill raises questions of principle sufficiently important to be submitted to the judgment of the House, and to justify my appeal to my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board who is naturally loth to admit the unfortunate results of his own experiment in local government for London. I venture to appeal from the Local Government Board to other Members of a Conservative Government; I venture to appeal to the Conservative Party to assist me in rejecting the Second Reading of a Bill which proposes to revolutionise the law of local taxation, and to adopt a method which, whatever may be the effect in this particular instance, can only, in the long run, lead to corruption, jobbery, injustice, and consequently to wide-spread and well-grounded discontent.

Mr. Baumann

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Bau-mann.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(3.50.) SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): Although I saw the notice of the Motion of the hon. Member to move the rejection of the Bill, I thought it better to reserve what I had to say until I had heard the grounds upon which the hon. Member would make his Motion, because the Bill deals with various matters, and I was anxious to save the time of the House by addressing myself only to those points the hon. Member raised. In the first place let me say we are prepared to accept the Motion of the hon. Member for Chelsea that the Bill should be referred to a Hybrid Committee. The hon. Member says he does not hesitate to move the rejection of the Bill, but I am surprised at the statement, because, be it remembered, although this particular clause to which he takes exception, as he says, refers to an expenditure of £63,000, the Bill itself deals with much larger amounts, and with many other Metropolitan improvements, to which, I understand, he does not object, and yet all these are to be thrown out because the hon. Member has so little confidence in his own principles that he declines to allow Clause 7 to be examined by a Committee upstairs. What is the proposal upon which the hon. Member has occupied the time of the House, and upon which he has desecrated with so much warmth? Formerly, the cost of improvements were divided between the Metropolitan Board and the district affected. But this is a very rude mode of assessing the expenditure. Take this particular instance of the Cromwell Road Bridge. It lies at the extreme corner of the parish of Fulham, quite at the extremity of the parish. Under the old system the cost of constructing such a bridge would have been divided between the Metropolis as a whole and the parish of Fulham; but we have thought, and the Representatives of the parish of Fulham have thought, and the owners of property near the proposed bridge have thought, that a fair division of the expenditure would be that the Metropolis as a whole should pay a third, that the parish of Fulham should pay a third, and that the property immediately adjoining should pay the remaining third. Surely that is a fair proposal, or, at any rate, it is not so unfair that this House should refuse to allow a Committee to inquire into and report upon it. Nobody in the district, so far as I know, objects to it. The London County Council propose it, the parish of Fulham supports it, and it has the support of the landowners interested. I do not know of a single objection by anyone interested to what is contained in the clause. My hon. Friend stands up for the rights of property, but he says that owners of property, who are willing to contribute one-third of the cost of the improvement because they believe it will greatly benefit their property, should not be allowed to make that contribution. Defending the rights of property, he yet refuses to owners the right to contribute to the expense of an improvement in which they are very much interested, which they are anxious to see carried out, and which they believe will materially improve the value of their property. Then the hon. Member referred to the mode in which he would have the improvement carried out. He would have the London County Council buy up large portions of property around, covering itself for this expenditure by resales of land at increased values. But he also says he does not wish the London County Council to go into land speculations. And I should be sorry to see the London County Council engaging in land speculations—and I can say for my colleagues that we have no desire to go into speculations of any kind, and I think it would be a very unfortunate thing for the ratepayers if, following the advice of the hon. Gentleman, we were to embark on land speculation of this kind. Then my hon. Friend went into details of cases of what, in legal opinion from America, were regarded as hardships, and so they may have been; but I confess I do not see the bearing of this correspondence on the question before us. The cases were of a very different character to this, and I do not see their relevancy to the proposals which we ask the House to submit to examination by a Committee. Then the hon. Gentleman proceeded to forecast the speech the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board will make, but I shall be very much surprised if his anticipations are fulfilled. I believe my right hon. Friend will support the proposal to send the Bill to a Hybrid Committee, and we have no objection to it. Then the hon. Member went on to say that the proposal in the Bill is similar to that which was made in the Strand Improvement Bill, and that the principle of "betterment" had been rejected by the Committee which sat on the latter Bill. Now, I do not admit that that was the case. I have here the Report of that Committee, and I find that the Committee said of the particular clause—

Sir J. Lubbock

"We are of opinion that no probable increase of value would accrue from the carrying out of the proposed improvement."

I do not think the Committee conveyed an opinion that the principle of "betterment" was unfair and ought not to be carried out, but that in the particular case they did not think there would be any improvement in value. In another part of their Report the Committee emphasised this, for they said—

"In the present case the Committee are of opinion that the principle of 'betterment' could not be applied to the improvements proposed by the Bill."

The Committee did not, therefore, lay down any principle as to the whole question of "betterment" in the abstract. Now, the hon. Member appears to suppose that the principle of "betterment" is entirely new, but that is not altogether the case. The Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes referred to it in a paragraph of their Report. They said—

"Betterment is the principle that rates should be levied in a higher measure upon the property which derives a distinct and direct advantage from an improvement, instead of on the community generally, who have only the advantage of the general amelioration in the health of the district."

Among the evidence taken by the Royal Commission was that of Mr. Hugh Owen, the Permanent Secretary to the Local Government Board. He was asked if he approved of the principle of "betterment," and his reply was, "Yes, I think it is quite equitable." There is high authority, therefore, for saying that there is nothing unfair in the proposal. The present Secretary to the Admiralty (Mr. Forwood), who speaks with great authority on such a question, also gave evidence, and expressed his opinion that "on the whole the principle worked admirably in America." We do not, however, wish to ask the House to assent on the Second Reading of this Bill to the principle of "betterment." All we say is—"Here is an improvement approved of by the London County Council, approved of by the Parish of Fulham, and approved of by the landowners of the district as being a useful improvement. We all agree to pay for it in thirds, and all we ask the House of Commons is to allow this Bill to go to a Committee upstairs, there to be examined and dealt with." This is no new principle. Betterment has been already admitted by the law of the land. Moreover, the change in our policy as to improvements has been forced on us. A few years ago the Metropolitan Board of Works removed Putney Bridge, re-building it some distance up the river, and the occupier of a public-house adjacent to the bridge, who alleged that injury had been done to the business of his house, claimed, and was allowed, £1,000 damages, because his property had been deteriorated in value. At any rate, my hon. Friend should have objected to Clause 7, and not to the whole Bill. This is a large Bill, containing a number of clauses dealing with a variety of matters affecting the Metropolis; and the hon. Member attacks one single clause in the Bill, a clause which if carried into law would not really be so terrible in its character as the hon. Member supposes. Under these circumstances, I hope the House will allow this Bill to be read a second time and go to a Hybrid Committee.

*(4.4.) MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I think the course taken by the right hon. Baronet, in proposing that this Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, points to a plan of operations which the London County Council adopts on the introduction of legislation into this House. It adopts the method of wrapping up a new insidious principle in an incidental clause in a Bill which includes, undoubtedly, many other useful objects, and thinks that because of these useful objects which the House would desire to pass, it will not throw out the whole Bill merely on account of this insidious principle which is incidentally introduced. Let the London County Council instruct its able Representative the right hon. Baronet to bring in a Public Bill announcing this new principle of so-called betterment, which may be discussed fairly as a public measure, as a matter of public principle, in this House; and then this House will not present any objection to endorsing any measure of utility which they might wish it to pass. I offer no apology, therefore, for opposing this Bill on the Second Reading, because I submit with great respect to the House that this principle is one which interferes so much with all the precedents and all the practice of this House, that the House as a whole ought to pronounce judgment; and if this Bill be thrown out because of the objection to this obnoxious clause, the London County Council will have only themselves to thank for linking most useful measures with an obnoxious clause. What is this obnoxious principle founded upon? It is founded—I was going to say upon sentiment, but it is founded upon something more than sentiment. I concede that where a public improvement is carried out which brings a special advantage to some particular person's property, that that particular property should be willing to bear some proportion of the cost which the public incurred by that improvement. But what does this Bill do? It says in advance:—"We are going to make a certain public improvement, and we are going to assume long before the fact is proved or ascertained—and perhaps the fact will never be ascertained—we are going to assume that because your property lies in a geometrical figure described by a pair of compasses in a shape such as no property in this country has been found—that is in the form of a circle—that because your property lies within the magic circle described by a pair of compasses on paper, it shall be assumed that this public improvement is going to be an improvement to your property, and you shall by this Bill in advance be decreed to submit to a charge upon your property for a certain sum of money." I say that that is not only a breach of all good principle and practice, but it is a subversion of justice in not deciding upon facts, but upon probabilities. And these probabilities are to be decided by a body as to whose judicial faculties we can form an estimate by what they have done with regard to theatres and places of amusement—a body who devote their attention not to the performance of their legitimate business, but to extra-judicial or rather extra-political discussions upon matters which were never committed to their charge.

SIR J. LUBBOCK: Will the hon. Gentleman cite some cases?

*MR. KIMBER: If we were to review all the political matters discussed in the hall of the London County Council, we should not be able to get through all the Business on the Order Paper to-day. I appeal to the right hon. Baronet himself whether he has not been obliged to call his Council to order when the discussion tended in a political direction? At all events, his predecessor did; and I think it is a matter of public notoriety that that body, to which I allude with all respect, have diverged from those duties committed to their charge by Act of Parliament for the purpose of going into matters which were not committed to them. The right hon. Baronet denounces recoupment as a speculation. But I think that that is a most legitimate kind of speculation, if we may call it so, that results in profit to the rate-payers, and does great credit to the Metropolis. But if they do not wish to speculate for a profit, or fear a loss, there is another plan suggested and well known, and adopted by various authorities; and that is by offering to give public contractors the execution of the work in question, and the power of doing that which, as in the case of Parliament Street, volunteers have come forward to do—viz., make an improvement, depending for its cost and their remuneration upon the improved value of the property. That is a most fair way, for this reason: that the charge is imposed upon the persons who get increment. It is fair and just because the incidence of the burden falls in the right place. The Bill certainly gives the right of appeal to a certain peculiar tribunal already remarked upon against the improper inclusion of a man's property; but why erect a tribunal of this absurd character, the nominee of the Council from whose decision the appeal is to be made?

SIR J. LUBBOCK: It is to be approved by the Local Government Board.

*MR. KIMBER: That does not make the tribunal a fair one, or make the tribunal otherwise than the nominee of the Council. But the question of all others which ought to be, but is not allowed to be, decided, even by this tribunal, is whether the private owner's property has been actually bettered or not. That is the main point which is to be determined—and it is prejudged. It is to be decided and decreed by the Bill, that because that man's property is included within a certain circular line, therefore it has been bettered. It may be a slum and not a frontage at all; and very frequently actual damage may be done to a man's property, yet there is no appeal, no place for a man of that kind to come forward; he is not to be allowed to go into the consideration of the question, that instead of being bettered he may be worsened. But the right hon. Baronet says he may appeal to the law of the land. I utterly deny that. If you pass this Bill, I deny that any man within that so-called "betterment" area would have any right under the Lands Clauses Act, or any other Act on the Statute Book, to go for compensation. There is one other point to remember as regards betterment. If property has been increased in value, an increased assessment of rates falls upon all the interests in that property; because the amount of the assessment upon the property regulates the terms upon which a landlord and his immediate lessee settle the conditions of their lease; also the terms upon which the lessee grants a tenancy to the occupier, and the price which the occupier pays for a house.

*(4.20.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I do not think anyone can be surprised that my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham has considered it necessary to draw attention to this extremely important clause in the Bill. And he objects, so far as I understand the matter, to the principle embodied in this clause, and also to the details of the clause. My hon. Friend who has just sat down has taken exception to the London County Council having introduced this clause into a Bill dealing with a large number of other questions, and by so doing making it necessary for the House either to reject a measure of which they approve or to accept something of which they disapprove. There is undoubtedly a good deal of point in that contention in a general way; but in regard to this particular question, I would submit to my hon. Friend that it is hardly a question that can be dealt with in the general way that he supposes, but must accommodate itself in every case to the particular work to which it is desired to apply this principle. I would point out to my hon. Friend that, so far as the principle of "betterment" is concerned, it is not one that is absolutely novel. I have seen it stated in the document which has been published on behalf of the London County Council that this was a doctrine recognised with regard to private street improvements. No doubt that is so, but it is hardly a parallel case. The "betterment" principle with regard to private improvements is simply this:—where it is the duty of an individual to do a certain thing with regard to his property, then he has to pay for doing it. That of course is a very different principle from what is embodied in this Bill. But a very much better case, and one, I think, which is in some respect a parallel case, is the case of the housing of the working classes. Although the principle is embodied in the Act of 1890, it was not a new principle even then, but merely a re-enactment of the law which existed previously. At any rate it was not new in 1890. As my hon. Friend knows, the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, was a consolidating and amending Act. It was the consolidation portion that included this particular question of "betterment." If a house or houses are to be removed for the purpose of giving light and air to the houses remaining, then an arbitrator may be called in to say what remaining houses are to be benefited, and to assess the sum which ought to be paid on behalf of these houses. The money is originally payable by the occupier of the house, who has a right to claim re-payment of three-fourths of the whole from the owner of the house. That seems to me to be a much nearer parallel than the other one of which I have spoken, because it embodies this doctrine, that if in a particular case by means of a public improvement houses are benefited, then the property benefited shall pay a proportion of the cost.

MR. KIMBER: That is not determined beforehand.

*MR. RITCHIE: Yes; but that is another question. There are two questions involved—one the principle, and the other how the details are to be carried out; and, for my own part, I must say that I see nothing unjust or unfair in the principle of "betterment." As I have said, it is embodied in the existing law, but undoubtedly the great difficulty in the matter is how to apportion equitably any "betterment" made; and I do not think that difficulty has yet been solved. Certainly a proposal of the same kind made by the London County Council in 1890 was regarded by the Committee to which it was referred as altogether unsatisfactory; and the result of the deliberations of that Committee was to lead them to believe that, although the principle might be sound, the application of it as proposed in that Bill would be altogether unfair, unjust, and injurious. That being so, I cannot join with my hon. Friend in endeavouring to throw out a measure of an extremely useful and important character simply because there is, with regard to a particular improvement in this Bill, the principle of "betterment" involved. But I am bound to agree with much that has been said by my hon. Friend as to the details and the machinery by which it is sought to apply this principle. I think myself that it will be extremely difficult to prove before a Committee that an area of half-a-mile from one end of a bridge is going to be benefited by a particular improvement. Then, again, with regard to the proposal that it shall be in the power of the London County Council to defer all payment until the property falls into the hands of the ground landlord—whether fifty, or eighty, or ninety years hence—and to charge the amount at compound interest to the owner when the lease falls in—I think that proposal seems to me to have an element of very possible injustice. It is not impossible that so-called improvements of the present day might not be improvements 30 or 40 years hence. I do not say that with regard to this bridge, which I think would very likely be an improvement. If we were to assess at the present time the amount of additional value which is to be given to a particular property at £100, then at the end of 99 years it is quite possible, when the property fell into the hands of the ground landlord, that the £100 would be multiplied by 50, and the amount would be £5,000. That is a proposition which it would be very difficult to defend before a Committee of the House of Commons. Another objection is, that you are making the present ratepayer pay for the benefit of the future ratepayer. It would be the ratepayer of 30, 40, 50, or 60 years hence who will be coming into the accumulated sum, and I think that would be unfair and unjust to the present ratepayer. There are other objections which might be raised against the machinery of the Bill, including the serving of notices on the owners of property who, under the provisions, may have no opportunity of raising objections. In my opinion, the strongest objection is that with regard to the appointment of arbitrator. I would ask my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London whether the London County Council would be prepared to accept an arbitrator selected by the person who objected? Of course, they would not. These are important details, and I think it extremely desirable that they should be investigated by a Committee of the House of Commons. I should hope and expect that the result of such an inquiry would be that they would be greatly modified. Under the circumstances, I trust the House will allow the Bill to be read a second time. I understand that my hon. Friend is willing for it to go before a Hybrid Committee. It would have been impossible for me to have accepted it unless he had been so willing, but the matter is one of such vital importance that it should be most carefully considered.

Mr. Ritchie

(4.38.) MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I understand that the hon. Member for Peckham is not willing to withdraw his Motion. He said he was following an old-fashioned method of dealing with a Private Bill. I do not know whose fashion he is following. It has not been the fashion of this House in dealing with Bills brought up by Corporations, because one clause is objected to, to throw out the whole Bill and to injure the community to a large extent. The hon. Gentleman who seconded the Motion once again indulged the House with the view of the London County Council which is taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite. He said the members of the Council mainly occupied their time in political discussions; but my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Lubbock) said that during his tenure of office he had never had occasion to call the members to order for such a cause, or to object to any desertion of their administrative work. I am afraid that some of the hon. Gentlemen opposite have been avenging themselves upon the present County Council on account of the election. I can quite understand the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board saying that they had some right to object to the details of the 7th clause. Even if the Committee took the view of the right hon. Gentleman, there would not be much difficulty in substituting an ordinary arbitrator for the arbitrator proposed to be appointed under the Bill. But when he said he objected to details, he took the version given of them by the hon. Gentleman opposite. The hon. Member for Peckham (Mr. Baumann) said that the freeholder might possibly have to pay the whole capital charge; but if he looks again to the Bill, he will find there is no obligation to pay the capital charge. It has also been suggested as a great hardship that the original lessee would have to pay a sum down if he continued as before, but he will simply have to pay as his predecessors have done years before. There is no suggestion that he would have to pay down the whole sum. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board has stated that, so far as the principle of betterment is concerned, it is a fair one. I would supplement that by saying that it is not only in the Artisans' Dwellings Act, but there is also a Betterment Clause of much the same kind as that imposed by this Bill in the Act of Parliament passed in 1834 authorising the construction of what is called the Bayswater sewer. In that case one moiety of the cost was

"defrayed out of the Land Revenue of the Crown in consideration of the advantages which the property of the Crown derived by diversion of the soil drainage from the Serpentine River."

Then, again, in the Consolidation of Sewers Act of 1848, a special sewer rate is charged on such occupiers as benefit by the work. The same may be said with regard to the Thames River Prevention of Floods Act, 1879—a special charge is levied for special benefit. That is the whole principle of betterment, and it has been embodied in every Act that has been passed since 1855. In the Metropolitan Local Management Act, 1855, it is provided that—

"Any Vestry or District Board may levy a rate for defraying any expense incurred for any particular part of the parish or district."

I believe that clause has since been repealed, but it expresses the exact form of betterment that the County Council now ask for. I am myself strongly opposed to the London County Council going in for land speculation. The Metropolitan Board of Works owed most of the scandals which surrounded its close to having engaged in such speculation. It was proved conclusively before the Parliamentary Committee over which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. Fowler) presided that the recoupment in the case of the Strand improvement did not save to the ratepayers the cost of the improvement. There is no alternative, therefore, but betterment, and I hope that the House will not throw out this Bill because of some alterations which it may think ought to be made in the 7th clause. I can hardly believe that the House will inflict such a great injustice upon London as a whole.

*(452.) MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I do not intend to follow hon. Members into the details of the Bill. I am one of those who think that the details of any private measures are far better considered—are far better dealt with—in the Committee Room upstairs, subject always, however, to the condition that such measures are founded upon principles which have received the formal sanction of Parliament, failing which this House is bound to accept its own share of responsibility. But this is certainly a case in which the House should not shirk its responsibility. I was, I must admit, surprised and disappointed with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Local Government Board. He gave absolutely conclusive reasons why the House should not sanction the Bill; but he lacked the courage of his own conclusions. He was willing that a Committee should deal with it, instead of inviting the House to discharge its duty with regard to it. Such a monstrous and mischievous proposal ought not to receive the approbation of Parliament. It is nothing but a roving scheme for levying blackmail right and left. It is quite possible that a strong clause may have slipped almost unobserved into some Consolidation Bill which may be capable of being twisted into some kind of endorsement of this unsound principle of so-called "betterment"; but, notwithstanding what has just been stated, I undertake to assert that in no distinct manner has the principle of betterment received the sanction of Parliament up to the present time. The Strand Improvement Scheme was stoutly objected to and opposed on account of this very principle being involved. It was one which Parliament could never have assented to. I must protest emphatically against this Bill and the action which we are recommended to take in regard to it.

*(4.57.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I had no intention or desire to prolong this Debate, but I must make some reply to the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. This is a fair and reasonable proposal for the House to send to the Committee upstairs, because it is one with regard to which all the parties concerned—the London County Council, the Vestry, and the owners of the neighbouring property—are willing to bear their share of the cost of the improvement. It has been said that it is possible that accumulated interest under the provisions of the Bill may make £100 into £5,000, and there have been other vague fears and doubts of that kind. The whole sum is £22,000, and all that would be dealt with in any postponed manner is the residuum of that. Of course, a little injustice is as bad as much injustice, but there is a clause in the Bill under which it is said that consideration should be taken, by those who arrange what the improvement rate is to be, of all the circumstances of the case. Surely no arbitrator, however appointed, would aid such an absurd result as that sketched by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Baumann), a result which really would be the outcome of failure to take into account the whole of the circumstances of the case. I admit that such matters as the appointment of arbitrators should be fairly considered by the Committee upstairs. Under these circumstances, I hope the House will, without further discussion, proceed to a Division. The time of the House is continually wasted by the reiterated opposition of a number of Members on the other side of the House to everything that the London County Council proposes.

Mr. J. Lowther

* (5.4.) COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): I should not have intervened in this Debate had it not been for the observations characterising this Bill as outrageous and as an attempt to levy blackmail. It appears to me the Bill does not deserve those terms of opprobrium. As to what has been said regarding the County Council, I would point out that the Council is exactly that which the constituencies have made it. Therefore, no improper motives ought to be attributed to the Council, because it stands on equal authority with this House by reason of the votes of the constituencies. I think the Bill is not unsound. There are, no doubt, errors in the seventh clause. Yet I would point out that the principle has not been introduced by a side wind, but has heretofore received the approval of Parliament. In the Metropolis Management Act of 1855 there is a clause which empowers a Vestry to levy a special rate upon a special district which has benefited by work done by the Local Authority. That applied to work of a public character. Where a public improvement is to be made, and can be proved to be for the benefit of a special district—whether that work be a sewer or a road, or, as in this instance, a bridge—the principle already stands. My own opinion is that the freeholders, or the Railway Company, ought to have made this bridge in the first instance; but, in order that a work of great public utility may be completed, the present arrangement of division of cost has been devised. I hope the Bill will be read a second time.

Question put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time and committed to a Select Committee of Nine Members, Five to be nominated by the House and Four by the Committee of Selection.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bill presented three clear days before the meeting of the Committee be referred to the Committee; that the Petitioners praying to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard against the Bill, and Counsel heard in support of the Bill.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Whitmore.)

* (5.10.) COLONEL HUGHES: I beg to move the following Instruction to this Bill:—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to consider the desirability of inserting a Clause enabling the Clerk of the County Council of London to correct the Totals of the Valuation Lists, so far as the same have been affected by the decisions on any rating appeals, and that Section 44 of 'The Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act, 1869,' should apply thereto as if such correction had been duly made on an appeal against Totals."

I do so in order to remedy an injustice, admitted, I think, by the County Council. The President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie) will understand exactly what is intended, and I hope therefore that he will, even though objecting to the form of the Motion, assent to my effort.

MR. RITCHIE: I object.

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): The Motion having been objected to, cannot be taken to-day.

QUESTIONS.

WORKING UNCONVICTED PRISONERS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that Sergeant Mackenzie, the Keeper of the Wigtown Gaol, refused to permit a visiting member of the County Council to inspect the prison, and that when the County Councillor received an order and was admitted, he found some unconvicted prisoners picking oakum; whether picking oakum is one of the works done by the hard labour prisoners; and whether the prison officials can compel unconvicted prisoners to pick oakum?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I am informed that the police-sergeant in charge of the cells at Wigtown, used as a fourteen days' prison, did refuse at first to admit a member of the Visiting Committee of the County Council, but that the Councillor was afterwards admitted and found one unconvicted prisoner picking oakum. Oakum-picking is one of the kinds of work done by hard labour prisoners, and also by ordinary prisoners, the difference being in the task required. No prison official can compel an untried prisoner to work; but such prisoners are allowed to work if they choose. The prisoner in question had been told that he was not bound to work; but that if he chose to tear a little oakum in order to pass the time he would be supplied with it, and he accepted the offer.

THE DUTIES OF PROCURATORS FISCAL.

DR. CLARK: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the Rev. Mr. Anderson, parish minister of Pultneytown, having been made bankrupt, Mr. R. S. W. Leith, Procurator Fiscal, Wick, was made trustee; that the trustee was interdicted by the Sheriff from making any inventory of the furniture in the bankrupt's house, the furniture being the property of his wife under the Married Women's Property Act, 1881; and that, in defiance of the interdict, the trustee forced an entrance and took an inventory; whether, upon the bankrupt complaining to the Sheriff of the contempt of Court committed by the trustee, he was informed that he required the sanction of the trustee, in his capacity of Procurator Fiscal, before any action could be taken; and whether he will arrange that Procurators Fiscal will be appointed without right of practice?

SIR C. J. PEARSON: The facts stated in the first part of the question are substantially correct, except the statement that the trustee, in defiance of an interdict, forced an entrance and took an inventory. After the interdict was granted, a valuator was sent to ascertain if there were other effects in the house belonging to the bankrupt estate. This officer was admitted at once by the rev. gentleman himself, who, however, some days afterwards made an informal complaint to the Sheriff Substitute. The Judge found no cause for interference, and in this finding the Sheriff agreed, and informed Mr. Anderson that if he wished to proceed with his complaint he should obtain the sanction of the Procurator Fiscal at Thurso, who had no interest in the case. I am not aware that the furniture was the property of Mrs. Anderson. According to my information, the Court of Session have decided that the furniture claimed by the bankrupt's wife belonged to the trustee, and commented severely on the attempt made to disappoint the creditors, for whose benefit the furniture has now been sold. As regards the last part of the question, I have nothing to add to the answers frequently given in this House by my predecessors and myself in regard to the right of Procurators Fiscal to practise.

DR. CLARK: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Procurator Fiscal in question has been appointed lately since these pledges were given and notwithstanding them?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: No, Sir; I am not aware.

DR. CLARK: I will draw attention to the question on the Vote for Procurators Fiscal.

ZULU PRISONERS.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether six Usutu prisoners, convicted in 1888-9, are now in Eshowe Gaol, in Zululand, viz.: Maghele, Tshwayibe, Nsukuzonke, Uxibilili, Umpikwa, Mafukwini; and if any of them are not, where are they, and what were the circumstances of their removal?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Three of the prisoners, named Maghele, Tshwayibe, and Umpikwa, who are undergoing life sentences in commutation of capital sentences for murder, were in 1890 removed to Natal, to undergo their sentences under the Colonial Prisoners' Removal Act, 1884, and with the sanction of the Secretary of State, the gaol at Eshowe not being suitable for prisoners undergoing life sentences. The other three prisoners—Nsukuzonke (5 years), Uxibilili (8 years), and Mafukwini (5 years)—are, as far as the Secretary of State is aware, undergoing their sentences at Eshowe.

ZULULAND—USIBEPU.

MR. PICTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies if the attention of the Colonial Office has been drawn to a statement by an European resident in Zululand, published in the Natal Witness of 24th February, 1892, that—

"There can be no talk of Usibepu's people returning to Ndwandwe District because they have already been long established there, and that though Usibepu is not with them in person he indirectly manages his tribe, the Chief who is recognized is his brother on the spot"; and whether the above statements are a correct description of what has occurred; and, if so, what steps are the Government taking to secure the fulfilment in spirit, and not in the letter only, of the assurance given on 18th March?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Usibepu's tribe is in apparent charge of an Induna named Zikizane, who is believed not to be a brother of the Chief. Whether the latter essays to manage the tribe indirectly is not known to Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Member does not appear to be aware that the Ndwandwe district is the ancestral home of Usibepu's tribe, and that the people of some hundreds of its kraals never left the district, or, if they did, returned to it in past years. The people are peaceably gaining a living by agricultural and pastoral pursuits, and Her Majesty's Government have no intention of evicting them. The assurance mentioned by the hon. Gentleman did not refer to them, but to those portions of Usibepu's tribe who are living out of the district.

MR. PICTON: Am I to understand that portions of Usibepu's people are now in Ndwandwe district, and have never been out of it?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Gentleman does not appear to have heard what I said—namely, that the Ndwandwe district is the ancestral home of the tribe, and that the people of some hundreds of its kraals never left the district, or, if they did, returned to it in past years.

MR. PICTON: This is rather an important matter. The right hon. Gentleman does not, I think, apprehend the point of my question. I want to know whether care is being taken that the assurance which the right hon. Gentleman gave on the 18th March will be carried out—that people hostile to the tribe will not be allowed to disturb them?

Sir C. J. Pearson

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Again I have to say that the hon. Member does not understand the last portion of my answer. I distinctly said the assurance mentioned by the hon. Gentleman did not refer to them, but to those portions of the tribe who are living out of the district.

MR. PICTON: I shall be obliged to raise the question on the Estimates.

THE STAMPING OF WEST AFRICAN LETTERS.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough) (for Dr. CAMERON, Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that whereas, prior to 1st January, letters from Benin, West Coast of Africa, where stamps are unobtainable, sent unstamped to this country, were, on delivery, charged the then single postage rate of 5d. per half ounce, they are now, since the postage has been nominally reduced to 2½d. per half-ounce, charged on delivery in this country double postage rates, or 5d. per half-ounce; and whether he will take steps either to allow of prepayment being made at Benin, or to continue the principle of charging adopted prior to the reduction of the postal rate, so as to prevent that reduction being illusory?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The statements in the question are not quite accurate. Up to the 1st October, 1891, the postage to and from Benin and other Native Possessions on the West Coast of Africa was 6d. per half-an-ounce. When the universal rate of foreign postage was fixed at 2½d., double postage was charged on homeward letters if unstamped, because that rate does not cover the expenses which are increased if the postage has to be collected on delivery. In such places, where there are no post offices, the firms having local agents might supply them with British stamps, and arrangements are being made to furnish the Vice Consuls with a supply.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING LICENCES.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will state for the information of the House the rules followed by the Board under the Electric Lighting Acts with regard to the holding of a local inquiry respecting applications for Provisional Orders and Licences?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): In cases where objection to an application for a Licence or Provisional Order is made by any person locally interested, the Board of Trade do, if they consider it expedient, hold a local inquiry; but the circumstances of different applications vary so much that it is impossible to lay down any definite rule as to the grounds which would justify the holding of such an inquiry.

CIVIL SERVANTS' PETITIONS.

MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Lords of the Treasury are willing to receive from Civil Servants Petitions which heads of Departments have refused to forward to their Lordships?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The views of the Treasury are stated in the Treasury Minute of the 26th February, 1866, which is reprinted in Parliamentary Paper, No. 94, of the year 1883.

THE CONVICT HEHIR.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is usual, in Ireland, to keep in prison for the full term of their sentences convicts who have developed symptoms of insanity, and who do not recover; and has the convict Hehir, now confined in Dundrum, shown any signs of recovery from the madness from which he is admittedly suffering; and, if not, will he be released?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): When a convict in Ireland is found to be insane while undergoing a term of imprisonment he is not kept in prison, but is transferred to the Central Criminal Lunatic Asylum at Dundrum. This practice has been followed in the case of the convict mentioned. He has not so far, I am informed, shown any sign of recovery.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: Will he be released?

MR. JACKSON: I do not quite see that insanity is in itself a justification for release. The prisoner must be in such a condition that it would not be safe to release him.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire into the case personally?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Gentleman has any information I shall be glad to receive it and to inquire into the case.

INDOOR AND OUTDOOR PRISON LABOUR.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the letter of Mr. M'Auly, published in the Irish Daily Independent of the 18th instant, in which it is alleged that a prisoner, named Thomas O'Leary, confined in Mountjoy Convict Prison, whose health has suffered seriously from being employed at indoor work, has repeatedly applied to the Governor and the Irish Prisons Board to be employed permanently in the open air, in the belief that his health would be benefited, and that his application has not yet been granted; whether it is usual to make such changes in favour of prisoners whose conduct is good, or whose health suffers from indoor employment; and, if so, what special reason is there for refusing O'Leary; and will he see that his case is re-considered?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that there is no foundation for the suggestion that this prisoner's health has suffered seriously from being employed at indoor work. He has applied to the Governor to be employed permanently in the open air, but that request could not be granted.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I desire to ask the Chief Secretary whether it is a fact that this man has been refused work in the open air since the year 1888; and I should like to know from whom he gets his information. Is it from the Governor of the prison or from the Prisons Board?

MR. JACKSON: I had the opportunity of getting full and complete information, because I personally visited the prison and saw all the officers.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Did the right hon. Gentleman see this particular prisoner?

MR. JACKSON: Yes; and the place where he worked.

DUBLIN AND THE CATTLE DISEASE

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to an Order of the Lord Lieutenant prohibiting nine thousand Dublin dairy cows, from which the supply of milk to the city is chiefly derived, from being turned out to grass during the summer months; and whether it is intended to enforce this Order during the entire summer months; and, if so, whether, in the interests of the health of the city, the Lord Lieutenant will consider the advisability of withdrawing the Order, or prohibiting the keeping of cows used for a milk supply within the city boundaries?

*MR. JACKSON: I am fully aware of the Order in Council referred to. Although there are about nine thousand dairy cattle in the Dublin scheduled districts, the number licensed for grazing from these districts last year was about 3,500. I regret to say that pleuro-pneumonia has been and is very prevalent in the scheduled districts. During the year ending 31st March, 1892, there occurred in the North and South Dublin Unions 116 outbreaks of pleuro-pneumonia, involving the slaughter of 3,689 cattle, for which compensation was paid to the amount of £49,245. It is important to note that last year, prior to the movement of the dairy cattle to grass in May, there were only four outbreaks in the County Dublin outside the scheduled districts, and of these two were of small importance. During the six months, May to October, in which the cattle from the scheduled districts were at grass, there occurred as many as 24 outbreaks of pleuro-pneumonia, involving the slaughter of nearly 1,100 cattle, for which compensation to the amount of £13,263 was paid; whilst, during the other six months of the year, there were only five outbreaks, involving the slaughter of 124 cattle, for which £1,500 compensation was paid. These facts, in my opinion, prove the absolute necessity for the Order, and it is intended to enforce it so long as it is deemed essential for the purpose of dealing effectually with the disease. The third question of the hon. Member appears to assume that the milk of town-fed cows which are not allowed to graze is injurious to health. This assumption, I am led to believe, is erroneous; and the experience of London confirms this belief. As a matter of fact, the great majority of cows in London cow-sheds never go out to grass at all, and, in regard to the sanitary condition of the animals, it may be interesting to give an extract from the Report of the Assistant Inspector of the Board of Agriculture, who was instructed in 1888 to visit the London Metropolitan cow-sheds in order to inquire into the general system of management and the sanitary condition of the animals kept therein. The Inspector's statement was as follows:—

"I was surprised to find the cows in such good condition. Many of them seemed fit for exhibition purposes, and it was easy to pick out the last purchased cows in the sheds. They were usually the poorest and lowest in flesh, rough-coated, and often dirty. In only two or three small lots did the cows generally appear in poor condition and dirty, and these were cases in which the owners had purchased old and worn-out cows. The condition and health of the cows I examined in the London cow-sheds would compare favourably with an equal number of cows taken indiscriminately from dairy herds in the country."

The question is a very important one. The Government is making strenuous efforts to stamp out the disease. We are sparing neither money nor pains, and I hope that the Government will receive the full support of those concerned and of the public and the House in their efforts to check the spread of the disease.

DR. FITZGERALD: We have every desire to support the right hon. Gentleman in his endeavour to stamp out the disease. I would, however, suggest that in making his inquiries he should consult the Medical Officers of Health in Dublin as to what their opinion would be of the enforcement of this Order—shutting up these cows in the city. My contention is, that the cows never having been put in, will not want turning out, and ought not to be allowed out of the city boundary at all.

EGRESS FROM THEATRES.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the dangerous condition of public theatres for persons engaged on and about the stage, in consequence of the inadequate provision for escape in case of fire; whether he is aware that the "safety curtain" provided for the protection of the audience shuts the persons engaged on the stage in with the fire, with a small stage door as the only means of escape; and whether he proposes to compel theatre owners to provide sufficient means of exit from the stage in case of fire or other emergency?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): No, Sir; my attention has not been called to the allegations in the question. I am informed by the architect of the London County Council that, while facilities for escape for performers in case of fire differ greatly in different theatres, there are generally doorways on either side of the stage which communicate with the auditorium, in addition to the door from the street, by which the performers enter and leave the stage, so that the effect of the safety curtain is not that suggested by the hon. Member. During recent years great improvements have been made in London theatres in respect of provision for escape from fire, and the London County Council requires in all cases where it has authority that sufficient staircases, ladders, and doorways shall be provided for escape from dressing rooms, the stage, and all parts above and below it. As to the third paragraph of the question, I have no powers of compulsion. The Select Committee of this House which is now considering the regulation of theatres will, no doubt, make suggestions upon what future legislation may be necessary.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I did not refer to London. I asked for information elsewhere.

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information.

REPAIRS TO THE GUARDSHIP "TRIUMPH."

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the guardship Triumph, stationed at Queenstown, wants repairs; and, if so, are they such as can be executed in Cork Harbour; and will any repairs that may be required be done there?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The guardship Triumph is in need of repair which can be done locally.

THE CORK LUNATIC ASYLUM.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the repeated complaints made by the Board of Governors of the Cork District Lunatic Asylum, that particulars are not given them, or sufficient particulars are not furnished in the specifications of various contracts in connection with plumbing, fire mains, gas fittings, and copper cylinders; whether he is aware that the Board of Governors having been called specially to consider these contracts were informed that they had been previously advertised; whether the specifications given to the Board were, as alleged by the Chairman, incorrect; and whether an expenditure of between £2,000 and £3,000 is involved in the particular branch of the works alluded to?

*MR. JACKSON: With regard to this question, I am informed that any particulars in respect to proposed works are, if applied for by the Governors, invariably given, and their views sought with reference to them. The specifications for the proposed works mentioned were prepared by the local architect. Tenders were invited by public advertisement for these works, and they will be referred to the Governors for their views before any decision is come to. An expenditure of over £2,000 is involved.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that at the present time there is a deadlock in the Cork Asylum, and that the Governors have again and again refused to pass the contracts, inasmuch as they contend that the whole business is now done by the Board of Control in Dublin. Will the right hon. Gentleman look into this matter further, and I will put the question down again for next Monday?

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the Board of Governors of the Cork District Lunatic Asylum refused to consider the question of the proposed connection between the new and old buildings; whether it is a fact that the Board of Control had omitted to insert the connecting passage in the original plans; and whether any and, if so, what steps will be taken to remove the frequently recurring friction between the Board of Control and the Board of Governors?

*MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the construction of the connecting passage referred to was not included in the original contract for the new buildings, as there was some doubt as to the best position in which to construct it, and it was, therefore, deemed advisable to postpone the consideration of the question. The matter is now receiving attention, and the Governors have been consulted on the matter. Plans are being prepared to carry out the work. The Board of Control have done everything in their power to prevent any friction with the Governors in carrying out these works.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Boards of Governors of County Lunatic Asylums have any power of regulating the expense incurred in the erection of new buildings or works in such asylums; and whether all fiscal control is vested in the Board of Control in Dublin?

MR. JACKSON: The control over the expenditure on the erection of new buildings or works in County Asylums in Ireland is vested by law solely in the Board of Control; but the Governors are invariably consulted before the expenditure is incurred.

THE SALARIES OF DUBLIN POSTAL OFFICIALS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what increases of the pay attaching to positions in the Secretary's Department in the Dublin Post Office have been made since the recent appointment of a Secretary from England; whether any reductions have been made in the other branches of the Post Office in Dublin not immediately under the Secretary; and, if so, what is the nature and amount of such reductions; and whether a Return will be given setting forth the reasons for the increases and reductions of pay and, in the case of reductions, the reasons for the higher pay previously given?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The present Secretary to the Post Office in Dublin was appointed nearly seven years ago; and during the interval no salary in the Secretary's office has been increased, with the exception of the clerks of the second division, whose scale has been raised in accordance with a recent Order in Council. Those clerks belong to a general class which is common to the United Kingdom. During the same period the Sorting Office in Dublin has been revised so as to assimilate its rate of pay to that of similar offices elsewhere, and the consequence has in some cases been to reduce salaries prospectively, but without injury to present possessors; while, generally speaking, the staff have obtained considerable advantages in pay and prospects of promotion. No reduction has been made in the pay of any officers in consequence of these changes.

SALES OF MARGARINE AS BUTTER.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is in receipt of a resolution forwarded by the Munster Dairy School Committee, calling attention to the adulteration of butter with margarine, and the frequent sales of margarine as butter; whether the Government will take any steps to secure margarine being dyed a distinctive colour to prevent further fraudulent dealing and injury to an important Irish industry; and whether several foreign Governments have adopted the system of dyeing margarine to prevent it being fraudulently sold as butter?

*MR. JACKSON: I duly received the resolution referred to, but I am not aware of any intention on the part of the Government to propose legislation of the nature indicated. As to the latter part of the question, I may say that what I have seen indicates that the Acts of foreign Governments with regard to the colouring of margarine are rescinded, and that severe penalties are imposed on all who sell butter which is at all adulterated. I hope, however, that Irish butter will continue to be of such good quality that that will not be necessary.

FIGHTING IN UGANDA.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been directed to the following statements in the Standard, of 26th April, 1892:—

"Zanzibar, Monday.—Further reports from Uganda confirm the main details of the fighting there, as I telegraphed them to you last week. It would seem that for some time previous to the outbreak of hostilities, the Protestants had received large supplies of Snider rifles. Encouraged by the possession of these arms, they attacked the Catholics, but were at first repulsed, and compelled to retire on the fort. There Captain Lugard came to their assistance with his Maxim guns, and after severe fighting and heavy casualties on both sides, succeeded in dispersing the Catholics. Mr. Ashe Winton was killed.

"Bishop Heoth escaped to Buddov. He reports that large numbers of Catholics have been seized and sold as slaves.

"The Catholics and Mohammedans are massing their forces, with a view to renewing the attack on the fort. Whether Captain Lugard will be able to hold his own or not depends entirely on how long his supplies of ammunition last.

"Mr. Gerald Portal has left for Vitu."

And in the Times, of 26th April, 1892—

"Berlin.—Herr Oscar Borchert, who is at present on the march to the Victoria Nyanza, has been commissioned by the Emperor to give presents to the King of Uganda in return for the elephant tusks which the latter sent to His Majesty. As, however, Captain Lugard has found it necessary to depose King Mwanga, it is doubtful if Herr Borchert will be able to fulfil his mission"; also to the statement previously published that—

“Captain Lugard had been made King of Uganda in the place of King Mwanga, with whom the Treaty was made giving to the East Africa Company such rights as they possess in that territory”;

whether Her Majesty's Government have made any inquiries, and can give any information as to the condition of affairs at Uganda and the adjoining districts on the Lakes; and whether, having regard to the obligations into which they have entered in relation to the Mombasa Railway, they will communicate to the House the Reports made by Captain Lugard as to the state of the country?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): My attention has been directed to the statements quoted by the right hon. Gentleman. No confirmation of them has been received at the Foreign Office, neither has any information corroborating them been received by the British East Africa Company. The agents of the Company have been instructed to telegraph any authentic information which they may receive. The latest information sent by Mr. Portal was contained in a letter addressed to him by Bishop Tucker. It only spoke of the usual difficulties between the rival parties at Uganda. This news was dated the 8th December, and was subsequent to the somewhat sensational reports from the French missionaries. In private letters received by the East Africa Company complaints are made of undue favour towards the Roman Catholic party shown by the Company's officers. There is every reason to suppose that Captain Lugard has avoided showing the least partiality to either side. Mr. Portal is paying a short visit to Vitu, but his visit thither is not connected with the alleged disturbances at Uganda.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Will the hon. Gentleman answer my question as to whether he has any reason to suppose that Mwanga has been deposed, as stated in the news from Berlin; and also whether he can say what is the latest information that the Government or the East Africa Company has received from Uganda?

Sir W. Harcourt

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Well, Sir. I am not quite certain of the exact date of the latest information received by the Company, but it is contained, I believe, in the lengthy Report from Captain Lugard which arrived in this country, I think about the close of last year. It was in continuation of the Report which the right hon. Gentleman had before him at the beginning of this Session. With regard to the first supplementary question of the right hon. Gentleman, we have had no information as to the alleged deposition of Mwanga; and we have had no confirmation of the telegram which appeared in the Times from Berlin.

SIR W. HARCOURT: May I ask whether the Government will lay upon the Table the Report of Captain Lugard, which the hon. Gentleman has referred to as having arrived here at the end of last year? Will that Report be laid upon the Table, so that the House may know what is the latest authentic information with reference to the state of things in that country?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: Yes, Sir. I think, when answering a question put by the hon. Member for Northampton some time ago, I said that these Reports were made to the British East Africa Company, but that, with their permission, we should lay them upon the Table of this House. They are now, I believe, in course of being prepared and printed; and they will be laid upon the Table of the House, in conjunction with other Papers which the hon. Member for Northampton asked for, shortly after the conclusion of the Debate on the Mombasa Railway.

THE CASE OF JAMES HUGHES.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of James Hughes, a farmer's son, who, at the Petty Sessions at Abergele on the 5th March last, was fined £20 for assaulting a police officer; and whether, in view of the slight character of the assault, and of the fact that the young man had not been previously convicted of any offence, he will remit any portion of the penalty?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I have received a Report concerning this case. It appears that James Hughes, who is a person of superior education and the son of a gentleman farmer, headed a crowd, and took the principal part in rescuing a prisoner from the custody of a police officer. He used threatening language to the officer, and struck him a severe blow on the side of the neck and on the face, and in consequence of this attack on the officer the prisoner escaped. I see no reason whatever for remitting any portion of the fine.

LORD WANTAGE'S COMMITTEE.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what course he proposes to take with reference to the recommendations made by Lord Wantage's Committee; and whether he can now state that in future the old uniforms will become the private property of the soldiers on the expiration of the term for which they have been issued?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): My hon. Friend is aware that a day has been promised for the discussion of this question before Whitsuntide, and the Secretary of State will take the opportunity of making a statement in regard to the recommendations of Lord Wantage's Committee.

THE INSPECTORSHIP OF SCOTCH SALMON FISHERIES.

MR. ANGUS SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the office of Inspector of Salmon Fisheries for Scotland is now vacant, or is about to become vacant; whether the retiring Inspector is entitled to a pension; whether it is the intention of the Government to fill up the vacancy by a new appointment; and whether, in that case, they will arrange that in future his salary be paid by the proprietors of the salmon fisheries who benefit by his labours, and not out of public funds as at present?

SIR C. J. PEARSON: The office referred to is now vacant, and the retiring Inspector is entitled to a pension.

The Government intend to fill up the vacancy, and the new Inspector's salary can only be paid from moneys provided by Parliament, in accordance with the Statute under which he is appointed. It is not intended to alter that arrangement.

NAVAL RESERVE MEN IN STORNOWAY.

DR. MACDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will explain why it was that, out of about 250 men who came to Stornoway lately to be enrolled in the Naval Reserve, only fifty were enrolled, and after waiting about several days in the town the remainder were told they might go home, as no more could be enrolled, but on asking for the reason no answer was given them; and whether, there being already two thousand Naval Reserve men in the Lewis, and the Government having decided on increasing the force from eighteen thousand to twenty-seven thousand, Lewis was entitled as its share to have one thousand more men enrolled?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Royal Naval Reserve consists of two classes of men, first and second class; the numbers voted this year being respectively 10,800 and 10,600. There are now about two thousand Reserve men enrolled at Stornoway, all of whom, with the exception of about a hundred first class, are second class men of the fishermen class. This number is far larger than that in any other district in the United Kingdom, and it is not proposed to increase the proportion now allotted to Stornoway. The second class Reserve has been increased this year by only six hundred men, and it is not proposed in subsequent years to materially add to that number.

AFFIXING STAMPS TO PLAIN CARDS.

MR. HOLDEN (Walsall): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will allow commercial and other cards—subject to the present regulations as to writing on one side, &c.—to circulate through the Post Office upon affixing a halfpenny stamp, as is now permitted to the senders of newspapers; and, if not, upon what grounds postage cards are differently treated to newspapers?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The question of allowing cards of private manufacture bearing an adhesive halfpenny stamp to pass as post cards is still under consideration.

THE MILITIAMEN OF LEWIS.

DR. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he has lately received from the Lewis District Committee of the Ross-shire County Council a Petition praying him to cause the militiamen of Lewis to be in future trained at Stornoway; whether he is aware that a large amount of sickness and death is caused in the island from infectious and other diseases contracted by the men while training in Fort George, and communicated by them to their friends and neighbours on their return home; whether he has fully considered the subject, and what decision he has come to thereon; and, if he has not definitely decided the matter, within what space of time will he be prepared to inform the House of his decision?

MR. BRODRICK: The question of training the battalion to which the Lewis men belong at Stornoway was carefully considered in 1887, and was negatived, as the men would have to be under canvas in an inclement season. These circumstances do not appear to have changed, nor has any complaint been made, so far as I am aware, that infectious and other diseases have been taken home by the men of the regiment. A Petition has been lately received and will be duly considered. It proposes, however, that a new Militia battalion shall be raised at Lewis, with headquarters at Stornoway. Even had it been considered desirable time would not have admitted of the proposal being carried out this year.

IRISH EVICTED TENANTS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Government have as yet come to any decision as to whether they will this Session introduce a short Bill to extend the period of the 13th clause of the Land Purchase Act (Ireland) of last Session, with a view to re-instating evicted tenants in Ireland?

MR. JACKSON: I have not found evidence that landlords and tenants, in any sufficient number, have agreed or desire to avail themselves of Clause 13 of the Land Purchase Act of last Session to justify me in bringing in a Bill for its extension.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman give the matter further consideration with a view to bringing in a Bill?

MR. JACKSON: Well, Sir, if I had evidence before me showing that the landlords and tenants were willing and desirous of making the necessary arrangements I certainly should consider whether I could not make some extension.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: If the right hon. Gentleman has evidence of the willingness of the tenants to avail themselves of this clause will he exercise influence on the landlords and ask them to meet the tenants half way?

MR. JACKSON: I think the hon. Member will see that he is asking me to go beyond my province.

MRS. MONTAGU.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true as stated in the Press that upon Mrs. Montagu's removal from Dublin to Derry, she was conveyed in a first-class carriage; and, if so, who paid for it?

MR. JACKSON: I have no knowledge of the circumstances.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mrs. Montagu has been compelled to assume the prison garb?

MR. JACKSON: Under a general rule for local prisons, No. 28, which I believe was presented to Parliament in a Paper, No. 99, of the Session of 1889, an amended rule was made as follows:—

"A convicted criminal prisoner shall be provided with a complete prison dress and shall be required to wear it unless the General Prisons Board shall, by order in writing, otherwise direct, on the grounds that the wearing of such dress is not necessary for the purpose of health, or personal cleanliness."

The General Prisons Board report that application having been made on behalf of this prisoner, they did not consider there was anything to justify her being treated in an exceptional way.

DR. TANNER: Am I to understand that only in the case of political offenders, who are opposed to the present Government, are the prisoners condemned to wear the prison garments, while forgers and murderers of their children are permitted to wear their own clothes?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; I have already pointed out that the Prisons Board saw no reason for according exceptional treatment to this prisoner.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Was not this rule made to suit the convenience of hon. Members below the Gangway when they were in prison?

DR. TANNER: It was made to suit the convenience of the Belfast forgers.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON COAST COMMUNICATIONS.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Royal Commission to be appointed to consider the question of coast communications will also consider the question of rescue work, which in the United States is undertaken by the Government?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: No, Sir; that is not proposed.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN THE SLIGO UNION.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any, and, if so, how many, labourers' cottages have been built in the Sligo Union; whether any difficulties have prevented the erection of cottages; and, if so, whether the Irish Local Government Board will take steps to get the necessary housing and allotments for the labourers?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that no cottages have been built or authorised in the Sligo Union. It appears that in 1886 a scheme for the purpose was submitted by the Guardians, but fell through, the necessary certificates not being produced condemning the existing dwellings. The Local Government Board thereupon explained to the Guardians the necessary steps to be taken.

GRESHAM UNIVERSITY—THE ROYAL COMMISSION.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any opportunity will be given of discussing the composition of the Royal Commission on the proposed Gresham University?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not think that any opportunity is, in the ordinary course of Parliamentary business, likely to occur for the discussion of this question, though, of course, it will be in the power of hon. Members to ballot for a day and to obtain such a discussion if it is desired.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): In reference to the same subject, would the right hon. Gentleman allow me to ask whether it would be possible for him or his colleagues to secure an addition to the members of the Commission; and also if he is aware that much disappointment is felt in consequence of there being no Representative of the Convocation of London University upon the Commission?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid it would greatly militate against the success of the Commission if its numbers were augmented. I do not quite follow the hon. Member's question as to there being no Representative of the London University on the Commission, as Mr. Anstie is connected with that body.

MR. PICTON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Mr. Anstie has taken a prominent part in direct opposition to the Convocation of the London University, and that Mr. Anstie represents the views of the Senate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid that the remarks of the hon. Gentleman hardly answer the objection which I have stated to exist against augmenting the number of the Commission.

RAILWAY STATIONS—ENTRANCES AND EXITS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board have any powers of regulating the width or inclination of entrances to, or exits from, railway stations; and, if so, under what Act of Parliament; and whether any circular letters or rules have been issued or drawn up respecting the matter; and, if so, whether he will lay a copy of the same upon the Table?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Board of Trade have no power to deal compulsorily with existing stations; but under the Regulation of Railways Act they have power to postpone the opening of any new stations for passenger traffic in cases where the inspecting officer thinks their opening would be attended with danger to the public. Under this Act the Board of Trade issues to Railway Companies a Schedule of the most important requirements made by their officers. This document, which is now under revision, stipulates for certain dimensions of the steps in staircases at railway stations, and I may say that I propose to consider whether any amendment is desirable in the direction indicated in the question.

TUNNELLING THROUGH GIBRALTAR.

SIR H. TYLER (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether it is proposed to make a tunnel six feet high by five feet wide through the rock of Gibraltar from west to east, and what is the object of such a tunnel; and whether this tunnel will in any contingencies endanger the safety of the city or impair the efficiency of the defences?

MR. BRODRICK: A tunnel is about to be driven into the centre of the rock of Gibraltar in the hope of finding a supply of fresh water. If water should not be found the tunnel will be carried through and utilised to carry a drain through the rock from west to east, in order that the sewage now discharged into the Bay may be carried to the east of the rock and cease to be a nuisance. There is no fear that the tunnel would give an enemy access to the fortress.

POSTAL AND TELEGRAPHIC FACILITIES IN LEWIS.

DR. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have now completed their late or present investigations into the requirements of Lewis for further roads and the improvement of its postal and telegraphic communications; whether any decision has been arrived at in the matter; and if no decision has yet been arrived at, how soon will he be able to inform the House of his intentions on the subject?

Mr. John Ellis

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The investigations referred to by the hon. Member in regard to roads have relation to the Counties of Ross, Sutherland, and Inverness, and the information asked for has not yet been received from the last-named county. The question will be considered as a whole, when the facts are placed fully before the Government; but it is not possible to name a date at which a definite decision can be arrived at. The hon. Member is, however, no doubt aware that in the meantime a new road between Stornoway and Carloway is being constructed out of the £15,000 already voted for that purpose. In regard to postal communication, the special mail service, as arranged by the Postmaster General and the Secretary for Scotland last year at a cost to the Government of £3,000, will be maintained. In regard to telegraphs, a sum of £1,120 was expended last year on extensions in the Island of Lewis, and it is proposed to devote the sum of £1,000 to be voted this year mainly to extensions in Orkney and Shetland.

THE WESTERN HIGHLANDS WORKS ACT.

DR. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Secretary for Scotland has, in contravention of Section 2, Sub-section 4, of "The Western Highlands and Islands (Scotland) Works Act, 1891," refused to make inquiry into certain works proposed to be made under the said Act in Ross-shire till plans, specifications, &c., are laid before him as to the proposed works; and, if so, what remedy there is to compel the observance of the Act and procure an inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I answered this question last Monday. I do not know whether the hon. Member desires me to repeat my answer?

DR. MACDONALD: The point in my question which the right hon.

Gentleman seemed to miss was whether the Secretary for Scotland has the right to ask for plans before making an inquiry, and the point is that people are put to the expense of preparing plans, specifications, &c., before they know whether the works will be carried out.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman will see that I should have some difficulty in answering that question.

PORTNAGURAN HARBOUR OF REFUGE.

DR. MACDONALD: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government are now prepared to act on the recommendations of the Western Highlands and Islands Commission of 1890, to grant a sum of £30,000, or other sum of money required, for the construction of a harbour of refuge at Portnaguran, in the Island of Lewis, so as to enable the fishermen to prosecute their avocation with some degree of safety and success, and if there is any intention of giving a grant, as similarly recommended, for erecting a lighthouse on Thumpan Head, adjacent to Portnaguran?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: A sum of £17,000 was voted last year, as the hon. Member must be aware, for the construction of harbours at Ness and Carloway, and there are at present about sixteen applications from the Island of Lewis for piers and boatlips under the consideration of the Secretary for Scotland, which, if granted, would involve a further large expenditure of public money in Lewis. The Government are, therefore, not prepared at present to grant a sum of £30,000 for the construction of a harbour at Portnaguran. Last year £4,500 was voted for the erection of lights, out of which sum £475 was expended on a light at Carloway. There is only a sum of £1,000 taken this year for lights, the main portion of which will be required for lights in Shetland; but the claims of Thumpan Head will be considered next year along with the claims of other places.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House when the Small Holdings Bill will be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it will be possible to take the Small Holdings Bill before next Thursday.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): As great interest is felt, I believe, on both sides of the House, and certainly on this side, in the progress of the Small Holdings Bill, and as there is a great desire to see it disposed of after such amount of discussion as may be absolutely required, we should be very glad to know what is the earliest day upon which it can be brought on; and if there is to be delay, what the cause of that delay may be?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps it would be for the convenience of the House that I should state that when we re-commence the discussion of the Small Holdings Bill we shall go straight through with it. I propose to-morrow to ask the House to give me Morning Sittings on Tuesdays and Fridays. On Monday I shall not be able to carry out my original intention of taking the Second Reading of the Budget Resolutions, because, from what I hear, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will not be in his place so early. But I think it would be of great advantage if we could complete the Second Reading of the Scotch Equivalent Grant Bill on that day and advance one or two other subsidiary measures, the further stages of which could be taken at a later date, after we had finished such important proceedings as the discussion on the Small Holdings Bill and the Second Reading of the Irish Local Government Bill.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): Is there any reason why the Small Holdings Bill should not be taken? There is every desire on this side of the House that that Bill should get through at as early a date as possible. Moreover, there is a great deal of interest and curiosity to know what the Government are going to do with the Bill for the Government of Ireland.

We have now had a fortnight's Vacation, and a week after the Vacation has, I may say, been wasted, and we have had neither the Small Holdings Bill nor the Irish Bill; and now, as I understand, the right hon. Gentleman wishes to get rid of next week, and not to bring the Small Holdings Bill on till a week after this date. I would suggest that it would be far more convenient if we could have the Small Holdings Bill next Monday.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Can the First Lord of the Treasury say anything about the prospects of the Irish Education Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I admit that it is a legitimate curiosity for the right hon. Gentleman to seek to discover the intentions of the Government with regard to the Irish Local Government Bill. But I do not quite follow the tone of his criticisms, and I do not agree with him that the Government has wasted the time of the House this week. We have had only one day, that was Monday, and that day we expended with great advantage in getting through almost all the controversial points in Committee on the Indian Councils Bill. I hope to-night will be equally well employed in passing the Second Reading of the Clergy Discipline Bill, and perhaps some other business. With respect to the Irish Local Government Bill, I have already informed the House that it is to be proceeded with as soon as the Committee stage of the Small Holdings Bill is completed. It would be convenient to take an additional stage of one or two relatively small measures before we reach the Small Holdings Bill; but I cannot say anything with respect to the Irish Education Bill.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): The Scotch Equivalent Bill, I understand, will come on on Monday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is my intention at present.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware, as he proposes to take the Committee on the Scotch Local Taxation Bill, that a Memorandum explaining that Bill has been published in Scotland only for a very few days, and there has been no time for the expression of public opinion about it? We shall, therefore, if it is taken on Monday, debate the Bill under very great disadvantages, inasmuch as we shall not know the opinion our constituents have formed of the measure.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I understand that in the absence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer it is not intended to proceed with the Budget Resolutions; but I hope reasonable notice will be given when the discussion is to be taken.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): Are the Budget Resolutions to be taken next week, for I understand that Tuesday is taken up.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I only said I would not take the Small Holdings Bill before Thursday; but if the Chancellor of the Exchequer is able to be in his place on that day we shall take the Budget Resolutions. I think the House will be unanimous in wishing to get the matter settled; but I am unable to pledge myself in the matter. Due notice shall be given. I will put it on the Paper.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: In the event of the right hon. Gentleman obtaining from the House the Tuesdays and Fridays, we have not yet learned how they would be employed; and I may say that we are under the impression that the time might be very conveniently employed in taking the Small Holdings Bill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The order of Business which I have sketched out is only a suggestion, for it is impossible to make a final plan. But this is my idea. To-morrow I shall ask the House to give Tuesday and Friday mornings for Government Business. On Monday the Committee stage of the Scotch Equivalent Grant will be taken. On Tuesday we shall probably take the Committee stage of the Criminal Evidence Bill, and some other important but uncontroversial measure. On Thursday I should hope that my right hon. Friend (Mr. Goschen) will be in his place to deal with the Budget Resolutions; but, if not, it would be convenient to begin the Small Holdings Bill and discuss it de die in diem, with the exception, of course, of the Budget discussion, which would have to be interpolated in the unfortunate event of our not being able to take it next Thursday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

CLERGY DISCIPLINE (IMMORALITY) BILL.—[Lords.](—No. 239.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): This Bill, which it is now my duty to introduce, will not, I hope, be the subject of prolonged controversy, still less of Party controversy, in this House. But though it may not excite Party feeling, it is one which must have effects of far-reaching importance for the good of the community, and may, perhaps, be productive of more advantages than some measures apparently framed on more ambitious lines. This is a Bill to enable the Church of England, without the present difficulties and complications which embarrass legal procedure in such cases, to remove from the cure of souls clergymen who have shown themselves unfit for their position. The Bill does not deal with any question of doctrine. It does not create any new offences, nor does it create any new punishment. It is a Procedure Bill, and a Procedure Bill alone intended to facilitate the carrying out of the law, the justice of which everybody will admit; and for these reasons I cannot doubt that even those who do not belong to the Communion of the Church of England will be glad to see the Bill carried into law. It may be in the recollection of those Members of the House who have taken an interest in ecclesiastical legislation that in 1870 a Bill was passed by which any clergyman guilty of felony ipso facto vacated his living. We propose by this Bill to extend that provision beyond the mere limit of felony, and to include within it indictable offences of a grave kind on which a jury have pronounced, and on which the guilty clergyman has been sentenced to hard labour. We also propose to include cases of bastardy and cases of adultery, so that this Bill would, without any further procedure, broadly speaking, vacate a living exactly as a felony does under the existing law. One distinction between the procedure with regard to a case in which hard labour has been imposed and the cases of felony to which the present Act extends exists which should be adverted to. Under the Act of 1870, the living is vacated without any further action on the part of the Bishop; under this Act we propose, in so far as these offences are concerned, that the Bishop shall be the instrument to declare the benefice vacant. The distinction is not one of very great importance. A more important part of the Bill, perhaps, deals with the less serious class of offences, which can now only be touched under the Ecclesiastical Law, and here we propose a new and greatly simplified procedure, which I will very shortly explain. In cases where a clergyman has been convicted by a jury, but has not been sentenced to hard labour, and in case he has been guilty of immoral acts or habits, the case will be tried before the Bishop's Court. The procedure before the Bishop's Court will be of the following character. If both parties to the suit are agreed, the Bishop may pronounce a summary sentence. If, on the other hand, the parties are not agreed, but there is no question of fact other than the previous conviction before a jury or before magistrates, the Bishop's Court may pronounce sentence. No question of fact can be discussed by the Bishop's Court; but if a question of fact can be brought forward the Bill provides for the alteration of the Court, and what I may almost describe as a jury of five Assessors is added to the Court. Two of these Assessors are to be laymen and three clergymen, and they may pronounce their judgment on the question of fact, and on the question of fact alone, and their opinion in deciding the question of fact must be unanimous, and if not unanimous it must be by a majority, and with the assent of the Chancellor who constitutes the Court. It will be observed that these five Assessors are only to be called in when questions of fact come before the Court. They will be called in if the incriminated clergyman has been tried by a jury or by any Court from which there is an appeal of which he has not taken advantage. But if he has been tried for drunkenness and summarily convicted, and if, therefore, he has been convicted under circumstances where he had no appeal, then the facts of the case must be re-heard, and he may in that way be saved from any possible error of justice arising out of the first hearing. Again, the question of fact will arise necessarily in those cases where a trial has not taken place either before a jury or before the Magistrates, and where the clergyman is accused of having been guilty of some immoral practice or habit. These are the cases, and the only cases, in which questions of fact will come to be dealt with by the Bishop's Court, and in these cases, as I have already explained to the House, the Court will be assisted by the presence of the five Assessors, who will be called upon to express their opinion on the questions of fact submitted to them. It will be seen that the clergyman has an appeal on the question of fact to the Bishop's Court only when he has been summarily convicted, or when he has had no opportunity of appealing to the ordinary law; let me now state the cases in which he will have an appeal from the Bishop's Court to a higher tribunal. There may be an appeal either to the Provincial Court or to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council on questions of law by either party. That is to say, that either side may carry a question of law to the Provincial Court which is practically Lord Penzance's Court, or to the Judicial Committee, as they may desire. But if the question is taken to the Provincial Court there will be no further appeal to the Judicial Committee. The parties may appeal to either one of the two Courts, but there can only be one appeal. On questions of fact the prosecutors have no right of appeal at all, but the defendant has a right of appeal again, either to the Provincial Court or to the Judicial Committee if permission is given by those Courts, and they must give permission if the incriminated clergyman can show a prima facie case. So that, again, the incriminated clergyman has his interests amply safeguarded, and not only on the point of law, but also on a question of fact, can have an appeal to a Superior Court if he can show any cause why his appeal should be heard. So much for the procedure under this Bill. With regard to the sentences, they are practically—I do not say technically, but substantially—identical with those existing at present. They consist of deprivation, suspension, and admonition. But if there are no new sentences created by this Bill any more than any new offences, there is a new principle introduced into it by which the sentence is to be awarded. At present the Courts are bound by precedent, and they can only give a sentence in accordance with a long series of precedents in similar cases. But these precedents were not fixed on any principle which would commend itself to this House or to public opinion. The old theory of the Ecclesiastical Law was that the sentence was passed on a clergyman not so much for the benefit of the parishioners as for the benefit of his own soul; and therefore it was very often thought that suspension for a brief period might be sufficient for the spiritual welfare of the clergyman, although he was brought back again after such suspension to attend to the spiritual welfare of the people, and naturally, in too many cases, with disastrous results. I believe the Archbishop, in another place, gave an example of what might happen under these circumstances. A clergyman was brought before an Ecclesiastical Court on a charge of drunkenness and was suspended for six months. The six months elapsed, and on his return to the parish he preached a sermon to his congregation explaining what an agreeable holiday he had enjoyed. That, everybody will admit, would be a gross scandal, which is not at all diminished by the fact that in order that this six months' suspension could be inflicted—if that is the proper word—upon the clergyman, a very costly process had to be gone through by the Bishop of the diocese. It only remains to add to this brief outline of the Bill to say that the rules for carrying it into effect will be framed by a Committee of the Privy Council, consisting of the Lord Chancellor, Lord Coleridge (the Lord Chief Justice of England), Lord Penzance, and those Archbishops and Bishops who are members of the Privy Council, and in any decision with regard to the framing of these rules two of the great legal luminaries I have mentioned must be included. I think it will be admitted that a Committee so constituted will very competently perform the duties which will be entrusted to them. We may safely believe that they will frame rules which will safeguard the interests of all parties in cases which may come up for decision before these Courts. I do not think any one who has heard this brief account of the Bill will think it is one that can by any possibility inflict inequality or injustice upon any clergyman who may be dealt with under it. But full advantage and the full necessity for a Bill of this kind cannot be really understood by anyone who has not mastered, at least in outline, the cumbersome character of the machinery by which these offences have to be tried. I understand that if an incriminated clergyman desire it there must, under the present system, be three distinct trials, in which all the questions of fact may be re-heard and re-determined, and these three trials may, under certain circumstances, be extended to four. I need not say to any Gentleman who is even moderately acquainted with legal practice that a procedure which involves three distinct trials, three distinct re-hearings of a question of fact, is a system that is extremely cumbersome, extremely expensive, and extremely unjust to those who are the prosecutors, and in some cases even more unjust possibly to the defendant. This procedure is not only inordinately long and inordinately expensive, but it also belongs to so ancient a period that points of difficulty are constantly arising and technicalities are constantly being started which render the progress of justice necessarily slow, halting, and hazardous. We propose to substitute for this technical, this cumbersome and inordinately costly process, a process which we believe will be cheap, rapid, and just; and we cannot doubt that the result of this enormous improvement in the administrative machinery of the law will be to enable the Church to purge herself of an element—a very small element, I believe, but not the less a very deleterious and injurious element—which now hinders her work, hampers her efforts, and disgraces her character. I hope that this Bill, on which I do not think it necessary to spend any more words, but which I hope I have made clear, at all events in its main lines, will commend itself to the House. The clergy, who in some respects are the parties most immediately affected by it, have expressed by every means in their power, through the action of the Archbishops and Bishops, through the action of individual clergymen, and through the Convocations of both Provinces, their approval of its main principles. Where they approve I think the laity need not withhold their approval, for, after all, the laity are not less interested than the clergy in seeing that unworthy clergymen shall be prevented from taking any further part in the cure of souls. I notice on the Paper three Amendments to the Second Reading. Two of them appear to give reasons why the Bill should be rejected. One of these stands in the name of the Member for Mid Lanark (Mr. Philipps), and he proposes to move: "That while the Government fails to provide opportunities for the consideration of many important measures affecting great masses of the community, this House declines to devote its time to the discussion of Clerical Discipline." The hon. Gentleman appears to think that this Bill does not affect great masses of the community. I cannot agree with him. It is perfectly true that the persons primarily affected by the measure are the clergymen of the Church of England, but the Church of England as a whole is vitally concerned in the process of purifying her ranks, and with the successful prosecution of that process is also bound up the spiritual welfare of a large mass of the population. It is no small and tentative measure for dealing with the interests of a small portion of the population; its effects are as widespread as are the efforts of the Church with which it deals; they are as far-reaching in their consequences as any measure that has ever been brought forward in this House—I care not by what Government or in what interest—and it does not lend itself to the criticism which the hon. Gentleman appears to desire to pass on it, that it is concerned with a small and insignificant fraction of the population. It is a National Bill, and as a National Bill I venture to recommend it to the House. Another Amendment stands in the name of the hon. Member for Carnarvon Districts (Mr. Lloyd-George); he desires to move—

“That this House, whilst deploring the circumstances which have occasioned the introduction of this Bill, considers that it is no part of the functions of the State to attend to matters of Spiritual Discipline.”

Now, Sir, I do not know whether the argument of the hon. Gentleman will rest on the question of the propriety of the Establishment of the Church or not; he and I differ on that point; but because we differ on that point I fail to see that there need be any difference between us as to the propriety, and even the necessity, of passing this measure. The Church, whether it ought or ought not to be established, as a matter of fact is established; and the hon. Gentleman—whatever may be his forecast of the future—can hardly think it probable that in any brief period he will see the connection between Church and State severed throughout the whole of England and Wales. He cannot expect, in the present temper of the public mind, whatever may be his view as to what is desirable, to effect that severance of the Church and State which is part of his political—I had almost said of his religious—creed. But, Sir, so long as the Church and State are connected, surely the very first duty of the State is to see that the Church has power to enforce among her own ranks that morality which is not the property of the Church of England alone, or, indeed, of religious bodies alone, but is the common property of the whole civilised community. I shall appeal, Sir, in support of this Bill, not merely to those who are members of the Church of England, but to every man who desires to see the interests of morality and the interests of religion supported throughout the country. It has been suggested—I hope it is nothing more than a suggestion—that there are some politicians so anxious to see their views on Church policy carried into practical effect that they would prefer seeing the Church of England weighted by this small handful of immoral clergy; they would rather see her lose in public estimation by being compelled to avail herself of the services of these unfit instruments, than lose what they regard as a card in their hands which they might play to secure some political or ecclesiastical triumph. They are prepared, in other words, to purchase what they conceive to be an advantage to some other religious community by seeing what, after all, even they must admit is the largest, one of the most useful, and one of the greatest religious instruments in the country, rendered less efficient for its purpose, because they refuse to do what the Church asks for, and to allow these unworthy clergymen to be deprived of spiritual functions in her midst. I am willing to believe that this suggestion has no foundation in fact. I am not willing to believe that this Bill, which nobody can doubt is an advantage to the Church of England, will be resisted by those who desire rather the advantage of some other religious denomination. I am sure, Sir, that the Members of those other denominations would be the first to express their loathing and abhorrence of the policy which even secular moralists would reject with scorn and disgust; and I hope, therefore, if it be admitted, as I think it must be admitted, that this Bill is one which is required for the amendment of the existing ecclesiastical law, and is one which is urgently needed in order that those few ministers of religion, found here and there in different parts of the country, who are a disgrace to their cloth and that of the religion of which they are ministers, may be deprived of their functions, and which can by no means injure any other religious community in the country—I hope that all of us, to whatever denomination we belong, will heartily join in passing it rapidly through its stages, and in freeing the Church of England from an unmerited reproach for which we shall make ourselves responsible if we do not aid her to get rid of it by using the powers entrusted to us. I appeal to all present, whether they desire the Establishment to be maintained or to be dissolved, whether they think the present constitution of Church and State be right or wrong, at all events to aid in promoting that which we are all agreed is right, and in preventing that which we must all admit is most unquestionably wrong. I beg to move, Sir, that this Bill be now read a second time.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(6.37.) MR. LLOYD - GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I beg, Sir, to move the Amendment which stands in my name on the Paper. The First Lord of the Treasury stated that there was a suggestion abroad that opposition was promoted by endeavouring to perpetuate certain scandals in the Church in order to enforce Disestablishment. To those ready to believe any sinister motives which are attributed to Liberationists it would be idle for me to say anything; but to those willing to be convinced may I point out that never in my recollection has there been a single speech by a prominent Liberationist in Wales which has endeavoured to make political capital out of these cases of scandal? I do not recollect a single instance alluded to in any of these speeches. Every Nonconformist deplores the existence of immoral clergymen, if there be such, and no Liberationist would endeavour to perpetuate those deplorable circumstances. We oppose this Bill on totally different grounds. If it were merely a question of Disestablishment we could do nothing better than support the Bill, for nothing would do so much to widen the agitation in favour of Disestablishment. At a Church meeting the other day an eminent clergyman said—

"I was talking the other day to a dignitary of the Church and a member of Convocation, and he said to me, 'I have come to the conclusion most slowly and reluctantly that the only way out of our troubles is a sweeping measure of Disestablishment and Disendowment.'"

The passing of the Bill would facilitate Disestablishment. Another ground for opposing the Bill is that it will not get rid of the immoral clergymen. The difficulty of the Bishops at present is not altogether one of procedure; it is mainly the difficulty of securing evidence. Witnesses who will give evidence at a private Church meeting object to being taken from Court to Court, badgered, cross-examined, and treated as perjurers. That difficulty this Bill does not touch in the slightest degree. We suggest that the remedy is the emancipation of the Church from the State, which would leave to the Church itself the duty of getting rid of the immoral clergymen, and the Courts would not be Civil Courts, but ordinary Church meetings or meetings of Church dignitaries. Another ground of objection is that the First Lord of the Treasury has not made out a case to justify the setting aside of important legislation for the purpose of passing this Bill. He has made out no case of urgency for it; while there is other legislation of the foremost importance to the mass of the community waiting to come on. There is the question of temperance, affecting the comfort and health of the great mass of the people, and who would for a moment compare the injury done to the security of religion by occasional criminous clerks to that done by the existing temptations to drink? Yet the Government can find time to deal with the ecclesiastical question, but not to deal with the other and more important one. Then there is the question of District Councils, which are necessary to solve the great social problems affecting the rural districts; but the Government cannot find time to deal with that. Is there any urgency for this Bill? The right hon. Gentleman objected yesterday to the Bill for remedying the grievance of Nonconformists as to sites for places of worship on the ground that no case had been instanced where Nonconformists had suffered a grievance in that matter. What instances has the right hon. Gentleman given in support of this Bill; he is very exacting with regard to a Nonconformist grievance, but is very lax with regard to a Church grievance. He instanced one case which has been trotted out over and over again in these discussions; but I maintain that no case has been made out to justify the setting aside of more important legislation to allow of the passing of this Bill. I think the right hon. Gentleman rather made out a case in opposition to the Bill, for he stated that the cases were very few. That was also the view of the Archbishop who introduced the Bill last Session.

and who said that the cases were becoming fewer every year. So we see that the Government can bring in a Bill to deal with a grievance which is constantly diminishing, but it cannot deal with a grievance which is becoming worse year by year. If this were a question of getting rid of criminous clerks, perhaps hon. Members would be prepared to support it; but it is not, and there are other means of getting rid of them. The present law is sufficient for the purpose. The reason given for the introduction of the Bill is the liability of the proceedings to be upset by technicalities, and the cost to the Bishops of appeals. These liabilities the Bishops suffer in common with every other suitor in the country. It was said that one Bishop was delayed five months in getting rid of a criminous clerk, but in the Court of Chancery a man may be delayed five or even ten years, and to meet the cost would have to spend all his available means—and not merely a part of a year's income—and might then by the merest technicality absolutely fail to get the relief which he ought to have succeeded in obtaining. If we are going to improve the procedure, let us improve it altogether, and not so that it will only benefit one or two persons in eight or ten years. This is not a measure to get rid of criminous clerks; it is a Bishops' Relief Bill and nothing else. It is time to get rid of these Clergy Relief Bills. Some time ago the clergy in Wales found their bailiffs' bills getting too heavy, and important measures were stopped to discuss and pass the Tithes Bill, and now we have a Bill to save the patience and purses of the Bishops. It is not right, when such measures as the Irish Local Government Bill are waiting, to bring forward such a measure as this. The Irish Bill was to be the crowning glory of the legislative achievements of the Government, and I submit that no ground of urgency has been shown for putting that Bill aside to pass a measure to cheapen the process for getting rid of criminous clerks. I object to this Bill also on the ground that I do not regard it as part of the functions of Parliament to attend to spiritual matters. I am not concerned now to controvert the right hon. Gentleman's statement that the Establishment will probably continue for some years in England; but I am perfectly within my right in discussing whether it is right of the House of Commons to interfere in matters of this character unless it is in a case of the most crying urgency which it would be utterly impossible to dispose of without a Bill. Parliament is not fitted to deal with these matters. It is elected by people two-thirds of whom are not adherents of the Church of England, and it is elected for secular purposes—for dealing with questions of finance, of peace and war, and for solving great social problems—and not in any sense for dealing with spiritual discipline and questions of that kind. It may be said that the success of the Reformation Parliament proves the fitness of Parliament to deal with such matters; but reform of the Church was the great question in the public mind at that time, and that Parliament was elected specially for dealing with it. This Parliament was specially elected to repudiate a financial transaction relating to land purchase, and the fact that it has carried a worse proposal in spite of its pledges does not fit it to deal with spiritual matters. For that reason I strongly object to the Bill. An eminent ecclesiastical lawyer said that he was quite as anxious as any supporters of the Bill to relieve the Church; but, at the same time, he considered that this relief would be obtained at too great a sacrifice of an important and valuable principle, as it was by supporting a Bill acknowledging the right of interference of the State. We take exactly the same position so far as that is concerned. Sir Walter Phillimore holds that there is a principle that the State ought not to interfere in matters of spiritual discipline, and we cannot on that ground see our way to support the Bill. Assuming even the case of urgency, and the right of Parliament to interfere, I maintain that this is not a fit and proper Bill to pass in relation to such a subject. Looking at the Bill clause by clause, it seems to me to be a most extraordinary one. The first clause provides that—"If a clergyman is convicted of treason or felony, or is convicted on indictment of a misdeemeanour, and on any such conviction is sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour or any greater punishment, or an order under the Acts relating to bastardy is made on a clergyman, or a clergyman is found in a divorce or matrimonial cause to have committed adultery," then the Bishop shall declare the living vacant. If he receives a free pardon, then the Bishop shall re-instate him without making any inquiry at all; he is merely a puppet in the hands of the magistrates, and, moreover, if he refuses after 21 days to carry out that order, then the Archbishop is compelled to declare the living vacant. If I were a member of the Church of England, I would never dream of supporting such a measure as inflicts such an indignity and humiliation upon the Bishops of my Church. What did the late Archbishop of York say about it? He said—

Mr. Lloyd-George

"I may think that a man ought not to be deprived. Am I to come in, thinking all that, and as a mere machine, a mere crier of the Court, to declare him deprived—what I think he ought not to be?"

Certainly, that is a most sensible comment upon it. The second clause is quite as bad—

"If a clergyman is charged with immorality, he may be prosecuted by the Bishop's Court."

The First Lord of the Treasury stated that by consent a clergyman might refer the whole matter to the Bishop's Court. I do not see anything about consent here. But what is the procedure? The complaint is to be investigated by the Bishop; but he is simply to decide whether there is a prima facie case. He is not allowed to decide a question which involves immorality and the spiritual conduct of one of his own clergy. He simply decides whether there is a prima facie case to present, and then he puts it into the hands of a number of laymen.

"If the defendant so desires it, he may call upon five Assessors to decide the matter; two of them to be Justices of the Peace or holders of a judicial appointment."

The right hon. Gentleman made another mistake there. He stated that three of the Assessors should be clergymen and two laymen. There is nothing about that here. There is a provision that the minimum of laymen should be two, but it says nothing about the maximum; and, of course, they may be all laymen. Coming to the third clause, from the statement of the First Lord of the Treasury we were told that this is a Bill to get rid of appeals. What is proposed? That "either Party may appeal upon a point of law." Of course, it is on a point of law that most of these cases have been fought—upon little legal technical questions. Therefore, you do not get rid of the greatest grievance which is the main factor in the introduction of this Bill. The incriminated clerk goes on appealing from Court to Court at the same expense to the Bishop as is already complained of as in existence. If a defendant desires to appeal all he has to do is this—simply to go to an Appellate Court and make out a prima facie case upon an ex parte statement; no one to contradict or oppose him. How very easy a matter it is to make out a prima facie case upon an ex parte statement. If you want to get rid of appeals you must get rid of this clause altogether. Then I wish to call the attention of the House to the fifth sub-section of that clause. We have heard complaints about the delay in getting rid of incriminated clerks. This fifth sub-section says—

"If there is an appeal, the sentence shall be suspended until the appeal is determined or abandoned, and for the purpose of any inhibition be deemed not to have been given."

All the incriminated clerk has to do is this—if he wants to occasion delay, if he wants to retain office, and to create all that scandal which we have heard so much complaint and denunciation about—all he has to do is simply to appeal upon some point of law, and, of course, that takes a very long time before it is decided at all in an Ecclesiastical Court. He gets up some sort of prima facie case, and while the appeal is pending, the decision of the Primary Court suspending him is done away with, and absolutely he carries on his functions and duties exactly as before. Now, there is another clause, the fifth clause of this Bill, which is also a most astounding one. Clause C in that sub-section proposes that, notwithstanding the order for suspending a clerk from his duties, the Secular Court may give him leave to discharge his duties. That is a most extraordinary provision. There is a second sub-section, sub-section B of that clause, which is also a most extraordinary provision—

“The incapacity of a clergyman shall not extend to any preferment which the Bishop of the diocese and the Archbishop of the Province in which it is situated shall allow him to hold.”

That is, a Secular Court can deprive a criminal clerk of the power of exercising his duties in his parish, and the Bishop has no right to interfere at all, whatever his opinion may be, whatever new facts may be discovered, whatever new idea he may have of the innocence of the incriminated clerk—that particular Bishop is not allowed to interfere in that particular parish; but he can give the incriminated clerk power to exercise his functions in another parish. The best thing the Government could do would be to adopt the suggestion made from time to time by Convocation and other Ecclesiastical Bodies to submit the Bill to Convocation, and let them submit their Report upon it to the Government. Then comes the sixth clause, and here, again, I really cannot understand how a Church is to tolerate a section of that character. The matter of expelling a member, a clerk of their own Church, the question of framing rules, is to be handed over to the Rule Committee, which is to consist of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, a Judge of the Provincial Court, and such Archbishop or Bishop as may happen to be members of the Privy Council. At the present moment I believe there is only one Bishop who is a Member of the Privy Council, so that the lay element upon this Committee will predominate. In the Definition Clause I find it stated that the Assessors may consist of police magistrates. What does the proposal all come to? It comes to this: that the Church of England, as the most powerful Spiritual Court in the country, is to be deprived of powers which are inherent in every other Society in the Kingdom, that of expelling its own officers and members; that it is not to enjoy the rights which are exercised by every Parlia. Piccadilly—not only that, but ters. fions of her own Bishops on trovert Lloyd-George spiritual matters are, merely at the requirement of an immoral clergyman, to be subjected to revision by a couple of police magistrates. She is not to be allowed to frame a few simple rules to govern her conduct in matters of discipline, and the Archbishops and high dignitaries in the Church are to be converted into mere “Court criers,” in the words of the late Archbishop of York, to announce the decrees of the Divorce Court, and also bastardy orders against their own clergymen. A more astounding Bill never was heard of. As a Nonconformist it passes my conception to understand the frame of mind which would enable any clergyman, any member of the Church, to tolerate a Bill of this character for a moment. The policy of this Bill seems to be a policy of suspicion at every corner—a constant, incessant, unintermittent suspicion of every act of the Bishops, Archbishops, or spiritual leaders in the Church. It is simply astonishing to me. It simply proves how very demoralising an effect the connection of the State must have upon any Church, that two of her Archbishops should introduce and press forward a measure which inflicts such unmitigated humiliation upon their own order and upon their own clerks. I observe on the Paper that a notice has been placed by the First Lord of the Treasury that this Bill is to be relegated to the Standing Committee on Law. The House will remember that there was a Bill introduced a short time ago on behalf of the Nonconformists with regard to the enfranchisement of places of worship. We knew that there was not the remotest chance of that Bill passing this year unless facilities were given for the purpose; but the right hon. Gentleman not only refused to give any facilities whatever, but actually refused to send it to the Standing Committee on Law. But he not only presses this Bill forward when there is other important legislation waiting for submission—he goes beyond that, and actually proposes to submit the whole of this Bill to the Committee on Law. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that he will gain very little by it.

Mr. Lh

It will be our duty, when it returns to the House of Commons, to discuss every Amendment which we might have proposed and considered if the Bill had passed through the Committee of the House, especially having regard to the fact that he absolutely refused to extend the same courtesy and measure of justice to the Nonconformists as he is now willing to extend to the Church. There is an agitation in the Church for Disestablishment. Even that is preferable to a Bill of this character. When the Church was more the master of the State, instead of being its slave, she did more for the progress of human liberty than she is doing at the present moment. She emancipated the slave, and started the agitation which induced King John to give Magna Charta; and she protected the poor and weak when they were sorely in need of protection. But since she has absolutely surrendered her liberty, there is not a single instance in which the Church has led any emancipating agitation at all. On the contrary, the whole weight of her influence has been cast on the other side. If it were only for that reason, I should give my most strenuous opposition to this Bill. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, whilst deploring the circumstances which have occasioned the introduction of this Bill, considers that it is no part of the functions of the State to attend to matters of Spiritual Discipline,"—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

(7.23.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I have listened with great care to the elaborate speech of my hon. Friend, and with anxiety to take the just measure, so far as I could, of the arguments he has used against the Bill, with regard to which it must be generally admitted that it presents on the face of it very considerable prima facie evidence in favour of its adoption. I confess I was disappointed in my examination of his arguments. I do not think my hon. Friend has failed in his task—that is, I have no reason to believe that any other hon. Member of the House could have made a better case than he has made; but when I look at the arguments themselves by which it must be decided, what do I find? I find, so determined is he to enlist in his service all and every description of plea that it is possible to attach in any manner to the question, that he actually presents it to the House as a reason why we should refuse the Second Reading of this particular Bill that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has, in his judgment, behaved badly in respect to another Bill which was intended to relieve Nonconformists in regard to a particular grievance. Can the misconduct of the right hon. Gentleman—which, of course, I am bound to believe in for the purpose of argument—can the misconduct of the right hon. Gentleman in another case be a reason for one feather's weight why we should do less than justice on this particular occasion? If that be so, what connection is there between the proceedings of the right hon. Gentleman on another Bill and the course which my hon. Friend recommends with respect to this Bill? Now, my hon. Friend said—I think this was the first objection he took—that this Bill would tend to promote Disestablishment. I confess to a certain amount of suspicion that if that were a conviction strongly felt by my hon. Friend there would not have been such a fund of hostility available against this Bill as he has spent so liberally upon the present occasion. After all, most of this argument of my hon. Friend has been put forward because he did not wish broadly to rest his case upon the proposition that being a friend of Disestablishment he wishes to make Establishment so uncomfortable that he will bring those who support Establishment to his way of thinking, and allow him to disestablish the Church. My hon. Friend says—he makes no secret of that in certain parts of his speech—he says that the regulation of spiritual discipline is no proper portion of the duty of Parliament; that we were elected for other purposes. Well, whether we ought to be elected for other purposes exclusively is a very broad question upon which it is not necessary for me to give an opinion upon the present occasion. As regards a certain portion of the country, I myself, 20 years ago, held a pretty strong opinion to that effect, and I did what I could to give effect to it. As regards a portion of this country, I agree with my hon. Friend, and should be prepared to give effect to that opinion; but, broadly, I must join issue with my hon. Friend upon the question whether, because we approve of Disestablishment—I take it in the case of Wales—whether because I approve of Disestablishment I am, therefore, to be justified in saying I will absolutely refuse to cure any defect or to remove any scandal in a Church which I think ought to be disestablished. It appears to me there is no escape from this dilemma. You have got an Established Church in Wales—I am taking the argument upon the broad case most favourable to my hon. Friend's view—we have got an Established Church in Wales. He thinks, and I think, that it would be just to the people of that country that that state of things should be brought to an end; but it is not in my power, or in his power, to bring it to an end at the present time. He knows that the House has refused to do it this year. He does not know when it can be done; but what I affirm most seriously, without the slightest hesitation, is, that when there is a certain legal state of things of which you disapprove, but which entails certain necessary consequences right in themselves, you are bound, when you cannot alter that state of things, to accept the consequences of it, and give effect to what is just, what is politic, and what is prudent under that state of things of which you disapprove. Until my hon. Friend is disposed frankly to admit that proposition, I really hardly know how to get on an equal and fair level ground of argument with him in respect to this case. My hon. Friend finds, as I have said, any argument his ingenuity can suggest good enough to use against this Bill. He takes up very warmly in one portion of his speech the case of the Bishops, and says it is most hard upon them that they should be reduced to the position of mere passive instruments of a Court with which they have nothing to do. Surely, Sir, it is an answer to say that this is a case of volenti non fit injuria. The Bishops have had the opportunity of giving their opinions and their votes in the other House of Parliament. My hon. Friend has said that it would be much better to refer the matter to Convocation. I hesitate very much about adopting that principle. We are dealing not with spiritual matters only, but with the regulating of their civil consequences. The right of a clergyman to his living is a civil right, and the deprivation of the living for an offence which falls within the cognisance of the ordinary laws of the country ought to depend upon the action and the judgment of a civil tribunal. My hon. Friend, I am sure, would not like consciously to make a reactionary speech; but when I heard him deliver his opinion upon that portion of the case, my mind reverted to the period when every crime of a spiritual person—that is to say, of a clergyman—was tried exclusively in a Spiritual Court. It was considered a great advance in the principle of Government when at length clergymen were made amenable to the ordinary law of the land with respect to all offences that are properly the subject of cognisance of the ordinary law. My hon. Friend is not always so kind to the Bishops as he was when he complained of their being made the passive instruments of the Courts of Justice. He has said that the Bishop has no hardship whatever with respect to the costliness of these proceedings. As far as I have heard, the cost was from £1,000 to £2,000 a year to get rid of a delinquent clergyman. Now, many of the Bishops have salaries amounting to £3,000 a year, subject to heavy expenses on the assumption of their office, and to incessant calls of every description. They take part in every benevolent work. Not to speak of social efforts, they have especially to support every movement connected with the spiritual and ecclesiastical welfare of their dioceses. It would be supposed that a man with £3,000 a year, who is generally a married man—and whom the country generally wishes to be a married man—might be in some difficulty if, out of his £3,000 a year, with a diocese of five or six hundred clergymen, he would in a particular year have to deal with a couple of criminous clerks, and having paid £3,000 or £4,000 to dispose of those clerks, he had next to consider in what manner he was to pay his butcher and his baker. In this instance I think the speech of my hon. Friend has not exhibited that acuteness which, I admit, characterised what he said on almost every point he has taken, for he said that the case of a Bishop is simply analogous to that of any other suitor. For my part, I think the case of a Bishop is altogether different. The suitors whom my hon. Friend referred to as suffering great hardships are men prosecuting their own interests; but the case of the Bishops is, I believe, the sole case that you can name in the country of a public officer, who, out of his own funds, given for his own subsistence, is called upon to spend large sums of money in going to law for the purpose of getting rid of a delinquent clergyman. I do not deny that there are difficulties requiring to be seriously pondered in the details of the Bill. My hon. Friend said that a few simple rules could easily be framed by Convocation; but the manner and conditions of depriving men of their property—and they ought to be deprived, I admit—are by no means very simple. On the contrary, these conditions are very serious, and it is for these very reasons that it is desired to go into Committee. It is in Committee on the Bill, and not on the Second Reading, that the objections of my hon. Friend can be considered with care and with advantage. The hon. Member says that this measure will not get rid of criminous clerks. Is that a reason for rejecting it? Do Courts of Justice get rid of criminals in other matters? Would you, if you had no Courts of Justice, reject a Bill for establishing one, because you were told by an opponent of the Bill that it would not get rid of criminals? Then my hon. Friend says that criminous clerks have reached the vanishing point. I am not certain that they have reached the vanishing point. My impression certainly is that they are too numerous for that to be said with accuracy. The clergy of the Church of England number twenty thousand, but happily they are a body mainly devoted to their religious duties, and as much detached from worldly interests, and certainly from actions—in the sense of anything like criminal action—as we can reasonably hope to see. Exceptional cases there will certainly be, and it is perfectly plain that if we have an Established Church in the country, and these cases of exceptions are to be submitted to Parliament in order that they may be appreciably dealt with, and Parliament refuses to deal with them, Parliament becomes responsible for the evil complained of. There is no escape from that. Here are certain evils which are gross evils, within a circle, and if but one case comes up in the Courts in a year, there is ample reason why we should get rid of that case. If we refuse to do so, unless on broad grounds, and intelligible to the people, we become responsible for the mischief of those whom that mischief most grievously affects. My hon. Friend says that the Church of England includes only one-third of the population of Great Britain and Ireland.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I said that the Representatives of Great Britain and Ireland would take part in the discussion of a Bill which does not affect one-third of the population.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: That is precisely what I supposed my hon. Friend said. I entirely differ from him in his estimate of the numbers, but I regard this as a secondary matter. If it were true that the Established Church of England included a minority of the people instead of a majority, that would not constitute, in itself, a valid reason for the rejection of the Bill. Then my hon. Friend says the question is not urgent, but he is not responsible in that point. It is the Government who are invested with the direction, to a certain extent, of the time of the House. The Government say—"There are abuses and scandalous mischiefs which do great evil, offend the country, and disgrace the Church; will you remove them? Say 'aye' or no.' I must answer "aye" or "no." I cannot give a "no," because I cannot for a moment think that it is improper for this matter to be discussed. I will not go into details, but we are called upon to look at certain broad facts, and there is one fact which it appears to me is incapable of denial, and which it is our duty to look in the face. We are dealing with a case that is somewhat peculiar. This is a Bill against a class; it is a Bill to make the law more stringent and severe, I admit, by a change of procedure which is essential, because it makes a difference between the immunity of offenders and the enforcement of an effective discipline. Offences which society condones or looks upon with a certain degree of, perhaps, misapplied leniency, are brought into the Bill, and entail very severe and sweeping consequences; well, this severe and highly penal measure is presented to us by whom? Not by those who are moved by the outcry of the community, but by the very class against whom these severe provisions are directed, and who ask you to make the law strong, and to make it penal in order that they may be preserved from the impurity which offending members import among them. Anti-professional legislation, laws imposing restraint and penalty on particular classes of men are not generally promoted by those classes. Laws of this character only derive their forward impulse from extraneous opinion, and a general movement of the public mind; but here we have a case in which the particular class which is to be subjected to these stringent and severe provisions, are those men who are almost the only petitioners for the passing of this Bill. I must put it even to my hon. Friend that such a state of things as that, such a position as that, does give these parties a very strong claim upon our favourable consideration. The question is asked—who are interested in this legislation? No doubt the whole body of the clergy; no doubt the Bishops, who, so long as they continue to be public officers entrusted with the discharge of their ghostly duties, we must regard as interested parties. But by far the most interested of all are the local communities to whom these guilty clergymen are bound to minister. I set aside all question of Establishment or Disestablishment. As affecting the present measure. I affirm, as a matter of fact—as a matter of social fact—that in the present circumstances of this country, the clergyman, being upon the ground in our parishes, especially in all the rural parishes, is personally so important, not merely from his directly spiritual duties, but from his position in the parish that the entire parish, Churchmen and Non-conformists, are all interested in his character and reputation. I set aside the question of the proportion of Churchmen, whether it is two-thirds or one-third—I do not care what the proportion is—I affirm that the whole local and parochial community has a deep interest in being purged of these plague spots. I ask my hon. Friend not to interpose unnecessarily, not to search with something of feverish heat for arguments of all kinds, in order to put this Bill away. Look stringently if you like at the details of the Bill; take what objection you like to them; state fairly your objection to be called upon to deal with the subject at all. It is quite fair that in considering it you should do it only under protest; but do not attempt to stop the progress of the measure by opposition pushed to lengths which might be undue. When you bear in mind that the main purpose which has been in view is, and must be, not the mere infliction of penalties upon a number of persons, who deserve it—a number which is admitted on all hands to be an extremely small one—not a mere desire to give greater efficiency to the Bishop's office by relieving him of costly charges which are really intolerable—it is your duty, your sacred duty to the parishes of the country, to enable them to have a reasonable hope of seeing the important office—for such it must ever be—of their clergyman, filled by one who does not degrade it by constant misconduct.

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

Mr. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): There are many supporters of the hon. Member for Carnarvon who, believing in the promises of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, look forward to the speedy Disestablishment of the Church in Wales, and, therefore, do not wish to see the time of the House wasted in patching up an institution which is likely to be abolished in a few months or in a year. The attitude of my hon. Friends below the Gangway is this—they refuse to take upon themselves any responsibility for legislating for a State Church. They do not believe in a State Church; they want to see it abolished. They also consider that this House is not a tribunal for the discussion of ecclesiastical matters. It will be remembered that when the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House was recently appealed to to give further time for the discussion of the Eight Hours Bill for miners, he said that it was absolutely impossible to do so. Since then, however, he has been taking up the rights of private Members, and proposes to do so again immediately. When he gets the time he devotes it to the consideration of questions which affect a few score of people. On looking through the Order Book I find that over 230 Bills have been put down for this Session, and I see nothing in this Bill to account for its being singled out from among the others as a Government measure. The Government have even taken away the day that had been set apart for the discussion of the Scotch Crofters' Bill. This Government is not going forward with the interests for which it was elected. It did not come here on a Church programme, but to maintain the unity and the integrity of the British Empire. In that direction there has been a Bill for strengthening the Criminal Law in Ireland, another Bill for the Land Law, and the Local Government Bill; and here, in the last Session of Parliament, we have not even reached the Second Reading of a measure which is to redress grievances in Ireland. Is there any pressing need for this Bill? Do hon. Members on the opposite side consider that there is a pressing need for this Bill? ("Yes.") Then the need has been going on for some time, and they must believe, too, that there are clergymen who have been convicted of treason-felony, or have received orders relative to bastardy, or have been convicted of misdemeanour. I say it is an argument against the Established Church that men continue to countenance that Institution, when they believe that wrongs of such nature are in pressing need. I do not believe that Parliament is likely to be successful in legislation of this kind. The Public Worship Regulation Act, passed by Lord Beaconsfield's Government, was supposed to heal the wounds of the Church; but I venture to say that it caused the Church of England more trouble than any Act passed for many years before. And I doubt greatly whether this Bill will do very much for the Church. A fair argument against this Bill is that it is drawn in a most extraordinary and incomplete way. In evidence of its incompleteness, I may remind the House that, some few months ago, a Carmarthenshire minister—a vicar, I believe—was fined for grossly ill-treating—kicking, I think—a little servant girl in his employ. Such an offence is not touched by this measure; it is only when a clergyman is sentenced to hard labour or any greater punishment, or is guilty of an offence of an indecent nature, that he will be deprived of his living. I have often thought it regrettable that the clergy could not be represented on the Treasury Bench, because many questions arise in Parliament regarding clerical scandals—the use of certain catechisms, for instance, the uneven sentences passed by clerical magistrates, or the refusal of clergymen to lend their schools for political meetings. All these matters ought to be brought within the scope of the measure. Let us make the Bill complete by inserting provisions for a Clerical Department. The Minister for Agriculture would make a suitable head, and he seems to have plenty of time at his disposal. It appears to me that this is an attempt on the part of the Government to establish order in the Church. I approve of order, but I have always thought that the State Church was never in such good order as in the time of Queen Elizabeth, its founder. Why,

I should like to know, is not this Bill made applicable to all ministers of the Church, whether their rank be high or low? It defines a clergyman as one "not being the Bishop of a diocese." To me it seems ridiculous that you should exclude from the scope of this Bill the highest dignitaries of the Church. Slander, too, I consider worthy of inclusion, as well as want of charity, and the boycotting of Political Parties. If, in addition, the measure is not limited in its application to clergymen as now defined, then you will have some prima facie case for the Bill. In closing, I still venture to press upon the Government the wisdom of dropping the Bill and devoting their attention to the measures mentioned by the hon. Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Lloyd-George), to the redress of the more urgent public grievances, and so paving the way for the legislation which will be required to carry into effect the recommendations of the Labour Commission.

(8.20.) MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen, W.): I regret to find myself compelled to vote in a different Lobby to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). His speech marks the distinction which exists between him and many of us. The right hon. Gentleman himself objects to an Established religion, not as an Establishment, but owing to the circumstances which surround it; while we think that an Establishment is bad, not only under the conditions in Wales, but that under no circumstances can it be justified. We do not wish to perpetuate the state of things which this Bill aims at. In common with the right hon. Member for Midlothian, we desire to eliminate these evils, but we believe that a much broader view of the question should be taken. I am sorry to find that the condition of affairs in the Church is such as to draw from the Government a Bill of this kind, and I regret also that that Church should, in this century, be in such a state of bondage as to be unable to remedy for itself those defects which are so apparent to everybody. This question is a wide one, and it opens very serious issues; for if the House passes this Bill tonight, the whole question of Church reform will be opened. One is rather alarmed at the prospect of such a long and tedious journey, alarmed that questions of this nature are to take precedence over those great social questions which the people of this country are demanding. Then I understand that the various sections in the Church are not agreed as to Church reform; and thus it strikes me that if the House of Commons is going to commence that work, it is beginning what will prove a hopeless and impossible task. I agree with the objection taken that this House is not the proper Body to deal with this question. Some of its Members hold religious opinions, but there may be others who are not only out of sympathy with the doctrines taught by the Church, but believe that its faith is nothing more than a vain superstition. A House so constituted is not fitted to regulate the affairs of a religious institution. This is an objection which would occur to a believer in the Christian religion; but there are others not in harmony with religion who are quite entitled to be heard in this House. Their attitude is that the time of this House should not be taken up in dealing with questions which should be dealt with by the Church itself, and which would so be dealt with if the Church were disestablished. And they say, very rightly, that it is unfair that the time of this House should be taken up with the affairs of a religious establishment, when there are so many great social questions pressing for reform. And though, perhaps, these questions do not trench so closely on morality as the progress of an institution in which religion is taught, yet there are measures introduced into this House, and opposed by hon. Members opposite Session after Session—particularly temperance questions—which have a great claim on all who are anxious to support measures for the amelioration of this country, and who desire to promote the cause of morality. I do not know that I should trouble the House much further; but I am bound to say one word in reference to the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, that the great masses of the people are in favour of this Bill. As far as I have been able to gather from some extracts I have seen, I do not think the clergy themselves regard this measure with any very great satisfaction, and I entirely dissent from the statement that the masses of this country are in its favour. I dare say there may be a large section of the community who are; but I think if the great masses of the people were consulted they would say that, although anxious to promote morality, they do not believe this is a question that should take precedence of other questions which have for a long time been before the House. Whenever a great question is before the House—and the right hon. Gentleman indicated that he wished this to be regarded as one—a Member generally has some intimation from his constituents of their opinion in regard to the measure, or in reading the daily newspapers one reads of meetings being held in favour of it, or of some Petition being sent to the House of Commons. But in regard to this Bill I have never heard a single word outside the House, and I attribute it to the fact that people believe this is not the right place nor the right time to deal with the question. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman, in introducing this Bill to the House, seemed to suggest that the hon. Member for Carnarvon had some desire to advance the interests of other religious bodies in opposing this Bill. That is an opinion which the right hon. Gentleman has indicated before to-night as to the aim and motives of Nonconformists whenever they bring forward questions in this House. I remember him, when the Debate on the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales was brought forward, saying that he believed the Nonconformists of Wales, and of England as well, would rather see the money now employed by the Church of England thrown into the sea than that the Church should have the use of it. That shows how impossible it is for the right hon. Gentleman, who is entirely out of sympathy with Nonconformists, to understand the motives and desires which animate their action in this House. It is nothing short of slander to say that it is our desire in opposing this Bill to advance the interests of some other religious bodies. Our objections have been stated to this Bill, and though, perhaps, little good may be done by our discussion in this House to-night, yet I think it will be clear to those outside the House that we are not animated by motives so base as the right hon. Gentleman has suggested. I will, in conclusion, say that I cannot consent, as far as I am concerned, to allow this House to spend its time in re-constructing a religious establishment, and I believe that the good of the Church must be developed within its own walls, and not by a secular body.

Mr. Philipps

* (9.15.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): Both the Member for Midlothian and the First Lord of the Treasury have suggested that we are opposing this Bill because it will retard Disestablishment.

Notice taken, that forty Members were not present; House counted, and forty Members being found present,

*MR. THOMAS ELLIS resumed. Whatever may be my objections to this Bill, that is not one of them, for I believe that the passing of this Bill will enormously hasten and quicken the movement for Disestablishment, and it is a remarkable fact that since this Bill has been brought forward several clergymen of eminence have declared their intention, with a view of securing their freedom, of joining hands with those who approach the question of Disestablishment from a very different standpoint. The Member for Midlothian has come, as he does fairly often, to the rescue of Her Majesty's Government. Whenever the Government have to bring forward some inconclusive Resolution or Bill which they find some difficulty in commending to the House, the right hon. Gentleman comes down and makes a great speech in their favour, and very often takes them out of their difficulty. The speech of to-night was a great debating speech, but it did not make out any real case for this Bill. The First Lord of the Treasury did not bring one single argument or mention one single instance to show that this Bill was much needed. It is true he referred casually to a case to which the Archbishop of Canterbury in another place has referred to once or twice. The Member for Mid Glamorganshire (Mr. Samuel Evans) challenged the Government through the Home Secretary to give a Return for the purpose of the discussion on this Bill. That Return could easily have been prepared, and it would have made out the case for this Bill if a case could be made out. My hon. Friend asked for a Return of the number of clerks who by their conduct have brought themselves within the purview of this Bill. But the Home Secretary refused to grant that Return, and thus completely gave away the case of the Government for urgency. The fact is, there is no demand for this Bill; or, if there is a demand, it is very limited. There is certainly no demand for it from the mass of the electors. The Member for Midlothian had to admit that there are many pressing social questions for the solution of which great masses of the people are anxious, but he dare not stand up in his place and say there is any appreciable demand for this Bill. Is there any demand for it on the part of the clergy? The clergy as a body have not moved for legislation on these lines. It is true that they would like to see the powers of Convocation considerably enlarged, and they desire that the Church should have certain powers of dealing with spiritual discipline; but I venture to think that they have not agitated for such a Bill as this. I admit that the opinion of the Archbishops and Bishops in matters connected with the Church of England is of very great value, but what is suspicious about the action of the Bishops is that they have excluded themselves from the purview of this Bill. Members on both sides of this House, and gentlemen of all religious opinions, are asked at the bidding of the Bishops to examine a state of things in which clergymen are supposed to commit certain crimes; but if the Bishops desire to interrupt the Business of this House by proposals of this kind, they ought to include themselves. It has been proved conclusively by the Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Lloyd-George) that there is already power in the Church to deal with these matters. It is true the process is expensive; but it is too much that the Business of this House should be interrupted, and pressing and urgent legislation delayed, merely in order that this work may be cheapened. It is quite right that all systems of law should be cheap; but I should like the House to remember that large sums of money are paid to the Bishops to meet the heavy charges which arise in the execution of their duties, and this work of getting rid of criminous clerks is incidental to the execution of their duty. I think the proposal would have come with far better grace from the clergy than from the Bishops, who have excluded themselves, and bring the Bill forward with a view of saving themselves expense. I venture to protest against this method of putting a pistol at the head of the House at the instance of the Bishops. We have an objection to the presence of the Bishops in the other House; but so long as they do not waste our time, we may be prepared to quietly acquiesce in their presence; but when the Archbishop comes down and, as an ordinary Member of the Government—the Minister of Agriculture for instance—introduces a measure which was named in the Queen's Speech, it at once demonstrates the anomalous, illogical, and indefensible position which the Church of England occupies in this country. But even if there were a demand for this Bill on the part of the parishioners of the country, on the part of the laity, or of the clergy who will be affected, I should still vote against it as a protest against the system by which we are called upon to deal with questions of spiritual discipline, which should not come before this House, but ought to be dealt with by the religious communities outside the House. Every other religious community has already decided this question for itself, and I protest against this Bill because it is paltry and delusive. The Member for Midlothian has constantly demanded with respect to measures brought before this House, and especially in the case of measures connected with Ireland, that there should be an element of finality, so that the House should no longer be troubled by similar and analogous questions. This Bill has no element of finality ; it only touches the fringe of Church reform ; and if we begin tinkering with this great question, there is a prospect of our time being wasted month after month and Session after Session in the consideration of Bills with which we are not properly qualified to deal, and this to the exclusion of other matters of great social, industrial, and political importance, for the settlement of which we are the one Body that is most capable. I protest also on another ground, which the Member for Midlothian tried to clear away. The First Lord of the Treasury was charged, and as I think very rightly charged, by the Member for Carnarvon with his one-sided and unfair way of dealing with Bills brought before this House regarding the property and powers of various religious denominations. The way in which the right hon. Gentleman has dealt with two or three Bills affecting the freedom and property of Nonconformists is in flagrant contradiction to the manner in which he has dealt with this question. There is, I say, no demand on the part of the mass of the community for this Bill. The First Lord of the Treasury stops the Business of the House and delays carrying out the Government programme at the bidding of the Bishops. What does he do with regard to measures affecting Nonconformists ? Two such Bills have been introduced this Session ; one he opposed, and brought about a well-merited defeat of the Government thereby, the Second Reading being carried, yet he declined to refer it to a Select Committee ; and the other he allowed to be read a second time to prevent a similar defeat, and then referred to a Select Committee, which practically shelves it for the rest of the Session. Both these Bills would do away with a number of grievances affecting a large portion of the population, and yet the right hon. Gentleman makes this unfair and unjust distinction between one religious community and another. I cannot help thinking that when the speech of the right hon. Member for Midlothian is read in the morning, there will be keen and bitter regret and disappointment amongst thousands of Nonconformists, that the right hon. Gentleman should play the game of the Party which refuses from Session to Session to remedy the admitted grievances of the Nonconformist Bodies of this country while he eagerly and anxiously opposes such a proposal as this. The right hon. Gentleman said that we must consider the desires of the local communities, of the parishes ; then why does he not ask this great Establishment to consider them, for at present the people have no voice in the selection of the clergymen, and if they make any protest no real or effective power is given them, and if the clergyman prove unsatisfactory in any way they have no power to secure his expulsion ? The idea of respecting the local communities is, therefore, most unreal and shadowy. The clauses of the Bill have been so exposed by the hon. Member for Carnarvon that there is no need to repeat the criticisms on them, but the right hon. Member for Midlothian admitted that there are several sections and sub-sections which are hopelessly incomplete, some of which are ridiculous in the delays they set up, and the procedure they stereotype. The right hon. Gentleman said that these were matters for discussion in Committee, but the First Lord of the Treasury makes that to all intents impossible by referring the Bill practically to a Select Committee, where there can be no real discussion on the sections. My hon. Friend has shown that the Bill is calculated to make the present condition of things even worse than it is supposed or alleged to be at present. There are words in the Bill which condemn the whole legislation of this House in matters of spiritual discipline. It proposes to give power to a couple of local magistrates, who may be Nonconformists or stipendiaries, to deal with questions of spiritual discipline without further trial, and that is a degrading humiliation to the Church of England, and I am not surprised that clergymen should write to Nonconformist Members saying that they feel it a humiliation that Parliament should pass legislation which will make the Bishops criers of the Court, or under the 3rd clause, which gives them more power, a Grand Jury. I think the passage of such a Bill far from bringing about a final settlement of the question, or making it easier for the Church to do her spiritual work in her own way, and with freedom, will open up questions of wide and deep interest and of a controversial character, and questions which will be brought before this House piecemeal, and will take up much time, and which will never be settled and set at rest except by that measure which will set the Church really free from the control of the State, and give her that power and freedom in spiritual discipline, and in religious work which is now the most priceless heritage of nearly every other religious community in this country. And though charges may be brought against my hon. Friend, and those who protest against this method of legislation, and the interference with other important legislation, I am glad he has exposed the method of the introduction of this Bill, and the ludicrous character of some of its provisions, and has given us an opportunity of entering our protest against a useless and gratuitous waste of the time of Parliament.

Mr. Thomas Ellis

(9.40.) MR. BIRRELL (Fife, W.): I cannot think that my hon. Friends are serious in pursuing their opposition to this Bill, and if they are I condole with them on the feebleness of their efforts, and I am glad that my abhorrence of the Establishment is not built upon the miserable materials and beggarly elements of a score or so of drunken and immoral clergymen. I am not ashamed to say that I listened to the words of the Leader of our Party with something amounting to absolute conviction. My hon. Friend the Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs has put on the Paper an Amendment to the effect that he deplores the conditions, but he is hypocritical in deploring them, for he does what he can to stereotype them, and considers that it is no part of the functions of the State to attend to matters of spiritual doctrine. If he had said "ought not to be part of the functions of the State" he should have had my vote. But when he asks me in 1892, without even a Bill for Disestablishment being on the Table of the House, to say that it is no part of the functions of the State to deal with such matters, I cannot accompany him. So long as the unhappy connection between the Church and State exists, it appears to be an act of cowardice for the House to refuse to do its duty and purge the Church under its control from scandals of this kind. Therefore, having regard to the actual facts, and not living in the clouds, I find it impossible to support the Amendment. The control of the discipline of the Church of England has always been subject matter for treatment in this House. From the earliest times the House has claimed the right of sole control over matters of discipline in the Church, and will rightly claim it so long as the connection continues, and I hope it will assert the right. It is amusing to hear Welsh Nonconformists becoming the mouth-pieces of the "high flyers" of the Church; to hear them trying to excite the House to fury at the insults put upon the Bishops. I should have preferred to hear those statements proceeding from some Member for the University of Oxford, or of some place long associated with orthodoxy and port-wine, and with high views of the rights of the Church as opposed to the State. It is humorous to hear Nonconformists uttering sentiments one would expect to find in the Church Times. The Bishops have been the butt of their peculiar humour for some time, and I hope they will continue to be, so long as they are public officials and not members of a free Episcopal Church. I think my hon. Friends might have been somewhat better employed than they have been to-night, although they have added humour to the debate. We are told there is no call for this Bill, but I should think it would be difficult to get people to meet in their thousands to consider measures of this kind. If I were to advertise that I was going to speak on the Criminal Code, which affects the honour and dignity of the country more than this Bill does, I expect it would be difficult to fill a large hall. We are told that it is the Bishops who agitate in this matter; that it is because they are the persons in whose purview these cases arise, and who have to deal with the criminous clerks. If we were dealing with dishonest solicitors, reform would be advocated by the Incorporated Law Society, and not by mob meetings; and yet a dishonest solicitor does more injury than many anomalies in the Constitution which attract a great deal more public attention. Then we are told there are not many criminous clerks. I cannot help thinking that a cheap procedure or ready way of getting rid of criminous clerks for the irregularity of their lives, would lead to the discovery of many cases requiring immediate attention. Unfortunately, these persons at present escape because the Bishops cannot put the existing machinery in operation against them. Speaking as one anxious for the disestablishment of the Church, I can only hope that the speeches of hon. Members for Wales will be reported verbatim, so that the pious clergy and devoted laity of the Church of England may really become alive to what a state of degradation they are reduced, when, in order to be put in possession of simple, expeditious, and cheap machinery to purge the Church of the scandals occasioned by immoral and unfit persons, they have to come to this House and hear a travesty of their position from the lips of persons who do not belong to their community. I do not belong to it, and have no desire whatever to do so, but I can well believe that this discussion, however much it may have delayed a measure in itself admirable and worthy of all support, will not be thrown away if it induces the clergy and laity of the Church of England to ask themselves, "How long is this state of things to continue?" My hon. Friend agrees with me now; then, after all, it is Disestablishment he is looking forward to. But if I am asked to refuse to give to the Church of England that which the guardians of its order require—namely, a cheap and expeditious method of purging the Church of scandal and abuse, simply because it is considered a good thing to keep the Church in a scandalous condition in order that arguments for Disestablishment may be produced, I will say with Troilus in the play—

Mr. Thomas Ellis

"I cannot fight upon that argument,
It is too mean a subject for my sword."

(9.50.) MR. WADDY (Lincolnshire, Brigg): I think it right that I should state the view which I, as a Nonconformist, take upon this matter. I have no desire for the degradation of the Church of England, for I firmly believe that the purer you make the Church the purer will all Nonconformist sects be, and that the action and reaction of the one on the other is most important and beneficial. Any measure for increasing the purity of one part of Christ's Church is a blessing to all. I believe that, although this is a very silly Bill, a very imperfect Bill, and about as clumsy a Bill in its drafting and in its conception as any ever brought before the House of Commons, I believe its effect, if it has any, will be in the right direction, and I shall feel it my duty to support it. It will serve to some extent, perhaps, to put off the evil day so much dreaded by our hon. Friends opposite, and may for a time divert public attention from the question of Disestablishment. I cannot forget what I have seen and heard of cases in which this Bill would have been of some use. This matter should be approached seriously and properly, for it involves religion—it involves earnest and converted lives, and earnest and real faith, and we must deal with it from that point of view. I believe there is a great want in the Church of England of some such supervision as at this moment they have not got; and the fact that this Bill is at all necessary will, I hope, bring home to the minds of earnest and thinking men of different opinions to my own the conviction that the connection of the Church and State is bad and vicious in principle as in fact. What does it mean? I have known a case in which I appeared on behalf of a clergyman charged with revolting intoxication, public disorder in the open street, misconduct of the grossest and most disgraceful kind, and he, nevertheless, had the courage to say to me, "Well, you know, what is there in all this? I am sober now. I shall be sober next Sunday; I am quite fit to do duty," and without some such measure as this you are utterly unable to touch him, without adopting the ridiculously round about system now in existence. The fact that you have a provision which renders conviction by two magistrates sufficient for your purpose, without the details and dangers of an ecclesiastical prosecution, is of very great importance. The idea that a man, because he has been well-educated to begin with, has taken a degree at Oxford, Cambridge, or elsewhere, has then chosen to adopt Holy Orders as a profession or trade, has succeeded in getting nominated to the cure of souls, is then to be permitted to preach the Gospel in the Church of England or elsewhere, and commit the sacrilege of communicating the sacrament in the Church, without any means of touching him, is to my mind as revolting as anything can be. I shall be glad if any means can be found to deal with that. The Bill will require an enormous amount of alteration in its clauses before it is good for much, but accepting the design, which I believe to be serious, I cannot quite understand what it means. The second clause says—and the same words are repeated elsewhere. What is meant by immorality in the purview of this Act? Is it immoral for a man to be drunk? Opinions differ on that point. Is it an immoral thing for a man to be guilty of lewd conversation, though not of lewd acts? Opinions differ again upon that point. Is it an immoral thing for a clergyman to be the greatest gambler and the most reckless gambler in his parish? Opinions differ again, singularly enough, even upon that point. I venture to think that, as a matter of fact, such men as that would not be hit by this Bill. I see my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for England is there; I hope we are going to hear him. I am perfectly sincere when I say that I am very anxious indeed to hear what his explanation, what his exposition of the law is with regard to this matter. What is the difference between an “immoral act,” “immoral misconduct,” and an “immoral habit?”

“If a clergyman is alleged to have been guilty of any immoral act, immoral misconduct, or immoral habit,”

Mr. Waddy

Then, I should like very much to know is it immoral in this sense for a clergyman to be a tale-bearer, a scandal-monger, and to be making mischief in his parish?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): No.

MR. WADDY: Probably not; although nothing more immoral can be conceived. Is it immoral for a man to be guilty of vagrancy from veracity? Surely we know that it is the most perfectly simple thing in the world to find flagrant instances of this kind, not in one Church, but in many—but we are obliged only to deal with this particular Church which it is proposed by this Bill to affect. I have seen myself—I do not want to prolong the matter—so many illustrations of the mischief arising from the inability of the authorities of the Church of England to cope with the evil which they desire to crush, that I, for one, should be prepared to assist them in obtaining anything almost that they themselves might reasonably ask. But this Bill will do them little or no good. It may be the beginning of something which will do them good. You have quite unfortunately a State Church. I would a great deal rather hand over the whole management and entire government of the Church of England to the authorities of the Church of England; I have perfect confidence in them. I do not belong to that Church myself, and I echo the observation of my hon. Friend who spoke last—I do not mean to, and do not want to—but I am quite prepared to say that I have perfect confidence, as I hope we all have, in the good intentions of those who are the chief authorities of that Church. There are a good many things which clergymen ought not to be allowed to do, and which anybody who has command or control over them ought to have knowledge of, and with regard to which they ought to be allowed to deal with their clergymen, and that are not matters to go before police magistrates. I hope my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General will endeavour to strengthen this Bill a great deal instead of weakening it; the stronger he can make it the better. Disestablishment will come very soon, and come over—whelmingly; but in the meantime, till it does come, let us make the Church as strong, and as pure, and as reliable as she can be made.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS: I think that of all the speeches which it has been my privilege to hear in favour of this Bill the speech which I have just listened to is the most peculiar. The hon. Member first described the Bill in language which I would hardly dare to use, "as bad as can be," "clumsy," and "silly;" and yet he concludes by saying that he intends to vote for its Second Reading. Stranger than that is the fact that in the last observation which he addressed to the House he showed very clearly that he agrees entirely with the Amendment of my hon. Friend; and yet, although he agrees with the Amendment, and although the Bill is "as bad as can be," and "can have no effect," and is "clumsy," and is "silly," the Government are going to have on this occasion the benefit of the vote of my hon. Friend. The support which they have had to-night is almost entirely from this side of the House. First of all, they were supported by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition in a speech which everyone must characterise as excellent from a debating point of view. They have been supported by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for West Fife, who supports the Second Reading of the Bill on the ground that he is in favour of Disestablishment; and yet he taunts us with opposing the Bill because we want Disestablishment. The right hon. Gentleman who moved the Second Reading said the Bill was required by the urgency of the case. He described it as simply a Procedure Bill; but I think that subsequent speeches have shown very clearly that it is not a Procedure Bill; and that it changes entirely the principle upon which members of the Church of England are to deal with the discipline of the criminous clerks. Let us see whether there is any urgency for the Bill, or demand at all. The right hon. Gentleman has not only failed to give any cases in point, but the Home Secretary has been asked to say whether there is any demand or necessity for a Bill of this description. But I am able to quote to the House the authority of the right rev. Prelate the Bishop of Chester, who only yesterday used these words in Convocation—

"With a somewhat sinister sympathy it has been supposed that the Church of England is under some peculiar stress which necessitates her passing or getting this Bill passed at the present time. I believe I am right in saying that there is no such stress, and no particular scandals before the Church at the present time; but we are anxious, and have always been anxious, to repair scandals when they do arise."

Therefore the statements we hear about the mysterious scandals in the Church which it is in the interest of morality and good government to get rid of are in direct contradiction to what the Bishop of Chester said yesterday in the Convocation of York. After that I think it is perfectly clear that there is no urgency at all for dealing with this matter. Some speeches have been made which would lead anyone who listened to them to think that the Church of England did not possess any power already to deal with criminous clerks; but everybody who knows anything at all about Ecclesiastical Law knows the Church of England has already powers for dealing with them. Therefore, it is perfectly idle for the First Lord of the Treasury and those who support him to taunt us by saying that they are the friends of morality, and that those who oppose this Bill have shown that they are on the side of immorality and crime. The Church of England has powers already, and has possessed these powers—I was going to say for ages—for getting rid of these criminous clerks. A right hon. and learned Friend near me says these powers are not sufficient; but it has not been shown that they are not sufficient, and it has been shown conclusively in debate that the sole object of bringing this measure forward is to relieve the pockets of the Bishops. It has been said that the procedure under the Bill would be very much simpler and cheaper than the present procedure; but I am able to quote a very great authority upon that point, the late Archbishop Thomson, who stated in the House of Lords that instead of being cheapened it would be more costly. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, whom we delight to follow on most occasions, but whom, on ecclesiastical matters, we do not blindly follow, as did the hon. and learned Member for West Fife, came down here to support the Government, as he very often does upon ecclesiastical questions; and, without meaning any disrespect at all, I think whatever force there is in the arguments advanced in favour of the Bill is contained in the right hon. Gentleman's speech. The right hon. Gentleman has said—"You have no right to complain, because the people who ask for this Bill are the people to be injured if anybody is to be injured at all," and he used the phrase volenti non fit injuria. But the Bill comes from the Bishops, and not from the clergy who are to be affected by it; and, whatever the conduct of Bishops or Archbishops may be, they cannot be touched under this Bill at all. I should again give the same authority for the proposition laid down that the Bill is disliked by the clergy and not asked for by them. Archbishop Thomson, in the same speech to which I have referred, in 1888, said that to the clergy in his diocese the measure was far from acceptable, the reason being that it provided novel Courts; that there would be a difficulty in working these novel Courts, for which new Judges would have to be appointed, and for whom the country would have to pay; that every diocese would have one of these Courts; that there would be from 180 to two hundred of these new Judges; that the procedure would be more expensive than before, and that there would be great difficulty in getting all the Judges to work harmoniously together. What, then, becomes of the statement that the Bill is demanded by the clergy? There is no demand for this Bill on the part of the clergy. Those who require it are only the Archbishops and Bishops, who are not only Ecclesiastical Authorities, but State Authorities. I will read what the Church Times said upon the subject last month. It said—

"The Clergy Discipline Bill is not backed by any single Member of the Government. The Archbishop of Canterbury is alone responsible for it, notwithstanding that Mr. Mr. Samuel Evans Balfour has declared it to be a Government measure. If his Grace should unfortunately succeed in his short-sighted policy, sober-minded Churchmen will be compelled seriously to ask themselves whether it is not necessary to proceed to some definite means of vindicating the spiritual character of the Church of Christ, and marking the clear distinction between the civil and spiritual authority. We believe, however, that this Erastian Bill has not the slightest chance of becoming law."

I want to know why this Bill is to be forced upon the clergy? If the right hon. Gentleman had been here, I should like to have reminded him of what he said in this House on 9th July, 1874. He then said—

"I do not like to pass a Bill which by silence and implication gives protection to an illegality, provided the illegality be committed by a Bishop. . . . I have a reasonable respect for Bishops. . . . But if instead of Bishops they were saints or angels, I would not be a party to pass an Act of Parliament to enable them to break the law without the consequences which follow a breach of the law."

On 17th July of the same year the right hon. Gentleman also said in this House—

"The right hon. and learned Recorder (who was in charge of the Bill) ought to take the initiative in proposing that the Bill should be made applicable to illegal conduct on the part of the Bishop, as well as to offences committed by incumbents. . . . It seemed to him highly inexpedient, especially in the case of a Bill framed under episcopal sanction, and which had for its object to establish loyalty in too bare and naked a form, that an immunity so unnecessary and so useless should be established on behalf of the Bishops themselves."

I think the Government should tell us whether they mean to include in Committee the Bishops within the operation of this Bill. The Bishops themselves are assuming a very curious position in reference to this question. At the Diocesan Conference on 26th April, 1892, the Bishop of London said—

"The effect of the law of the State is this: that if this Clergy Discipline Bill passes into law the State will say, 'He is an officer of the State as well as of the Church, and we shall impose on him the duty of declaring the benefice vacant.' The Church will say in reply, 'He is one of my officers, and he holds a position under my jurisdiction, and we shall impose on him the duty of declaring the benefice vacant, so far as we are concerned.' Thus we should act concurrently, and what the Bishop said as an officer of the State would have its own effect on one side and likewise on the other as a Bishop of the Church, and there would be no collision between the two, and no possibility of disputing that the State deprived him of that which belonged to the Church, and of that which belonged strictly to the jurisdiction of the Church. That was the aim we had in view in preparing this Canon, and it requires some care and trouble to make such a Canon as this, for it, at the same time, raises all sorts of controversies."

I would ask the Government what would happen if a Bishop, after a conviction by a temporal Court, were to refuse to declare the living vacant? I suppose he would be guilty of misdemeanour, but I would not pledge my reputation as a lawyer upon that point. Archbishop Magee's argument, as stated by Lord Grimthorpe in the House of Lords, was as follows:—

"I resent the idea of being ordered to come into Court as the executioner or crier of a Court, to proclaim a judgment which I may differ from. I shall have read the proceedings in whatever Court has ordered the man to be deprived. The Chancellor, who may have proceeded under the rules of procedure which are to be made, or the Civil Court may have decreed the deprivation; but I may think that the man ought not to be deprived. Am I to come in thinking all that, and as a mere machine—a mere crier of the Court—to declare him deprived when I think he ought not to be?"

There is a most astounding provision in the 5th section of the Bill. It is that part which confers upon a Bishop the power to re-appoint an incumbent who has been guilty of these contemptible crimes to a preferment. But how are you to get rid of immorality in the Church of England—if it does exist—if you give the Bishop the power to say what is to follow a conviction in a temporal Court—if you give the Bishop power to override the whole principle of this Act? Sub-head B, Section 2 of Section 5, enacts that—

"Where by virtue of anything in, or done under this Act, a clergyman becomes incapable of holding preferment, his incapacity (a) shall cease if he receives a free pardon from the Crown; and (b) shall not extend to any preferment which the Bishop of the diocese and Archbishop of the province in which it is situate after such public notice, if any, as they think desirable, allow him to hold."

If this House is going to exercise the power, which it undoubtedly has by Act of Parliament, to deprive certain persons of their living, is it reasonable in the same Act to give authority to the Bishop to replace in that preferment, or in any other, a man who may have been guilty of these charges? In that respect the Bill is as unreasonable as it can be. The question of delay has been fully dealt with by the hon. Member for Carnarvon (Mr. Lloyd-George). It is proposed in the Bill that there shall be power to institute these proceedings within five years of the date of the offence, so that a clergyman may, presumably, go on living an immoral life, or observing a course of conduct far from good, for a term of five years without any proceedings at all. Thus under this Bill there will be no speedier remedy for these matters than at present exists. Then the country has to decide the serious question whether it will go in for the expense of instituting these Courts. The right hon. Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) said it was not reasonable to expect the Bishops receiving the small salary of £3,000 to pay these heavy law expenses, but the Bishops take their fees and emoluments for the express purpose, among others, of carrying on these legal proceedings. At any rate, it cannot be doubted that a Bishop, accepting that salary, knows that he may be called upon to pay these legal expenses. What I think the country has a right to complain of is, that you are not going to use the funds of the Church of England at all, but that you are going to institute these Courts of Legal Assessors all over the country, instead of Chancellors of the Consistory Courts, and that the country is to have the privilege of paying for them instead of the Bishops as hitherto. I protest against this additional burden being placed on a country already too heavily burdened in support of ecclesiastical establishments. I see no reason why this Bill should be confined to cases where an incumbent has been sentenced to imprisonment with hard labour. Members who have not studied its provisions will be surprised to learn that a clergyman committed by a temporal Court and sentenced to imprisonment without hard labour, or, instead, very heavily fined, does not come within the purview of this Bill. It is an extraordinary proposal that the benefice of an incumbent, who has suffered hard labour is to be confiscated, while another incumbent, who has suffered any term of imprisonment without hard labour, is not to be displaced until proceedings are taken against him under a different part of the Bill. From this it appears to me that the Bill, so far as concerns offences, requires much amendment. The next clause of the Bill (6) is one that also should receive the serious attention of Parliament. Previously, difficulties have arisen, Session after Session, in dealing with the matter of clergy discipline. Last year's Bill consisted of some thirty-two or thirty-three clauses, but, towards the close of the Session, it was proposed to drop the last twenty-eight, and proceed only with the first four. That intention, however, was not persevered in, or, at any rate, was not successful. Now the promoters of the Bill, knowing that the procedure, as sketched out in last year's Bill, would be opposed by their supporters in this House, actually give the whole of the authority of Parliament, with the establishment, procedure, and government of these Courts, to a Rule Committee. I think I may say that never before, in any single Act of Parliament, were such powers delegated to a Rule Committee. And I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the Rule Committee is to be allowed to enact what I think consisted of fifteen clauses in the Bill of last year. Yet this year, for the sake of facilitating the passage of the Bill, the promoters have inserted this clause, deputing all the power to the Committee. Section 6 says:—

"The Rule Committee, that is to say the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of England, the Judge of the Provincial Court, and the Archbishops and Bishops who are members of the Privy Council, or any three of the said persons, two of them being the Lord Chancellor and one other of the aforesaid judicial persons, may make rules for carrying this Act into effect, and in particular for regulating all matters relating to procedure, practice, costs, expenses, and fees under this Act, including the appeals (so far as rules made by the Privy Council or the Judicial Committee do not extend) the appointment, as Deputy Chancellor, of a barrister of not less than seven years' standing or the holder of a judicial appointment, the obtaining and choosing of assessors, the place of sitting of the Court, the passing of sentences, the validity of proceedings notwithstanding defects of form or irregularity, the application of this Act to a clergyman who cannot be found, or holds no preferment, or several preferments, the liability to, and recovery of, costs and expenses, the forms to be used and all matters incidental to, or connected with, the administration of justice under this Act."

Mr. Samuel Evans

These are powers which Parliament ought never to delegate to any authority, and particularly to such an authority as is proposed in the Bill. Clergymen themselves think so. Now this Bill, as I have shown, is entirely incomplete, inadequate, and is bad in its character. It gives rise to demands for privileges of various kinds on behalf of the clergy. It would be idle for any class of persons in these days to come to this House and ask for special rights of appeal in cases where proofs might be taken against them, and yet this is one of the objects of this Bill. In the other House there was actually a proposal made—I do not know whether it was carried out or not—by the Bishop of Manchester that there should be for the clergy, and the clergy alone, an appeal from the Quarter Sessions in cases of affiliation orders, appeals which do not exist for any other persons at the present time. Well, if the Bill is disliked by the clergy, and is bad in its character, as I hope I have shown it to be, I think Parliament should not pass it through the Second Reading. In these days it is difficult to get Parliament to give attention to those matters in favour of which large bodies of the community have made up their minds. Several measures have been alluded to by my hon. Friend which should be dealt with by this Parliament. One, however, has been overlooked, and I will refer to it as an illustration, because it is a measure which has been promised in the Queen's Speech over and over again. When the Clergy Discipline Bill was in the humble position of being a private Member's Bill we were promised an Employers' Liability Bill. That Bill, we are told, the Home Secretary is dying to pass for the benefit of the working classes. The right hon.

Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) has said that Parliament is responsible unless it removes the grievances which exist in any particular quarter. It follows, then, that Parliament is responsible for the position in which workmen are placed—a position which oftentimes results in fatal or serious accidents; and I think it is nothing less than a scandal—and I use the word advisedly—that we are not allowed to discuss a measure of that kind, but are invited to waste the time of Parliament on ecclesiastical questions. We do not desire to see immorality continued in the Church of England. We are glad to hear it said over and over again that the cases are very few, and we believe them to be so. But we say those cases, if they exist, should be dealt with under the present powers; that although Parliament has technically a right while the connection exists between Church and State, yet it should not be called upon to deal with a question of this kind, and I hope we shall have strong support from hon. Members when we vote against the Second Reading, and oppose it in its subsequent stages if occasion requires.

(10.50.) MR. MAC INNES (Northumberland, Hexham): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be a strong thing to say that the clergy as a whole are opposed to this Bill. We know perfectly well that the High Church party are not satisfied with it, and we all understand their reasons for this dissatisfaction. Still, the opinions of the various Diocesan Conferences throughout the country have been, as a rule, entirely in favour of it. It is, of course, difficult to say what may be the attitude taken by the laity generally, but we may ask what is the view of those two elected and fairly representative bodies—the two Houses of Laymen. I believe I am right in saying that the House of Laymen of the Convocation of Canterbury were unanimous in this matter. And in the Northern Province one of the first things brought before the House of Laymen was the consideration of matters in connection with this Bill, and in a full assemblage of gentlemen representing very different sections of the Church of England there was a unanimous expression of approval. When, therefore, we find such bodies as the Houses of Laymen in both Provinces expressing distinct approval of the Bill, it seems to me that it is rather an exaggeration to say it is being forced on the Church of England and meets with dislike in that quarter.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the House should now come to a decision upon the Second Reading of the Bill. As I think that everyone will feel that the question of the Second Reading and the question of referring the Bill to the Grand Committee should be disposed of before twelve, I earnestly press the House to decide upon the Second Reading at once.

(10.55.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I think the right hon. Gentleman should make some allowance for the strong conviction of a considerable number of Members on this side of the House that this measure is exceedingly ill-devised and of ill-omen for the spiritual and moral welfare of this country. Our convictions are quite as strong as his own, and as he is a man of conscientious convictions, he may be expected to have sympathy with others although they differ from him. I cannot help remarking that the right hon. Gentleman, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, was rather uncharitable towards those who might oppose the measure. In very strong language, and with a kind of elegant invective of which he is master, he condemned as worthy of scorn and contumely all those who should oppose it. He could not conceive how anyone could oppose it except in the interest of the Liberation Society. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman showed much charity. I can assure him that the members of that Society—although some of us are members of it—are incapable of any such uncharitable modes of considering ecclesiastical questions. The object of the Liberation Society is the freedom of religion, the purity of religion, the spirituality of religion, and anything that tends to lead to that the Liberation Society is always anxious to support. Therefore I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman has any right to expect that those who entertain conscientious convictions on the subject should consider that a single evening is too much to devote to the discussion of the Bill on its Second Reading. No legislation of this kind is needed by the Kirk of Scotland. They manage to deal with their criminous clerks without such interference. Why, then, cannot the Established Church of England be made as free and able to deal with the conduct and discipline of its clergy as the Established Kirk of Scotland? The Episcopal Church in Scotland and the Episcopal Church in the Colonies are quite able to manage their own affairs; and I think they have managed their affairs quite as well without the aid of the law as the affairs of the Church have been managed in this country. We say that the Church of England should be made as free to deal with their criminous clerks as any other Churches. We have no wish to bring about the degradation of the Established Church. The right hon. Gentleman is, perhaps, not aware that we do not discern any difference between one Church and another. We believe there is a fair amount of truth and falsehood in them all; we wish that all Churches should be as pure as possible, and it is not fair that an attempt should be made to discredit us by saying that we desire to degrade the Church of England. Here we are in 1892—(laughter)—and that is a far more significant fact than some hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to think. The lifetime of the Church has been, say, eleven hundred or twelve hundred years, and it has been in the power of the Legislature for three hundred and fifty years to provide for the discipline of the clergy, and in former years Parliament was far more free to deal with matters of this kind than we are who have Small Holdings Bills and Employers' Liability Bills to distract our attention. But we are told that all the Statutes which have been passed to secure the discipline of the clergy are so much waste paper, and that we must push aside Small Holdings and Employers' Liability in order that we may pass this Bill. This shows the utter impossibility of expecting Parliament to deal with matters of this kind, and it is because we regard measures of this kind as utterly ineffective and as only making confusion worse confounded, that we oppose any fresh attempts of this kind. We also protest against the fact that all recent Clergy Discipline Bills and Ecclesiastical Bills have involved certain slights upon those subjects of Her Majesty who do not profess themselves members of the Church of England. If it is a National Church it is equally a Church for all of us, and we are told that we are all responsible for the interests of the Established Church. In the Bill of last year it was specially stated that the two lay Assessors who are to assist the Bishops in dealing with criminous clerks were to be laymen professing the principles of the Church of England. I know there is no clause of that kind in this Bill; but, I ask, do the Government intend that any of these lay Assessors should be Nonconformists? Certainly they do not. There is a clause which deals with devising the rules for the choosing of these Assessors; and does anyone suppose that a Committee consisting largely of Bishops and Archbishops will not provide against the intrusion of Nonconformists into the Court of Assessors? Of course they will. In fact, all Bills of this kind that have been brought forward have treated the idea that Nonconformists are in any way responsible for matters of detail in connection with the Church of England as simply absurd and almost insolent. This House represents a United Kingdom, two-thirds of the population of which do not belong to the Church of England; and we who do not belong to the Church of England, and who may be heretics or infidels, are called upon to pass Acts concerning the Church; but when it comes to carrying out those Acts in detail—which certainly is of inferior importance to the Act in the first instance—and judging whether a parson has been drunk or has paid his debts, no man is allowed to be a member of the Court of Assessors unless he is a bona fide member of the Church of England. I think the thing is perfectly absurd, and ought to be laughed out of existence. I have a document which has emanated from the Council of the English Church Union, and I do not think hon. Gentlemen opposite can consider that a very dangerous document. In a prefatory note to this document are these words—

Mr. Picton

“Clergy discipline is primarily a question concerning spiritual jurisdiction. The great question is, is this man fit any longer to have the cure of souls?”

How can Acts of Parliament devise means for dealing with a question like that which depends upon so many subtle spiritual characteristics, and cannot be dealt with by any stiff, hard system of law? Take the very first clause of this Bill. It provides that if a clergyman—and I trust the cases would be few—has been convicted of felony or misdemeanour, and sentenced to hard labour, or has had a bastardy order made against him, or has been proved guilty of adultery in a Divorce or Matrimonial Court, the Bishop as the mere mouthpiece, the mechanical speaking-trumpet of the Court, shall declare the living vacant. But if the convicted clergyman receives a free pardon his incapacity ceases. But free pardons are given for a variety of considerations; not only because a man may be innocent, but because there may have been some technical flaw in the evidence, or because, being a member of a crew of criminals, he turns Queen's evidence. This Bill would apply in any of those cases. We have known cases of clergymen who have been concerned in fraudulent cases, and if one of them were to turn Queen's evidence and receive his pardon he would instantly be re-instated. A Queen's pardon is a matter of secular jurisdiction altogether. It is a matter of policy, and has no relation to the fitness of a man for the cure of souls, and I have very great sympathy with the Council of the English Church Union in doubting very much whether a Bill like this is calculated to decide the fitness of a man for the cure of souls. It is because of this, and not from any desire to maintain the imperfections of the Established Church, that we believe this Bill is wholly unfit and insufficient for the purpose. It will not rid the Church of criminous clerks, and is entirely inadequate to decide whether a man is fit to have the cure of souls; and for these reasons we intend to vote against it, even if there are only five or six to go into the Lobby, and I believe we shall have the sympathy of a very large number of the people on our side. Where are the men who support this Bill? The hon. Member for Hexham talks about the lay members of Convocation? How are they elected? I do not know. I have never heard of a rush to the poll for the election or of the necessity for closing the public-houses on the occasion. Nobody knows how they are elected, and they certainly do not represent any considerable amount of public opinion. There is no public opinion asking for this Bill. There is Church public opinion protesting against it, and we only unite with that in saying that it is utterly unworthy of the dignity of this Parliament and of the Church, in the interests of which it is supposed to be promoted, and I shall therefore vote against it.

(11.17.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR rose in his place, and claimed to move, “That the Question be now put.”

(11.20.) Question put, “That the Question be now put.”

The House divided:—Ayes 197; Noes 58.—(Div. List, No. 87.)

Question put accordingly, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question.”

(11.30.) The House divided:—Ayes 231; Noes 26.—(Div. List, No. 88.)

(11.42.) Mr. A. J. BALFOUR claimed “That the Main Question be now put.”

Main Question put accordingly.

(11.40.) The House divided:—Ayes 230; Noes 17.—(Div. List, No. 89.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law, &c."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(11.55.) MR. SAMUEL EVANS : The right hon. Gentleman earlier in the evening asked that the discussion should be brought to a close in order that we might come to a decision upon the question whether this Bill should be referred to the Standing Committee on Law. It is obvious that we have no time for the proper and adequate discussion of the question now whether this is a Bill which should be so referred, or whether it should be dealt with in Committee of the whole House? The character of Bills referred to the Standing Committee on Law is that they consist almost entirely of matters of procedure, and no matter of principle comes in. If that is the correct principle upon which Bills are referred to this Standing Committee, as I think it is, then I think it will be obvious that this is a Bill which should be discussed in Committee of the whole House. Indeed, I gathered from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian an anticipation that the Bill would come on for discussion in the ordinary way in Committee of the whole House. He referred to many points raised by my hon. Friend (Mr. Lloyd-George), and said these were points to be determined after full discussion in Committee, and I think it was obvious from his remarks that he had in view Committee of the whole House. I hope the Leader of the House does not intend to force a decision on this Motion to-night. Subject to your ruling, Sir, it will be impossible for any Member to move an Instruction to the Committee, because it is necessary to give notice of such Instruction, and this we shall be precluded from doing if this Motion is now persisted in. But reverting again to my argument that questions of principle should not be relegated to this Standing Committee, let me point out that very early in the Committee discussion will arise a question upon the words "a Bishop may declare a living to be vacant." With an Amendment to omit the words "a Bishop may declare" there arises an important principle upon which controversy has long raged in the Church, Erastians and Anti-Erastians being diametrically opposed on point of principle. Questions of principle, and not merely of procedure, at once arise, and I maintain that precedent is against sending such a Bill to the Committee on Law. There was a Bill which affords a precedent for such a case as this, when the Government raised the objection. I now urge—

(11.59.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER : No doubt the time allowed for the discussion of this Motion has been very short; but in considering the rights of a minority it is essential to take into account the use which the minority have made of the time at their disposal. I shall put the Question.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(12.0.) The House divided :—Ayes 193 ; Noes 41.—(Div. List, No. 90.)

Question put accordingly, "That the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law, &c."

(12.10.) The House proceeded to a Division, and Mr. Deputy Speaker stated he thought the Ayes had it, and on his decision being challenged, it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed; and he directed the Noes to stand up in their places, and Fourteen Members having stood up, Mr. Deputy Speaker declared that the Ayes had it.

Bill committed to the Standing Committee on Law, &c.

MOTION.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 2) BILL.

On Motion of Sir M. Hicks Beach, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders made by the Board of Trade, under "The General Pier and Harbour Act, 1861," relating to Canna, Fleetwood, Mevagissey, and Newlyn, ordered to be brought in by Sir M. Hicks Beach and Sir J. Gorst.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 304.]

House adjourned at twenty minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 29th April, 1892.

MR. SPEAKER'S INDISPOSITION.

The House being met, the Clerk at the Table informed the House of the unavoidable absence of Mr. Speaker, owing to the continuance of his indisposition. Whereupon Mr. Courtney, the Chairman of Ways and Means, proceeded to the Table; and, after Prayers, took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to the Standing Order.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).
(CHAIRMEN'S PANEL).

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection that they had selected the following six Members to be the Chairman's Panel and to serve as Chairmen of the two Standing Committees to be appointed under Standing Order 49:—Mr. Campbell-Bannerman, Sir Henry James, Mr. Osborne Morgan, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Sir Matthew White Ridley, and Mr. Salt.

Ordered, That the Report do lie upon the Table.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY reported from the Committee of Selection that they had nominated the following Members to serve on the Standing Committee for the consideration of all Bills relating to Trade—including Agriculture and Fishing—Shipping, and Manufacture which may, by Order of the House, be committed to such Standing Committee:—Mr. Addison, Mr. Asher, Mr. Barnes, Mr. Barran, Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Sir Edward Birkbeck, Mr. Bolitho, Mr. Bonsor, Mr. Boord, Mr. A. H. Brown, Mr. Brunner, Mr. Burt, Mr. Carew, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, Mr. Childers, Mr. Jesse Collings, Mr. Colman, Mr. Craig, Sir Charles Dalrymple, Baron Henry de Worms, Mr. Dixon-Hartland, Sir George Elliot, Mr. Thomas Ellis, Colonel Eyre, Mr. Hayes Fisher, Mr. Penrose Fitzgerald, Mr. Gibbs, Mr. Gilliat, Sir Julian Goldsmid, Mr. Grotian, Mr. Timothy Harrington, Mr. Heath, Sir William Houldsworth, Mr. Howell, Mr. Hoyle, Mr. Jackson, Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Macartney, Mr. J. M. Maclean, Mr. M'Lagan, Mr. Morrough, Mr. Mowbray, Mr. Mundella, Mr. Murray, Mr. Murphy, Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Sir Richard Paget, Sir Joseph Pease, Mr. Rankin, Mr. Rathbone, Mr. Roche, Mr. Edmund Robertson, Mr. Round, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Sheil, Mr. William P. Sinclair, Mr. Samuel Smith, Mr. Mark Stewart, Mr. T. D. Sullivan, Mr. Tomlinson, Sir George Trevelyan, Sir Richard Webster, Mr. Stephen Williamson, Mr. C. H. Wilson, Mr. Winterbotham, and Mr. Wood.

Sir JOHN MOWBRAY further reported from the Committee of Selection that they had nominated the following Members to serve on the Standing Committee for the consideration of all Bills relating to Law and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure which may, by Order of the House, be committed to such Standing Committee:—Mr. Tyssen Amherst, Mr. Asquith, Mr. Atherley-Jones, Mr. J. B. Balfour, Mr. Bartley, Mr. Beach, Mr. Jacob Bright, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Caldwell, Sir Edward Clarke, Mr. Coghill, Dr. Commins, Mr. Radcliffe Cooke, Mr. Donald Crawford, Mr. Cremer, Mr. Darling, Sir John Dorington, Mr. Dugdale, Mr. Arthur Elliot, Mr. John Ellis, Sir Thomas Esmonde, Mr. S. T. Evans, Mr. Lewis Fry, Mr. Forrest Fulton, Mr. Herbert Gardner, Mr. Herbert Gladstone, Mr. Gurdon, Mr. Haldane, Mr. Hall, Sir Charles Hall, Sir W. Vernon Harcourt, Sir Edward Harland, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Staveley Hill, Mr. Hinckes, Mr. Samuel Hoare, Mr. Hobhouse, Mr. Isaacs, Sir Ughtred Kay-Shuttleworth, Mr. Kenyon, Mr. Knox, Mr. W. F. Lawrence, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, Mr. Llewellyn, Mr. Lockwood, Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. Madden, Mr. Mahony, Mr. Story-Maskelyne, Mr. Matthews, Mr. Milvain, Mr. John Morley, Mr. Mulholland, Mr. Muntz, Mr. William O'Brien, Sir Charles Pearson, Mr. Pickard, Mr. Picton, Mr. John E. Redmond, Mr. Bryn Roberts, Sir Albert Rollit, Sir Charles Russell, Sir George Russell, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Ernest Spencer, Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Whitmore, and Mr. Stuart Wortley.

Reports to lie upon the Table.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL
(GENERAL POWERS) BILL.

COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich) rose to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to consider the desirability of inserting a Clause enabling the Clerk of the County Council of London to correct the Totals of the Valuation Lists, so far as the same have been affected by the decisions on any rating appeals, and that Section 44 of 'The Valuation of Property (Metropolis) Act, 1869,' should apply thereto as if such correction had been duly made on an appeal against Totals."

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have considered the terms of the Motion for an Instruction of which the hon. Member has given notice. The Bill to which it refers is an omnibus Bill, but I do not find that any one of the clauses deals with any matter cognate to the subject of the Instruction, which, therefore, cannot be entertained, not being in order.

QUESTIONS.

HIGHER CLASS SCHOOL INSPECTORS.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he can state the names of the gentlemen employed for the inspection of higher class schools last year, and the fees paid to them respectively?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): It is not possible within the limits of an answer to give the information desired. But the hon. Member will obtain his information if he will be so good as to call at the Scotch Education Department.

THE CONVICTS RICHARDSON AND EGDELL.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why the convict Charles Richardson, who has served ten years, is still detained, though George Egddell, convicted for the same crime, was released?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Egddell and Richardson were each sentenced to five years' penal servitude, not ten as stated in the question, in November, 1888. Egddell was released on licence this month, six months before the ordinary time for licence, on the ground of his age, and because he was the first to make voluntary confession of a crime of which two other men had been convicted. Richardson will be due for licence in August next, if he has been of good conduct while in prison.

STREET OBSTRUCTION IN LAMBETH.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will issue instructions to the Chief Commissioner of Police to move on the crowd of betting men and others, who obstruct the pavement at the corner of York Road, Lambeth, every Monday, in a similar fashion to the way in which the crowd of Socialists was moved on at the World's End, Chelsea?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Chief Commissioner that the men who congregate at the place in question are not betting men, but theatrical and music-hall artists, who meet there daily, but in specially large numbers on Mondays, in order to make arrangements with the agents who live near by. This has been a custom for many years past, and no complaints have been made to the police of annoyance or obstruction to traffic.

CIVIL SERVICE COPYISTS.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what is the present number of Civil Service Writers on the register; how many have taken the gratuity since the issue of the Treasury Minute of 21st December, 1886; how many are in receipt of a bonus, and how many of a special rate of pay; and what is the total number of writers already promoted to the position of abstractor or assistant clerk?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The number of Civil Service copyists at present on the register is 730; 353 have taken the gratuity since the issue of the Treasury Minute of 21st December, 1886; 476 are in receipt of bonus. The number in receipt of a special rate of pay cannot be definitely stated, as it varies according to the circumstances and requirements of departments from day to day; 147 copyists have been promoted to the position of abstractor or assistant clerk.

TIES IN COUNTY COUNCIL ELECTIONS.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the election for a County Councillor for Maryport North, in Cumberland, in which the two candidates having received an equality of votes, and the Returning Officer having declined to give his casting vote, the result is that the County Council Division in question is at present without a representative; and whether he can suggest the proper course to be taken, or, in the event of legislation being necessary, he can hold out any hope of the required legislation being promoted by the Government?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The facts are, I believe, as stated by the hon. Member. It appears to me that it is a matter of regret that the Returning Officer did not exercise the power conferred upon him by the Statute of giving a casting vote in the case of an equality of votes; but, under the circumstances, I apprehend that if it is desired that a further election should be held, the only course is to apply to the High Court for the issue of a mandamus for the purpose.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Will it not be possible to introduce legislation to make the meaning clear? I fancy a Bill with that object would not meet with any opposition.

*MR. RITCHIE: The provision regarding election is that of the Municipal Corporations Act, which was incorporated in the Local Government Act. The terms of the Municipal Corporations Act appear to raise a difficulty, and I think it is extremely desirable that some method should be found to rectify what is undoubtedly a serious omission, but I am afraid I cannot promise immediate legislation.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE (Surrey, Reigate): I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that a similar case occurred at Reigate, Will the right hon. Gentleman say whose business it is to apply for a mandamus?

*MR. RITCHIE: Anyone in the locality who is interested in the matter can move the High Court for a mandamus.

SIR TREVOR LAWRENCE: Any voter?

*MR. RITCHIE: Yes.

THE ENFIELD FACTORY AND SWORD CONTRACTS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if any orders for swords, cavalry, naval, and others, have been given to contractors; and if Enfield is without orders for swords at the present time?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): No orders for any kind of swords have been given for some time, either to the trade or to the Royal Small Arms Factory. The orders for this year are about to be given out, and care will be taken to keep the Enfield factory employed.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Do I understand that Enfield is at present without orders for swords?

MR. BRODRICK: I believe the orders are just being completed, but care will be taken to renew the Enfield orders.

VOLUNTEERS AND JURY SERVICE.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he can state when the Lord Chancellor will introduce the measure contemplated dealing with the Jury Laws; and, if, having regard to the facts brought forward, showing that the liability to jury service of the Volunteer Force extends to only 25 per cent. of the non-commissioned officers, and 8 per cent. of the privates, Her Majesty's Government see their way to extend the concession as regards the officers to other ranks?

MR. BRODRICK: I am in communication with the Lord Chancellor in regard to this matter, and I shall be much obliged if my hon. Friend will put his question in a few days' time.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I will do so this day week.

THE COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the rule laid down in the Order in Council for the compulsory retirement of Civil servants on attaining the age of 65 has been applied generally to all Departments; whether any Civil servants have been allowed to remain on active duty who are over 70 years of age; and, if so, how it is proposed to remunerate them for their services?

SIR J. GORST: Clause 10 of the Order in Council to which the hon. Member refers has been applied generally to all Departments except the legal Departments and the Houses of Lords and Commons. A few Civil servants, principally scientific or technical officers, remain on duty notwithstanding that they are over 70, but their services are only temporarily retained for special reasons. They are paid as for unestablished service, and that service does not count for pension.

THE SALARIES OF PRISON SURGEONS.

DR. CLARK: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is the case that the surgeons of Northampton Prison with a daily population of 104 and commitments of 1,140, and Shrewsbury Prison with a daily population of 95 and commitments of 1,290, each receive a salary of £110 per annum, while the surgeons at Dundee Prison with a daily population of 109 and commitments of 3,560, and of Ayr Prison with a daily population of 70 and commitments of 1,750, receive respectively £80 and £70 per annum; why the salary of the Ayr Prison surgeon has been reduced; and under what rules are these salaries determined?

SIR J. GORST: I have no information to enable me to check the accuracy, or otherwise, of the numbers quoted. The salary at Ayr was recently revised on the death of the former surgeon so as to correspond more closely to the present scale at other prisons in Scotland. The salaries of prison surgeons in Scotland who do not give their whole time to the public are fixed, as far as possible, with reference to the number of commitments and daily average number of prisoners at the time when the surgeons are appointed, a maximum of £80 being fixed in accordance with the recommendation of a Committee which sat in 1879.

DR. CLARK: Do the rules apply equally to Scotland and England?

SIR J. GORST: The hon. Gentleman will get better information from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department; but if he will give me notice of his question I will procure the information for him.

THE IRISH PARLIAMENT HOUSE.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will allow the Return standing on the Notice Paper of to-day, referring to the agreement entered into in 1800, between the Government of the day and the Governors of the Bank of Ireland, as to tenancy by the latter of the buildings in College Green, Dublin, formerly devoted to the purposes of an Irish Legislature?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In answer to the hon. Gentleman I have to say that I understand that a similar question was put to the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) when he was Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant in 1884, and he did not see his way to granting the required documents. I should be glad to know, before making any investigation as to the probability of granting the Return, whether any public object is intended to be served by it? Perhaps the hon. Member can give me some information on that point.

MR. CRILLY: In view of the likelihood of Home Rule being a burning question at the next General Election, and in view of the fact that the Irish people will insist upon getting the building back for the purposes of the new Parliament, I want to know what were the arrangements come to in 1800 between the Government of that day and the Bank of Ireland so that we may know upon what terms the building can be taken possession of again for the Irish people?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think, so far as I understand the matter, that the real difficulty in the way of Home Rule will consist of any arrangements come to in 1800 between the Bank of Ireland and the Government of the day. I am sure that when Home Rule is granted the hon. Member will find no difficulty in obtaining the necessary premises for conducting the business of Ireland.

MR. CRILLY: In view of the fact that when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian introduced his Home Rule Bill in 1886 he reprinted for the use of Members a number of historical documents connected with the period of the Union, I would like to know what objection and what difficulty there would be in allowing this Parliament, the successor to the Parliament which made the arrangement, to see the agreement entered into with the Bank of Ireland?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyronne, S.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question may I ask—

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order, order! It is an argumentative question, and should not be put.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOL INSPECTORS.

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education what experience in the teaching and management of public elementary schools each of the three recently appointed Inspectors has had; in which division of the certificate examination held by the Education Department's Examiners these Inspectors passed; whether one of these Inspectors, Mr. Marvin, has been examined more than once by the Civil Service Commissioners for the office of Inspector's assistant, and, if so, why; what was the duration of Mr. Marvin's experience as Inspector's assistant; and what academical degrees and what experience in the work of public elementary schools were possessed by the sub-Inspectors and Inspectors' assistants over whose heads Mr. Marvin was promoted?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Only one of the recently appointed Inspectors was a certificated teacher who had graduated in first-class honours, and of the other two, one was Senior Wrangler of his year, and the other, after obtaining the highest honours of his University, had been employed some years in tuition. The hon. Member is probably aware of the conditions under which Inspectors are appointed, as they are printed in a Memorandum which is freely circulated to all applicants, and also that every Inspector, when first appointed, is employed on probation with another Inspector in order that he may obtain sufficient experience of elementary schools under qualified supervision. I may further take the opportunity of reminding him that the most delicate and important part of an Inspector's duties lies outside the school, and that a higher equipment than the position and training of a certificated teacher can often afford, is required in order to qualify him to act as the agent of the Department in difficult negotiations with managers and School Boards, and as its adviser in dealing with the intricate questions of school supply.

SCIENCE TEACHING AT SOUTH KENSINGTON.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he can now state to the House what arrangements the Government intend to make to meet the urgent necessities of science teaching at South Kensington?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I am unable to enlighten the hon. Gentleman in regard to this matter at this moment. The Science and Art Department is in communication with the Treasury on the subject, and I hope soon to be in a position to say something definite. I will let the hon. Member know how matters progress.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. SHAW-STEWART (Renfrew, E.): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether there is any foundation for the rumour that the Government intend to withdraw the Public Health Clauses of the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that a rumour has got abroad that I have entered into an arrangement with an hon. Member by which the Bill is to be altered in the sense indicated in the question. I had some conversation on the subject, and it is possible that a compromise between those who object to the Bill in its present shape, and those who desire to see it passed, may be come to on the lines suggested; but I never indicated that it was my opinion that that course ought to be pursued. I should be sorry to express an opinion on it, and it certainly is a course which cannot be decided upon by any private agreement. I hope some arrangement may be come to, for the Bill is of a character that it cannot pass through its stages without general consent.

DR. CLARK: Perhaps I may be allowed to say that the only thing the right hon. Gentleman agreed to was that he would pass over the Public Health Clauses as contentious clauses, leaving questions in relation to these for further consideration?

THE BECHUANALAND BORDER POLICE.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT, on behalf of Mr. LOCKWOOD (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies upon what system promotion is carried out in the Bechuanaland Border Police; and whether, in the interests of the Force itself and the public, promotion therein will be conducted upon the same principles as those which are acted upon in the Regular Army?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Promotions within the Bechuanaland Border Police are made on the recommendation of the officer commanding, with the approval of the High Commissioner, due regard being paid to the claims arising from efficiency and seniority. This has been found to work well, and the Secretary of State sees no reason to alter it. It is hardly necessary to point out that this Police Force is very different in many respects from the Regular Army.

CATTLE DISEASE IN ESSEX.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): May I ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Order of the Department of 13th April placing restrictions, in consequence of the outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease, on the movement of cattle in the district of Royston, Bishops Stortford, and Saffron Walden, has been, or will be, rescinded?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I am glad to be able to say that all the restrictions affecting the county of Essex have been removed by Order within the last few days, and that the Order will come into force on Monday next.

A DEADLOCK IN THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE.

MR. P. STANHOPE (Wendesbury): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether some remedy can be found for the present deadlock in the administration of the Inclosure and Land Department of the Board of Agriculture, owing to the continued illness of its present chief, Sir Jacob Wilson?

MR. CHAPLIN: I regret to say that it is the fact that Sir Jacob Wilson is prevented by a relapse of illness—following upon an attack of influenza and a premature return to his duties—from attending his Department at the present moment. But he was at his post immediately before the Easter holidays, and the amiable assumption of the hon. Member that the work of this Department is, in consequence, at a deadlock, I believe to be entirely without foundation. But if the hon. Member has any reason to suppose that unwarranted delay has occurred in any individual case and will supply me with particulars, I shall be happy to give my personal attention to the matter.

COUNTY CORK WATER SUPPLY.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps the Local Government Board have taken to settle the difficulties which have arisen in connection with the water supply of Kilworth, in the Fermoy, County Cork, Union?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): A delay has occurred in proceeding with the Water Supply Scheme for Kilworth in consequence of differences between the Sanitary Authority and an owner of water rights affected by the proposed scheme. As, however, there seems no immediate prospect of an amicable settlement of these differences being come to, the Local Government Board are about to issue the necessary Provisional Order in connection with the scheme, leaving these differences to be settled in the ordinary course.

UNSANITARY HOUSES IN THE BANDON UNION.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any, and, if so, what, steps have been taken to remedy the unsanitary condition of houses in the Kilbrittain district of the Bandon Union; and whether the Local Government Board will consider the application of Dr. Shorter, of Kilbrittain, to insist on the Bandon Board of Guardians appointing a third relieving officer, and thus prevent the frequently reported unsanitary condition of houses in the Union?

MR. JACKSON: The Board of Guardians of the Bandon Union had under consideration, on the 13th inst., a complaint made by the Medical Officer mentioned, in reference to the unsanitary condition of some houses in his district. The sanitary sub-officer reported that he had already served notices on the offending parties, and the Guardians thereupon directed that he should serve fresh notices requiring the premises complained of to be put in order within 14 days. The Guardians had on a previous occasion under consideration the question of appointing a third relieving officer. This question appears to come up for consideration early next month.

POISONOUS EXPLOSIVES IN MINES.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been directed to the verdict of a Coroner's jury at an inquest held at Atherton, on Friday, 12th February, 1892, in the case of Edward Sandeland, when the verdict was that the deceased died from having, while at work in the Chanters Pit, Atherton, by accident and misfortune, inhaled certain noxious gases liberated upon the explosion there of a roburite cartridge, and that he came to his death by accident, and not otherwise; and whether any, and, if so, what, steps will be taken to protect life in mines by preventing the use of poisonous explosives?

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member will allow me to answer the question. Yes, Sir; I have had my attention called to the facts of the case of Edward Sandeland, and to the verdict of the jury. Although the jury decided that the death of the deceased man was due to the poisonous fumes of a roburite shot, yet there was at the inquest a difference of medical opinion upon the subject, and I have since had other competent opinions not in accordance with the verdict. The Inspector of the district informs me that the precautions observed on the occasion in question, both in respect of the time which elapsed before the workmen returned to the working place, and in respect of the air current which passed through the working place, were in conformity with the recommendations of a skilled Commission in Durham, which inquired into the possibility of danger arising from the use of roburite as an explosive in mines. Under these circumstances, I do not think that I ought to interfere under the Coal Mines Regulation Act to prevent the use of an explosive which is largely used and which has the advantage of being flameless.

SMALL-POX IN DEWSBURY AND BATLEY.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been called to the fact that an epidemic of small-pox now prevails in Dewsbury, Batley, and the neighbourhood known as the heavy woollen district; and has led to heavy local expenditure in providing for the necessities of the case; whether complete isolation of persons capable of spreading infection is attended to; and whether the origin of the epidemic can be traced to inefficient vaccination?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am aware that there has been an outbreak of small-pox in the district referred to in the question. The Town Councils of Dewsbury and Batley have provided some hospital accommodation, but I cannot state that the arrangements in the district are such as adequately to provide for the complete isolation of all persons capable of spreading infection, although the necessity for providing such means of isolation has on several occasions been urged on the Sanitary Authorities by the Local Government Board. The questions of the origin of the epidemic and of its relation to vaccination are being investigated for the Royal Commission on Vaccination by Dr. Sidney Coupland, of the Middlesex Hospital, who has already been in the district for some weeks.

EMIGRATION FROM IRELAND TO AMERICA.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been called to the large number of emigrants now leaving Ireland for America; whether it is true that 800 emigrants embarked at Queens-town on the 22nd instant on the Cunard steamship Pavonia for Boston; and whether steps have been, and are being, taken to insure efficient sanitary, hospital, and water provision, and medical inspection after leaving port, for such steerage passengers by the Board of Trade?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am informed that a large number of emigrants are leaving Ireland for America, and that about 800 embarked at Queenstown on the 22nd on the Cunard steamship Pavonia for Boston. The emigration officer reports that the sanitary and hospital arrangements on board were satisfactory, that the water and provisions were sufficient, and that the passengers were medically inspected by the sanitary surveyor before the ship left port. There was a surgeon on board whose duty it would, of course, be to attend to the medical supervision of the passengers after leaving port.

DR. TANNER: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Pavonia is fitted with permanent steerage accommodation or not; whether the sanitary arrangements for the large number of emigrants carried in the ship are of a permanent character, and have been passed by the Medical Officers of the Board of Trade?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have stated that they have been passed. I cannot say how far the arrangements are of a permanent character.

DR. TANNER: I will raise this question in Committee on the Estimates.

IMPORTED GUNPOWDER BARRELS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether any opportunity has been given to the Ballincollig coopers and Cork coopers of providing the gunpowder casks hitherto imported into Ireland for the carriage of powder from the manufactory at Ballincollig, County Cork?

MR. BRODRICK: Since my last reply on this subject a contract for a supply of gunpowder has been made with the Ballincollig Company, but they did not on this occasion wish to supply the barrels, although the opportunity was given them. They are, however, about to furnish a sample barrel with a view to supplying their own barrels in the future.

CORK BOARD OF GUARDIANS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the been directed to the conduct of the Chairman of the Cork Board of Guardians Local Government Board has dians, in refusing, on Thursday the 21st instant, to proceed with the election of dispensary committees, to the great inconvenience of Guardians convened for the purpose of proceeding with such election, and whether inquiry will be made into this and other rulings of a similar nature?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that it is not the case that the Chairman of the Cork Board of Guardians refused to proceed with the election of the Committee on the 21st inst. as alleged; nor, as a matter of fact, were the Guardians convened for the purpose of such elections.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that on Thursday last week the Guardians were prepared to proceed with the election of the committees, and that the Chairman distinctly refused to carry out what the Guardians were assembled for?

MR. JACKSON: I have already said that cannot be the fact, because the Guardians were not convened for the purpose.

DR. TANNER: As an old Guardian of the Union I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that the information supplied to him is, as indeed it often is, inaccurate.

HIGH GRADE SCHOOLS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether there is any objection to giving a Return.

by counties, of Burgh Schools, Endowed Schools, and Private Schools referred to in the Memorandum on the proposed Grant for Higher Education in Scotland of the 12th day of April, 1892?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate is not here just now, and I cannot give an answer without consulting the Scotch Office. In any case, I think it could hardly be in the hands of Members in time for the approaching discussion.

MR. CRAWFORD: I will put the information I desire in the form of a question, and perhaps it can be given within the limits of an answer.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member would do that on Monday, my right hon. Friend will reply.

MRS. MONTAGU.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary a question of which I have given him private notice. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the direct question whether the prisoner Mrs. Montagu is required to wear the prison dress? I find from the reports of what took place yesterday, when a question on the subject was asked, that the right hon. Gentleman's reply was not clearly understood.

MR. JACKSON: I am sorry if I did not make my meaning clear—I thought I had done so. I read the Rule 28, under which power is given to the General Prisons Board to allow a prisoner to wear his own dress on application being made for that purpose. A petition to the Board from Mrs. Montagu to be allowed to wear her own dress was presented to the Board, and the Board saw no reason for making an exception in her case, and gave permission.

DR. TANNER: But, Sir, is Mrs. Montagu now wearing her own clothes, or is she wearing the prison dress? I really must press for a direct answer. I find that different papers take different views of the fact. Is this prisoner wearing the prison dress or not?

MR. JACKSON: I have already twice said Mrs. Montagu applied to be allowed to wear her own dress, and permission was given.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Will the right hon. Gentleman order that Mrs. Montagu shall be treated like any ordinary prisoner?

MR. JACKSON: I stated yesterday that no exception had been made in the case of Mrs. Montagu.

THE IRISH HOME RULE MOTION.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I wish to ask your ruling, Sir, on a point of Order connected with a Motion standing in the name of the hon. Member for South Armagh (Mr. Blane) with respect to the establishment of an Irish Parliament. I wish to ask whether the discussion on that Motion will be in any way interfered with by the terms of the Motion standing in the name of the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark) for to-night?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must say, in reference to this question, on behalf of Mr. Speaker, that the matter was never brought before him at all till last Wednesday, and therefore the statements that have been made in the Press are quite unauthorised. The question on the Paper for to-day is so different in scope from that standing in the name of the hon. Member for South Armagh for next Friday, that the discussion of the latter Motion will not be prejudiced by any decision the House may come to on the former.

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (MORNING SITTINGS).—RESOLUTION.

(3.58.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I beg to move the Resolution which stands in my name, in regard to the Business of the House. I do not think it is necessary for me to do more than to remind the House that the arrangement I now propose was in force for some weeks before Easter, and was approved, I think, by all sections in the House. It enables private Members to discuss—not at great length, but adequately—subjects in which they are interested on the evenings of Tuesdays and Fridays, and it allows the Government to get on with Government Business at the Morning Sittings on those days. Under these circumstances, and until occasion arises, which in the ordinary course it does at a later period of the Session, for the Government to ask for still greater privileges for the transaction of business, I think we may be content to ask for a continuance of the arrangement which proved so successful for a few weeks before Easter. I hope the House will be disposed to accept without opposition the Motion I now make.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That, unless the House otherwise order, the House do meet at Two of the clock on Tuesday and Friday; and that the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to the Morning Sitting on 'those days.'"—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

(4.0.) MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I cannot help thinking that many hon. Members have felt some surprise at hearing the information which the First Lord of the Treasury has offered with regard to the Motion which he has now placed before the House. I do not wish myself to delay the Business of the House by making any lengthened observations; I merely wish to make a short protest on behalf of myself and on behalf of those agricultural Members who take, as I do, and whose constituents take, a very deep interest in the Small Holdings Bill, against the way in which I venture to think the Government have treated the House with regard to that very important matter. As the House will recollect, when the Bill was introduced into the House, the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury laid very great weight upon the Bill, and he, or the President of the Board of Agriculture, announced that the Government would stand or fall by that Bill. The Bill was received with sufficient favour by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. They found, of course, something to criticise in it; for instance, that it did not include the very important principle of compulsion and various other questions which the Representatives of agricultural constituencies think of the highest importance with regard to a measure of this sort. But, on the whole, I think I may say that we who represent agricultural constituencies in the country are extremely anxious to see this Bill passed, and passed speedily. When a question on this subject was put to the First Lord of the Treasury—I rather fancy it was by myself—he said that when the Bill got into Committee he intended to proceed with it de die in diem, and when it did get into Committee we proceeded some way with the Bill. The House then rose for the Easter Recess, and when we sat again last Monday we did not expect the Government would proceed with it on the first day that Parliament met, but still we expected that at some period very near to the time at which the House again met we should proceed with this very important measure. We certainly had not for a single moment expected that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury would get up after the somewhat prolonged Recess we have had at Easter and practically defer the consideration of this most important Bill which the Government are anxious to see passed, and which hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House are also most anxious to see passed—we did not for a single moment expect the First Lord of the Treasury would defer the consideration of this most important Bill for a fortnight after the re-assembling of Parliament.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

(4.5.) MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I desire to appeal to my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Treasury to make an exception in favour of the Motion which stands in the name of the hon. Member for South Armagh (Mr. Blane), and which deals with a question which an hon. Member sitting on the other side of the House this afternoon told the House was to be the burning question at the General Election; and hon. Members on both sides of the House know that, sooner or later, a General Election will come. I appeal to my right hon. Friend to except Friday, the 6th of May, from his Motion; and I appeal to him on this ground, and I think hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House will see that it is a very sound ground. If my right hon. Friend carries his Motion without making an exception of the 6th of May, what will happen will be this: The Motion of the hon. Member for South Armagh will come on for discussion at nine o'clock, and, according to the Rules of the House, the discussion will close in three hours. The hon. Member for South Armagh would probably open the discussion, and lay his views before the House; he would be followed probably by the various leaders of the sections of the hon. Members for Ireland. Then undoubtedly there are no less than two or three right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench who would be most anxious to take the opportunity to express their views on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby told us in his speech the other day in the New Forest that he had not been aware of the terms of the Motion, but that he would be prepared on some other occasion to discuss it, and I am sure we would be delighted to hear him. But what would be the result of this? The intervention of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench during the three hours undoubtedly would leave very little time for the other hon. Members from Ireland who sit on this side of the House, and other independent Members who have no chance of catching your eye on those occasions, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but who are very anxious indeed to contribute their views on this important Motion. Therefore, I think, having regard to the great interests at stake, the fact that right hon. Gentlemen opposite and hon. Members below the Gangway tell us that this is to be the burning question at the General Election, and the fact that the discussion will have the effect of clearing away a good deal of misconception, both above and below the Gangway, as to what is the particular position occupied by the Party opposite on this question, I feel that my right hon. Friend will be doing a very just and reasonable thing if he excepts from his Motion Friday, the 6th of May.

(4.9.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I do not rise for the purpose of offering any opposition to the Motion made by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. My right hon. Friend the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) desires me to state on his behalf that, with the view of forwarding business, he desires to offer no opposition to that Motion. In reference to the appeal made by the hon. Member who has just sat down, I think, as the hon. Member takes such an interest in the Motion that is intended to be moved by the hon. Member for South Armagh, that if he were to undertake to second it, it would probably commend itself to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House. He seems to be afraid that there will not be sufficient time for the discussion of that Motion, or time to express his own opinion upon the subject, and that hon. Gentlemen on these Benches are likely to fully occupy all the time of the House. I should be extremely glad to offer him the time I might have occupied, and the hon. Member may rest assured that I have not the smallest desire to interfere with him in fully discussing the subject. It is most interesting to see the great interest which Ulster takes with the other parts of Ireland in this particular Motion. Its support of the Motion must give great hopes of that harmony in Ireland which we are all desirous to see existing. With reference to the Motion which the right hon. Gentleman has made, I think it proper that we should ask some explanation of the use that is going to be made of the time of private Members that he has proposed to take. Now my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden has, I think, expressed some natural surprise at the manner in which, day after day, the Small Holdings Bill is shoved off—measures of the smallest and the very simplest importance seem to be seized upon for the purpose of postponing the consideration of that question. Now I have a very distinct recollection that when this Bill was first introduced and put first, the Government declared that they meant to proceed with it de die in diem. I cannot understand why that declaration has been departed from. I have had sufficient means of ascertaining the views and intentions of Gentlemen who sit on this side; and I am quite sure that there is no disposition to prolong the discussion upon that Bill. I believe I am expressing their sentiments when I say that they consider that the main points have been already discussed upon the Amendments that have been moved. There are probably one or two other points which will have to be raised upon the Bill; but I think that I may confidently say that if the Government wish on Monday next to resume the consideration of this Bill, and if they get the time which the right hon. Gentleman asks for in his Motion, there is no doubt whatever that the Small Holdings Bill might be passed through Committee in the course of next week; and that being so, surely that is the most convenient arrangement of business, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider whether it is not the course he should take. With regard to the discussion on the Budget, there are some important matters that may be raised upon it, but they are not matters at all urgent. The question of whether the consideration of the Budget should be taken on Thursday next, or whether it should be taken in the ensuing week, seems to me not to be a material question. It seems to me that there could not be a more appropriate method of dealing with the time placed at the disposal of the Government; and if I might reciprocate the interest in the Irish question which has been already expressed by the hon. Member who has just sat down, I, too, have a considerable interest in the discussion upon the plan of the Government for Local Government in Ireland. Now it must be quite plainly seen by the Government that one of the results of this perpetual postponement of the Small Holdings Bill is to protract, prolong, and put off the period of the discussion of that measure. I venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should proceed at once, as he can without difficulty or any serious opposition, to conclude the discussion of the Small Holdings Bill.

(4.16.) MR. ARTHUR ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I should like to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to another question which is likely to be affected by his Motion. I refer to the Resolution to be brought forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow for the Disestablishment of the Church in Scotland. I should like to ask, as the Resolution stands far down on the Paper, whether on that day the Evening Sitting would extend from nine o'clock to one o'clock?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No; we altered that by Standing Order.

MR. ARTHUR ELLIOT: Then I shall reserve the remarks I intended to make. However, I think that a matter of extreme importance such as this should be brought forward at a time when a reasonable discussion could take place upon it. But I do not think there is much good in grumbling about the matter. I do not see how the difficulty can be met; but I should like, if possible, on the occasion to which I refer that the nine o'clock Sitting should go on till one o'clock. ("No, no!") Well, then, I do not know whether it would not be better to vote on the question without any discussion than to take it up and dispose of it without having properly discussed it. I think it very unfortunate that this very important discussion should come on at a time when it cannot be done justice to on one side of the House or the other.

*(4.18.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not accede to the suggestion of the hon. Member who has just sat down. Twelve o'clock is quite late enough for the Members of this House who have to work for their living during the day, and who are consequently not able to sit hereto a late hour at night. But I rise to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will be good enough to state—for the information of several Members of the House who have balloted several times during the Session and not had an opportunity of bringing forward their Motions in consequence of the attitude taken up by the Government—I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if he would be good enough to state how long he proposes to continue the rule which he now asks the House to sanction—whether he proposes that the rule shall only extend to Whitsuntide, or beyond it? Of course, I know every Member regards his own Motion as the most important which the House of Commons could undertake to consider. I may, therefore, be pardoned for expressing the opinion that the Motion which I have down for next Tuesday is one of the most important that the House of Commons could be called upon to discuss. It has been down twice during the Session. A number of other Members are placed in the same position as myself; and it might save us the trouble of coming down on Tuesday and Friday to ballot for places, if the right hon. Gentleman would give a clear answer to the question which I have put to him. My Motion has reference to a Treaty of Arbitration between Great Britain and the United States of America. Since Mr. Plimsoll's Motion with regard to the shipping question, I doubt if any Resolution has ever elicited such an extraordinary expression of opinion concerning the question as my Motion. Fifty-seven Trades Councils out of the 62 in the United Kingdom, and nearly every organised body of workers in the country, have expressed their opinion in favour of it, to say nothing of the great religious bodies. Therefore I think I am entitled to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether I am likely to have an opportunity of calling attention to the subject this Session, or whether it must be deferred till the new Parliament.

(4.20.) MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I think it would be much better for the Government to take one whole night, and to leave the whole of the other night to private Members than to revive Morning Sittings. The right hon. Gentleman has said that Morning Sittings have worked very satisfactorily until Easter. I think, on the contrary, hon. Members will see that the result of Morning Sittings has been that practically the Government made no progress at all with business in these Morning Sittings, and destroyed all the benefit which private Members would have been able to obtain from a proper discussion of their Motions. I do not know that there is any use in protesting against these Morning Sittings, but I should like to enter my protest against what I think is an unprecedented thing—namely, taking Morning Sittings after Whitsuntide. It has always been the custom of the Government after Whitsuntide to take one whole night to deal with the remaining business of the Session, and leave the other night for private Members. If that course were adopted on this occasion we should have ample opportunity of having this Home Rule question discussed, and there would be plenty of time left for the hon. Member for Glasgow to make as long a speech as he liked in reference to Scotch Disestablishment, and plenty of time for hon. Members to take part in that Debate. I know it is no use appealing to the right hon. Gentleman upon this question; but I think it my duty to protest against this perpetual system of the introduction of Morning Sittings. I believe they are destructive of the despatch of Government business, and certainly they are destructive of all the use and efficiency of private Members' business.

(4.26.) MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I agree with what my hon. Friend the Member for Saffron Walden has said with respect to the Small Holdings Bill, and I think there are some other measures of the Government with respect to which great interest is felt out-of-doors. I am bound to say, however, that I do not consider the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, having regard to the state of business, as at all unreasonable. I doubt very much if in recent years you could find that the House has been sitting for fifty days out of a normal Session of one hundred and twenty and the Government business in a state of such lamentable arrear as it is. Since the beginning of the Session on the 9th February, the House has got into Committee and made some progress with regard to two measures only—the Indian Councils Bill and the Small Holdings Bill—and we are just entering Committee with regard to the Clergy Discipline Bill. That is to say, there are three measures out of ten that have passed the Second Reading, and that we have made any progress with; and there are but four other measures which have only been read a first time. There is the Irish Education Bill, the Private Procedure Bill—which I believe after the Recess we shall not hear much more of—and above all there is the Irish Local Government Bill. I venture to say unhesitatingly that the state of Irish business is a scandal and a reproach to Her Majesty's Government. In January, 1886, the Government of Lord Salisbury came before the House with the Irish Local Government Bill as a primary measure in Her Majesty's Speech of that Session. The Leader of the House after the General Election of that year, the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, speaking from that Bench, over and over again promised that that measure would be dealt with. But what do we find? In reply to a question by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, it was said this matter should be proceeded with immediately after the Small Holdings Bill had been through Committee. There is no reason in my mind why, after Easter, we should not have proceeded with that Bill. Then there are four measures that have not been heard of at all: that is, the District Councils Bill, which has been referred to in the south-west of England by a most distinguished supporter of Her Majesty's Government during the Recess; and the Bill for the Relief of Public Elementary Schools from rates, an important matter in which great interest is taken. Then there is a most important commercial measure, the Bill relating to the agreement between the Government and the Bank of England; and, above all, there is the Employers' Liability Bill, a Bill upon which a great deal of time was spent in Grand Committee in 1888, a Bill which affects hundreds of thousands of persons outside this House, and in which they are very keenly interested, and which of course should be dealt with by Her Majesty's Government, if they have really any bona fides on the subject. If the Government had had the slightest desire to put an end to the crying evils that exist in regard to this matter they could have done so. I will not go so fully into the question as to say whose fault it is that we find ourselves in this lamentable condition with regard to the Business of this House. People are constantly accusing the Leader of the House with being young at his work, and with rushing into discussions when he might well keep silence; but, in my opinion, the right hon. Gentleman's misfortune has been that he has had supporters behind him who would not support him. I think there is much accuracy in the criticism of the First Lord of the Treasury himself with reference to the Parliament with which he has to deal. He used very strong language in the Debate upon the Septennial Act. He applied the word "senile" to the House. Now, if he considers that the House of Commons has fallen into a condition of senility, the Government have a very easy remedy. Let them send us to our constituents, take the sense of the country, and introduce the new vigour which is so much needed into the action of Parliament. I do not consider the request of the right hon. Gentleman is an unreasonable one under all the circumstances of the case, but its justification depends entirely upon the manner in which the Government intend to use the time which they are endeavouring to obtain. If they will only act with a little more method and vigour they will enable us to proceed with business in a reasonable way; but if they show lassitude and procrastination, and the same old habit of postponing measures, then we shall only be doing what we have hitherto done, and that is wasting the time of the House.

Mr. John Ellis

(4.33.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): My hon. Friend who has just sat down has asked the House to use a certain amount of method in conducting the Business of the House. I wish to add my appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, for some information with reference to the measures which are to be dealt with. He proposes to take on Monday the measure dealing with the Scotch Equivalent Grant. That is to be interpreted as if it were to be in the middle of the Committee stage of the Small Holdings Bill. I could understand it, if the Equivalent Grant measure could be got through in a very short time, but I am sure that it will give rise to a most interesting discussion, which will occupy probably more than one night. If there is to be a gap made in the proceedings with regard to the Small Holdings Bill, I certainly can hold out no hope that it will be a small one. As the right hon. Gentleman knows, the Equivalent Grant question is connected with the scheme for secondary education for Scotland—a scheme which proposes to make certain changes in the Scotch Education Department. Now the report of that Department was only issued last week, and we have not heard a word from our constituents as to their views with regard to it. I would therefore appeal to the right hon. Gentleman both on that ground, and because of the merits of the Bill, not to take the Scotch Equivalent Grant Bill in the middle of the Committee Stage of the Small Holdings Bill.

*(4.36.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I am not troubled by what may happen next Friday, but the more you discuss Home Rule the better I shall be pleased. It is interesting to notice that Parnellite Members—or those who are called Parnellite Members—now sit on both sides of the House. I have personally no objection to the Resolution proposed by the right hon. Gentleman to-day, so long as we understand that we are to take up the practical business of the country. I have, indeed, some reason to be in favour of that Resolution, because it does not appear to me, from what occurred on Tuesday last (when we had a "count out"), that private Members take much trouble to attend here when they have an opportunity of looking after Private Business.

I would ask the right hon. Gentleman why he has said nothing about Supply? Apparently it is going to be left over until the end of the Session, and then taken in the middle of the night. When does the right hon. Gentleman propose to take Supply again? When does he propose to go on with the consideration of the Ordnance Vote? We were prevented from discussing matters with reference to the War Office on the first Vote, but we did anticipate that we should be allowed to go on with the discussion on the Ordnance Vote. For some extraordinary reason, however, the Government seemed to be afraid to face that discussion. I do not know whether it is because Birmingham is mixed up with Enfield in regard to it. It is only fair that we should be given an early opportunity of finishing that discussion. I wish now again to raise the question of the appointment of the Committee to consider the subject of the Parliamentary Debates. I brought the matter forward last Session, and again this Session, as a matter of urgency on the Vote on Account, and I asked for the appointment of a Committee. If it is delayed until the end of the Session the matter will be kept over till next year. The Committee should meet early if their Report is to be considered this Session. With apparently the general consent of the House, the Government promised we should have such a Committee. If no other alteration can be made, I think it would be advisable to do away with our present arrangement, and so save the £2,000 or £3,000 we are now paying for what is called the German or Reuter's Parliamentary Reports by taking in the weekly issue of the Times Parliamentary Reports, until we have some better system to suit the requirements of the House. I hope the Leader of the House will be good enough to say to-day that he intends to appoint the Committee at once. I know that he said on the last occasion that he is waiting to consult the House of Lords. The last Committee of the kind was a Joint Committee of both Houses. We can, if we choose, determine the contract at the end of the present Session, and I would therefore ask the right hon. Gentleman to appoint the Committee at once, so that we may have their Report in a reasonable time.

(4.41.) MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): If there is a desire to obtain more time for the disposal of Private Business, there is a very easy way of doing it. Let us meet at eight o'clock instead of nine, and not waste the two hours in the dinner interval. It is not sufficient time for those who go away, while for those who remain in the precincts of the House it is entirely wasted. I regret that we are again asked to give up our privileges with regard to Private Members' sittings. There is one question upon which we desire to take the opinion of the House, and that is with regard to International Arbitration. If it came on there would be no chance of a count out on that particular evening. I would now like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the decision of Justice Denman, has entirely altered the interpretation which has been put upon the Metropolis Local Management Act. The President of the Local Government Board has stated that there is at the present time great difficulty in getting vestrymen to attend to their duties, because they do not know whether they would be subjected to an action, through the agency of a private informer, under that decision. I am informed that the crisis is so serious that the Vestry of St. Pancras are going to take a test case to the Courts, in order to ascertain the real position of vestrymen under the Metropolis Local Management Act. I understand that nothing can be done to meet the difficulty under the Bill dealing with District Councils, which we were led to believe was to be introduced on an early day this Session. The question is such a vital one that when the vestry elections take place in May, it is doubtful whether you will be able to get the necessary number of vestrymen. The right hon. Gentleman opposite is laughing.—

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I was not laughing. I rise to a point of order. I wish to ask whether the hon. Member is in order in going into details on the Bill in question?

MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. Member would not be in order if he went into such details.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: I do not desire to enter into the details of it, but this is a very important matter, as will be proved when the Vestry elections come on in May. I will only further say, that I hope the First Lord of the Treasury will give some answer to the question put to him by the hon. Member for Peterborough.

*(4.47.) MR. JUSTIN MCCARTHY (Londonderry): It seems clear to me that nothing in the way of serious or substantial work is going to be done in this moribund and hopeless Session of Parliament. I do not suppose that either the Members of the Government, or private Members, will be able to carry anything which is worth having during the remainder of this Session. Therefore how the time of the House is to be frittered and wasted away is a matter of comparatively little importance. The Government seem to me to have made up their minds to pass, if they can, a certain number of small Bills which they think are still within their power to pass, and which they probably consider that in common decency they ought to pass. They appear to be in the position of a man who knows he must plunge into bankruptcy very soon, with very heavy responsibilities upon him, and who wishes, before the crash comes, to pay off the household bills—to settle with the butcher and the tailor, and the housemaid and the cook. If that be the position of the Government, I wish they would be a little more candid, and take the House into their confidence and tell us frankly what they intend to do. If they say, "We know we are going into bankruptcy, we cannot meet our heavy engagements, but we wish to get rid of some small responsibilities before the crash come," I am sure the House will endeavour to assist them out of their difficulty. Let them tell us plainly whether they have done with the serious work of this Parliament, and give us an idea of the date on which they are going into political bankruptcy, and then I am sure we shall be inclined to give them all the help in our power to settle the more trivial affairs.

(4.50.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): I think it will be admitted by the Members of Her Majesty's Government themselves that the position with respect to the conduct of business is a very peculiar position. The setting aside of primary subjects for the sake of taking up a series of secondary subjects in the middle of a Parliamentary Session, whether in an old or young Parliament, is a proceeding perhaps without precedent—at any rate very unusual; and this unusual character of proceeding undoubtedly casts an air of mystery over the question: What are the motives and intentions of the Government? I doubt very much whether it is for the interest of the Government to take proceedings which cause that idea of mystery to prevail. The subjects which I imagine a very large portion of the House look to as the most important appear to me—I will not say studiously, but at any rate to a very great extent and in a remarkable manner—to have been kept back. So far as this side of the House is concerned—and I do not know that hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House are likely to differ—there are three matters with regard to which we desire to know the intentions of the Government, and to which we think every available hour of our time ought to be applied. The first question is that of Supply, which, with regard even to the great subjects of Army and Navy, is unusually backward. With regard to the Miscellaneous Estimates, Government is usually anxious to avail itself of any advantage it can reap from a careful husbanding of what may be called odds and ends of time; and unquestionably it has been the fixed use of Governments, so far as my knowledge goes, when the House meets on Friday at the usual hour, to take advantage of the possibility, which has not infrequently become a reality, that the Motions of private Members may be disposed of, and disappear at an early period, and consequently what is called effective Supply has been put on the Paper. But we met to-day at three o'clock as usual, and Supply did not appear on the Paper, so that if the Motions of private Members had by accident disappeared, the remainder of the evening would have been wasted. There is a universal desire on the part of the House to get forward with the Small Holdings Bill. We do not regard that Bill as a satisfactory measure, but we have had an opportunity of giving our views and of stating those essential particulars in which we think it is wanting; and recognising it as a good measure up to the point to which it goes, and having failed to introduce into it a full expression of what we think necessary, we, notwithstanding, perform an elementary duty in assisting the right hon. Gentleman, so far as opportunity is given us, in putting forward that Bill. But the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture must feel with us—he must in his inward heart be on our side—with respect to the appeal we are now making, in endeavouring to move the stony heart and disposition of the Leader of the House in order to secure some prospect of advancement for this measure. The measure is in no danger of obstruction whatever, unless it be in some secret manner organised by Her Majesty's Government. Now, I must say that I hardly feel that the gravity and magnitude of the question of the Irish Local Government Bill has been weighed by Her Majesty's Government. It is quite true that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House has promised us that he will move the Second Reading of that Bill when the Committee stage of the Small Holdings Bill is concluded, and to that proposition we take no objection whatever in itself but this—that if the Local Government Bill for Ireland is in this manner attached and chained to the Small Holdings Bill for England, every postponement of the one is a postponement of the other; and as the art of delaying an obnoxious measure by an astute postponement of some measure which precedes it is well understood in this House, the right hon. Gentleman must see that this exposes him to suspicion as to the reality of his intentions with regard to the Local Government Bill for Ireland. We have had again and again the most solemn promises from Her Majesty's Government, and from a large portion of their supporters, with regard to that Bill, and it appertains to the honour of Parliament to see that they are redeemed. It is not simply because Irish Local Government is a very important matter in itself, but it is also, in the view of the majority of the Members of this House, and of Her Majesty's Ministers, a proper substitute for Home Rule. Nobody on that side of the House has said that the Government of Ireland ought to remain as it is. The language held has been, "We are as anxious to deal with the question as you are, but we think your manner bad and we think our way good;" and that more excellent way of dealing with it is that unfolded in the Irish Local Government Bill. Hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite may be able to prove, by superhuman powers of argument, that they are right. I will not enter upon that at the present moment, but I do say that it is a question in regard to which the Government should shield themselves from the imputation of indirect dealing, and seek the earliest moment of placing us in possession of their intentions with regard to it, by pushing forward the Small Holdings Bill, which not only has the highest claims on its own account, but derives an additional claim from its relation to the Irish Local Government Bill. But it seems that we are not to take that Bill, on the ground that a Scottish measure is to be proceeded with on Monday night, with respect to which my right hon. Friend (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), who, though differing from Her Majesty's Government, does on this occasion speak the opinion of the majority of the Scottish Members, has said that the information is not ready to enable the House to enter into a discussion; so that we are ordered—I will not say forced—into a discussion with respect to which those principally concerned declare that the information is not ripe. In order to enter into this discussion for which we are not prepared, we are forbidden to enter into a discussion for which we are prepared, and which we all desire to enter into. I hope that some impression has been made on the flinty feelings which the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury has developed, by the appeals which have been addressed to him, and that he will endeavour to dissipate that cloud of mystery which is hanging over the proceedings of the Government. In view of the coming Dissolution, we feel naturally interested to have all the information that can be given us, and I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to make a frank declaration as to the intentions of the Government, and so place us in the position of understanding, in some degree, what is to be the course of affairs during the year, and how soon Parliament, which can now only do a very limited amount of work, is to apply some portion of the time which is left to it in a useful manner by advancing these great measures and by meeting the engagements to which the right hon. Gentleman and Her Majesty's Government are pledged.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The criticisms upon this side of the House and the other side fall naturally into two classes. With the first of these I shall deal very briefly. It consists of a general criticism of the method in which we have conducted our business. The hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottinghamshire (Mr. John Ellis) has attacked the Government, and has said that business is in a deplorably backward condition, and that this deplorable state of things is due entirely to the want of method and vigour of those who have the conduct of the business of this House. I differ from the premisses of the hon. Gentleman, and I differ from his conclusions. I do not think that business is specially backward this Session, considering the time at which we began our labours in February, and especially considering the amount of time which has been, so to speak, exceptionally and unexpectedly employed on questions of Privilege and Private business. I think several most important measures—measures not the less important because they have not aroused, or, at all events, need not arouse, great Party feeling—have been well advanced; and I do not see that there is any ground for thinking this Session may not turn out to be peculiarly fruitful in useful legislation. In regard to the hon. Member's criticism upon our method of conducting business, I can only say, so far as the method is concerned, that a Government can do little more than put down important work for such days as they have at their disposal. This they have done. And with regard to the vigour with which they ought to press their proceedings, the vigour which the hon. Gentleman says has been deplorably absent from our conduct of affairs, I do not know what he can mean except the absence of a free use of the Closure. If I have erred in not having used the Closure oftener I apologize, especially to the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division (Mr. John Ellis). How

Mr. W. E. Gladstone

I could have stimulated the debate, the completion of debate, by any means in my power to render discussion more compressed, I really do not know. I pass from that to the various criticisms or observations and appeals which have been made to me with regard to the future of business, and will deal with, what I may call without disrespect, the least important before I proceed to deal with those which chiefly occupy the minds of the right hon. Gentlemen, the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), and the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone). The hon. Member for Shoreditch (Mr. Cremer) has made an appeal on the subject of a resolution in regard to arbitration. He seems to think it is an extremely important and pressing matter. That the matter is an important one, I do not deny; but that it is pressing—that is to say that Her Majesty's Government are showing by their conduct of foreign affairs that they are neglecting the use of arbitration where it can with advantage be used—I should have thought an obvious and notorious fact might have convinced him to the contrary.

MR. CREMER: Will the right hon. Gentleman permit me to say there is nothing in the Motion of which I have given notice nor anything that I have said which can lead to such a conclusion as that which the right hon. Gentleman has just drawn?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My point is that if the Government have shown, as I think they have shown, a most earnest desire to use arbitration whenever that method is applicable, it does prove that the Motion of the hon. Member is not of an extraordinarily pressing character. I do not put it higher than that. Then the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. James Rowlands) asked me a question as to District Councils. The question of District Councils is an important one of itself, and that it may have special importance with reference to London and the constitution of vestries in London I do not deny upon the argument he put forward on the subject. But I am afraid it will not be possible for us to introduce, with any hope of passing, the measure which the hon. Member himself must know would be a long, complicated, and controversial measure. And even the brief Debate we have had is sufficient to show it is not necessary to increase the number of complicated and controversial measures which we have already in hand. Then the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, as well as other hon. Members, discussed the question of Supply. I believe we have given, up to the present day, about as many days to Supply as has been usual. I am sure we have not given an exceptionally small number of days. If the progress during those days has not been sufficiently rapid to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite, I do not think the Government are to blame. Probably the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton), who raised this question, is quite qualified to give an opinion on the cause of the delay. Then the question of the Scotch Equivalent Grant, the Business for next Monday, has been alluded to by the right hon. Member for Midlothian, and has been pressed on my attention by the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). I regret that hon. Members do not feel themselves fully equipped for the discussion of the details of this Bill. But I must remind the House that it has been before the House since the beginning of the Session, and the Second Reading took place considerably before Easter. If this Bill is to become law at all—and I understand the right hon. Gentleman desires that it should—it is extremely desirable that we should not lose any further time in taking its next stage. I have now dealt with all the minor questions, and before coming to the question of the Small Holdings Bill, and the question of the Irish Local Government Bill, I need only notice the appeals which have been made to me to make exceptions in favour of particular Resolutions which attract great interest either in the House generally, or in the breasts of the hon. Members who have charge of them. Two appeals of this nature have been made to me—one by the hon. Member for Roxburghshire (Mr. A. Elliot) and the other by the Member for Antrim (Mr. Macartney). The hon. Member for Roxburgh appealed to me on behalf of the Resolution for the Disestablishment of the Scotch Church. That so important a question as Disestablishment in Scotland can be thoroughly thrashed out in three hours is wholly absurd. It cannot be done; but nevertheless three hours' debate is not without its use. Probably on the whole, in spite of the inconvenience of endeavouring to compress these great controversies into debates of three hours, the House will choose to do that, and thus be left free to discuss twice as many subjects in preference to giving a full night's discussion once a week, and only getting through half the number of subjects. There is a balance of convenience and inconvenience on both sides, and on the whole I think the decision the Government have come to commends itself to the great majority of the House. Then there is the question of the Motion for next Friday, and the hon. Member for Antrim has appealed to us to give a full evening's debate to the Resolution of the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Blane). He says that such a Debate will clear away a good deal of misconception. That entirely depends upon who speaks. I do not conceive that as to the Party for whom the hon. Member for Armagh has the right to speak, there is much doubt in the public mind as to what their attitude is with regard to this Resolution. I do not even think there is any doubt in the public mind as to the attitude of the other section of Irish Nationalist hon. Members who differ from the hon. Member for Armagh. I believe their views are also well known, and I am sure they would not in this House, or elsewhere, express different opinions on this subject to those which commend themselves to the hon. Member for Armagh. I take it there is no doubt as to what the opinions of hon. Members on this side of the House are. My hon. Friend the Member for Antrim says he desires to speak on this question, but I am sure my hon. Friend does not think there are any doubts or ambiguities in his own position which require to be cleared up by speech; and, therefore, the misconceptions of which he speaks do not attach to his own opinions or to the opinions of those who act with him. Then I take it there is no doubt as to what the opinions of Gentlemen upon this Bench are. Indeed, I do not think it will be necessary for us to occupy a single moment of the time allotted to the hon. Member for Armagh for the discussion of his Amendment. If there is misconception, we are reduced by this process of exhaustion to the misconception which attaches to Gentlemen on that (the Opposition Front) Bench. I agree with my hon. Friend (Mr. Macartney) that it would be most convenient to the public interest, and in the interests of that General Election which the right hon. Member for Midlothian has just now alluded to, that any misconception which may exist with regard to the opinions of so important a section of the House should be cleared up. But that can only be cleared up if they speak, and possibly it may not be cleared up even if they do speak, and I wish to put this before my hon. Friend the Member for Antrim. What security have we that if we give six hours to this Debate, instead of three hours, that hon. Members will either make more speeches or clearer speeches than will be in their power to make during the three hours allotted? It is not in the power of the Government either to compel them to speak, or to compel them to speak in unambiguous terms. If they wish to speak, the opportunity will be given them during the three hours; and if they desire to speak I can see that no power of compulsion which resides in any part of the House will oblige hon. Members to make quite clear their opinions upon this interesting and important subject. Under these circumstances, I think my hon. Friend will see that I am compelled to come to the conclusion that while it would require a great sacrifice of Government time to give a full evening's debate for next Friday, there are no certain or even probable grounds for supposing that a full night's discussion would have the effect which he somewhat innocently anticipates. I now turn to the most important criticisms which have been passed upon the Government—criticisms most important in themselves, and coming from a quarter which specially deserves consideration. The right hon. Member for Midlothian seems to think that the course of business proposed by the Government is one of so mysterious a character that it hides, or may be supposed to hide, some dark Machiavellian design, and he implores us in our own interest to make clear what our position is. I have no difficulty in making that clear. It seems to me that the ambiguities, if he will allow me to say so with respect, are the creations, to a certain extent, of his own imagination. Where we differ from the right hon. Gentleman is, in simply beginning the Small Holdings Bill one week later than he desires. That is the whole difference between us. Nobody wished us to take it in the week after we met, and there was no desire to take it before the House rose for the Easter holidays. I do not see what contingency can arise which will put it beyond Monday week. Therefore, a week's difference in commencing the discussion on the Small Holdings Bill is absolutely the only foundation upon which this enormous superstructure of criticism and suspicion has been raised by the hon. Member opposite. Now, what is lost in the hon. Members' view by that? They seem to think that putting off the Small Holdings Bill for a week will in some mysterious way endanger the future progress of the Irish Local Government Bill. I have two observations to make upon that. The right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) told us that in his estimate it would only take us four Sittings to complete the discussion in Committee on the Small Holdings Bill. Therefore if we begin it, not next Monday, but Monday week, we should embark on the discussion of the Second Reading of the Irish Local Government Bill on Monday, 16th May. Is that putting off the Local Government Bill to some dim and distant future? At the latest that brings us to the central part of the Session when the House is peculiarly well attended, and when all those who desire will be able to express their opinions and to take part in the Debate. So much for the injury done to the Irish Local Government Bill. Let me say before I leave that subject that this interest in the Irish Local Government Bill from gentlemen opposite fills me with surprise. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, putting into our mouths language which I, at all events, have not been responsible for, tells us that the Local Government Bill is our alternative for Home Rule—not the Home Rule which he proposed in 1886, but which he is going to propose some day. I can assure him that is not the view we take of the subject. We think that as we have reformed Local Government in England and in Scotland so we shall reform Local Government in Ireland. But this is in no sense a substitute or alternative for a Home Rule scheme. That this is to be considered on the same level, that it is to be regarded as at all a measure of an analogous kind is a doctrine I must absolutely refuse to accept. That is not all. This measure of Local Government, which hon. Members are so extremely anxious we should discuss, is one which all their leaders opposite have announced their intention of obstructing by every means in their power. I do not understand their new attitude. When I introduced the Bill they got up one after another—the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley), the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt), the hon. Member for Derry (Mr. Justin McCarthy), every leader of every section of the House rose, and did not content themselves with a denouncement of the measure, but said the measure was so bad that they would leave no stone unturned to prevent it becoming law. Therefore, when they press the Government to bring it on, it is evidently their object to wreck the Session. They have expressed their policy of obstruction openly; they believe themselves to have the power of so resisting the Bill that they will be able to prolong its discussion to such a degree that the Bill will have to be dropped. Under these circumstances, they are practically asking us to extend and to waste—because they will stop the Bill—the rest of the Session upon an effort to pass this measure—an effort which they intend to make abortive. That is an attitude which is not very consistent in itself; and if there are dark and Machiavellian designs behind any statement of policy made in this House, it is behind the statement of hon. Members opposite, and not behind ours, that those dark schemes are to be detected. The real object which we have in view in attempting to go on in the course of next week with the concluding part of the Committee upon the Indian Councils Bill, the Criminal Law Evidence Bill, the Scotch Equivalent Grant Bill, and other smaller measures which I hope may pass without controversy, is, that we may take the Agricultural Small Holdings Bill de die in diem, that we may then have the Second Reading of the Irish Local Government Bill, and that during the interval which must elapse between the Second Reading and Committee stage we may take another stage of those less controversial and less important, but still useful, measures to which I have alluded. This is a very plain statement of a very plain policy. The idea that the Small Holdings Bill is less likely to become law because it begins on Monday, the 9th May, instead of Monday, the 2nd May; that is because it begins a week later than hon. Members desire, is obviously absurd. The Bill, I trust, is perfectly safe, and I trust also the other measures I have mentioned are perfectly safe. I can assure hon. Members that not only do I desire to bring to discussion the Irish Local Government Bill, but that I am looking forward with the keenest interest and enjoyment to the Debate we shall have on that subject. If they think we shrink from that discussion, they are entirely mistaken. There is no deeper design in the very plain programme which I have ventured to lay before the House other than I have stated. I hope, therefore, that whatever may be the shortcomings of the Government in the past, or their duplicity with regard to the future, that at all events the Resolution before the House is one which should be passed, and that the House will, without any further serious debate, proceed to take a Division upon it.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. MORTON: May I ask the right hon. Member if he will answer the question I have mentioned respecting the Ordnance Vote, and the other as to the appointment of a Committee to consider the reporting of the Parliamentary Debates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As to the Ordnance Vote, I am afraid that I cannot give any definite information on the point. With regard to the Committee, the hon. Member will be aware that, in answer to a question put to me by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), I stated that I would appoint a Committee in conformity with the pledge I gave on that subject some time ago; but that if the Committee was to be a Joint Committee, I could not make any definite statement until I had had an opportunity of consultation.

MR. CREMER: There is another point which the right hon. Gentleman has forgotten to answer—that is, as to the period the Resolution is to remain in force?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Judging from past experience, if there is any new apportionment between Government time and the time of Members, that apportionment is more likely to be against private Members than the present one; but I cannot tell the hon. Member, until I see how Business progresses, whether any further alteration will be made.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I wish to ask if the Government will adopt a slight Amendment at the end of their Motion in order that we may have a discussion when we meet at nine o'clock? Very often there are not 40 Members present, and it happens that before a Motion can be submitted someone calls the attention of the Speaker to the fact. I should like the First Lord of the Treasury to consider the desirability of adding these words—

“And this House shall not be liable to be counted out on the evening of such Tuesdays and Fridays before 9.15 p.m.”

I move this, in order that we may have a quarter of an hour's grace before we can be counted out.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Question, to add the words, “And this House shall not be liable to be counted out on the evening of such Tuesdays and Fridays before 9.15 p.m.”—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sure that no body of gentlemen would regard the acceptance of this Amendment with more heartfelt dismay than private Members themselves. Therefore, I cannot accept it in their interests. I do not think that you would gain anything by an extra quarter of an hour. If Members will not come down at nine o'clock, it is hardly likely they will come down at a quarter past.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That, unless the House otherwise order, the House do meet at Two of the clock on Tuesday and Friday; and that the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to the Morning Sitting on those days.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

ORDERS OF THE DAY

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

CONTROL OF DOMESTIC AFFAIRS (ENGLAND, IRELAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES).

RESOLUTION.

(5.32.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to move as an Amendment—

To leave out, from the word “That,” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “in the opinion of this House, in order to increase the efficiency of the Imperial Parliament to deal with Imperial affairs, and in order to give speedier and fuller effect to the desires and wants of the respective nationalities constituting the United Kingdom, it is desirable to devolve upon Legislative Assemblies in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and England, respectively, the management and control of their domestic affairs.”

Sir, last year when I moved the same Resolution as I now propose, I brought before the House a number of facts and figures to show the congestion of Public Business and the utter impossibility of the Imperial Parliament being able to carry out the work it should do. I do not intend to bring again before the House those facts and figures except to say this: that of the many measures then referred to affecting Scotland that could not be considered for lack of time they all stand now in the same position as they did last year. As an instance, I may point out that we are just as far off having legislation on the principle of the Bill of my hon. Friend the Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) as we were nine years ago when it was first introduced. My hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. McLagan) has not been able to bring his measure affecting the liquor traffic before the House, and there is every reason to suppose that another Parliament will have passed away before the Scotch Members will have an opportunity of having that important measure affecting Scotland considered by the House—a measure which the majority of the Scotch Members are in favour of. Last year I was told that we were not suffering from the disease of congestion of business, as I pointed out, but that what we were suffering from was the disease of obstruction, and that since the Home Rule movement began there had been an attempt made to obstruct the business in this House and prevent Parliament from doing its work. Sir, let us look at the facts. It was in 1871 that Mr. Isaac Butt was elected a Member of this House, and the agitation for Home Rule, from a Parliamentary point of view, began. Now, I hold that facts prove that before the Home Rule agitation began there was the same congestion of business, and the same inability to carry out what the Government and private Members desired. And I will read one or two extracts from a speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) in 1871, at a time previous to the election of Mr. Butt and the existence of the Home Rule Party in this House. Mr. Gladstone was receiving the freedom of the City of Aberdeen, and in a speech which he made in reply to the honour conferred upon him, he used the following words about the then condition of affairs. He said—

“I admit, without the least hesitation, that the present condition of the action of Parliament with regard to Scotch business is unsatisfactory. You have much reason to complain or at least to regret, and I have deep reason, as have my colleagues, to regret, that we have not been able to deal with several subjects interesting to the feelings of Scotland, and material to its welfare, with the promptitude that we should all have desired.”

So that before Mr. Butt appeared in this House and began the Home Rule agitation, the then Prime Minister admitted that there was congestion, and that he regretted it. But what did he say in explanation of that condition of things? He said—

“The difficulty is a very great one. Parliament is overtaxed, it performs a great deal more work, and has probably at all times—most certainly for the last 40 years—performed a great deal more work than any other Legislative Assembly in the world. . . . The amount of demand upon Parliament, the province marked out by public opinion for legislation, is greatly enlarged, and that which was, even when my life began, quite sufficient for the strength of the House of Commons, has now grown to such a height and mass that that strength is insufficient to meet it. Parliament is now expected to regulate the relations of life between different classes, and to provide for public want and against public evils of a description that were formerly believed to lie altogether beyond its competence and its power. Legislation upon health, legislation upon atmosphere, legislation upon water, legislation upon drainage, legislation upon labour in all its relations—these are topics which in a few words contain the key to a vast mass of work waiting to be done, and which it has not been found possible to overtake.”

I think that disposes of the argument that it is the obstruction of Irish Home Rule that has brought about the congestion of business. What has happened since the speech of the right hon. Gentleman makes, I think, his arguments much more powerful. Since then there has been a greater development of science, more growth of commerce, and greater progress of democracy, which have increased the work of this House. Since the Reform era, since the death of Palmerston, it has been impossible for this House to do its work. The result is that we have been muzzled, and have been giving up bit by bit all our rights. We have had a splendid specimen of that to-day with the Government proposal for practically taking away all our time except three hours twice a week, and five and a half hours on Wednesdays. Important questions are coming up for discussion, but there is no time to spare upon them. The result is that the House must scamp its work. And, Sir, I think the House must look at this question from the Imperial standpoint. We have given Home Rule to our Colonies, and I have very much sympathy with the views and wishes of a number of Gentlemen opposite who desire to bring the Colonies and the Mother Country closer together by other ties than those binding us now. But it will be impossible to have co-representation in this House while you discuss for days main drains for Belfast, bridges in Glasgow, and questions of that sort. As far as the great self-governing Colonies are concerned, we have given them Home Rule, and we cannot hinder them as far as local affairs are concerned; but in Imperial affairs they feel they are neglected, and they complain sometimes that they are betrayed, and that for the purposes of the Mother Country their interests are sacrificed. We have no time to consider them as we are situated at present, and other questions of importance have to be neglected. For instance, there is Pahang, where war is taking place, a country under our suzerainty, but whether the Rajah is an enemy or a friend we do not know. Servants of English companies are being murdered there, but we have no time to discuss the matter. Then there is the difficulty in Uganda in connection with one of the Chartered Companies. But we have no time to consider matters of that kind. I have put down in my Amendment Ireland first instead of England, and I see that that mode of arrangement has caused some little surprise. Well, I think we want to devolve the control of affairs upon Representative Assemblies in Ireland because the Irish people desire it. If the English people were in the same frame of mind as the Irish upon this question I should have suggested that England should come first; but England is only beginning to look at this question, whereas Ireland has demanded and requires it. So with regard to Scotland; Scotland is demanding it, and after a Dissolution, and Parliament meets again, there will be a larger number of Members in proportion from Scotland for Home Rule than you have now from Ireland for Home Rule for Ireland. As to Wales and England, I know the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian lives in Wales a good deal, and I remember when this question came up long ago he used these words:—

“If doctrines of Home Rule are to be established in Ireland, I protest on your behalf that you will be just as well entitled to it in Scotland; and, moreover, I protest on behalf of Wales, in which I live a good deal—and where there are 800,000 people who, to this day, such is their sentiment of nationality—speak hardly anything except their own Celtic tongue—a larger number than speak the Celtic tongue, I apprehend, in Scotland, and a much larger number than speak it, I apprehend, in Ireland. I protest on behalf of Wales that it will be entitled to Home Rule also.

I find nearly all the Members from Wales during the present Parliament agree with the right hon. Gentleman, and upon these grounds demand Home Rule; and I hope that when he comes back to power he will consider the claims on behalf of Wales which he has suggested. What I want to discuss is the kind of Home Rule we are going to have. When we go to the country a majority will come back in favour of Home Rule, and the question is: What is the kind of Home Rule we are going to have? We had a Bill brought in by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian in 1886 which provided for a dualistic form of Home Rule. I hope we shall not have that proposed again. The right hon. Gentleman wanted Home Rule for Ireland very much on the same lines as it exists in Austro-Hungary and Sweden and Norway. Now, I personally am very much opposed to any Home Rule of that kind, and in voting for the Second Reading of that Bill I voted for the principle of Home Rule; and if the Second Reading had been passed, I should have attempted in Committee to have entirely changed the character of the Bill. There is another form of Home Rule. I refer to that which obtains in Switzerland, where there are three races speaking three different languages—French, German, and Italian—and where there exist different religious faiths with keen feeling in reference to them. There you have a form of Home Rule which has been successful. The same thing occurs in America, under different conditions, and it has lately been adopted in Germany. If we have a Home Rule Bill on the same lines we may be able to settle this Home Rule question in a manner that will be permanent, and, at the same time, add to the stability of the Empire. I do not think there is any agitation for a dualistic type of Home Rule in Ireland. Daniel O'Connell at one time sought to bring about the Repeal of the Union, but before he died he gave up his aim for Repeal, and Repealers are now as much a thing of the past as Fenians are. I might read to the House the view expressed by O'Connell when he gave up Repeal, prior to throwing in his lot with the Federalists, as they existed in Ireland then. It is contained in a letter addressed to John G. Porter, the secretary of the Federal Home Rulers. He says—

Dr. Clark

“The Federalists appear to me to require more for Ireland than the simple Repealers, for, besides the local Parliament in Ireland having full and perfect local authority, the Federalists require that there should be for questions of Imperial concern, Colonial, Military and Naval Policy, and of Foreign Alliances, a Congressional or Federative Parliament, in which Ireland should have her fair share and proportion of representation and power. It is but right and just to confess that in this respect the Federalists would give Ireland more weight and importance in Imperial concerns than she could acquire by means of the plan of the simple Repealers. For my own part, I will own that since I have come to contemplate the specific differences, such as they are, between simple Repeal and Federalism, I do at present feel a preference for the Federation plan, as tending more to the benefit of Ireland and to the maintenance of the connection with England than the mode of simple Repeal."

Now, since the time of O'Connell—apart from Stephens and the Irish Republican Brotherhood, who were not Constitutionalists—there has been no Constitutional statesman in favour of simple Repeal. Eighteen years ago the first Motion in favour of Home Rule for Ireland was discussed in this House, and on that occasion Mr. Butt said he did not go in for Repeal, but that he wanted every one of the Irish Members to remain in the Imperial Parliament for Imperial purposes. He only asked that there should be a Legislative Assembly in Ireland for the purpose of controlling local and national matters. This nation has been built up as much by the Irish as by ourselves, and they have as much right to claim their share in deciding Imperial matters as we have. The late Member for Cork, although he said some strong things, was never in favour of simple Repeal; but he got £10,000 to carry on his agitation on Federal lines. Now, Sir, what do I propose by my Motion? Why, simply that the House do not repeal any Union, but that it should create subordinate Legislatures, with full powers of control over all local and domestic and national affairs, and that the Imperial Parliament shall remain as at present. What I should also propose is that the House should take the present constituencies as they are in Ireland and in Scotland, and also in England and Wales for local purposes, and that the Imperial Parliament should be constituted not of 670 Members, but that every two seats should be linked together for Imperial purposes, and that you should separate in England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales local from Imperial matters. Only in that way can the Imperial Parliament do its work. But there have been other suggestions. We had a Bill before the House giving a Convocation of Scotch Members the right to meet in Edinburgh and consider and discuss all Scotch matters. Well, I should have been very glad to see that Bill passed; but the only difficulty that presents itself to me is that we should not be able to have a Dissolution on purely Scotch matters, such, for instance, as the question of Disestablishment of the Church of Scotland. I do not know how we are going to solve that question very well, except on the lines of Home Rule. When the English and the Scotch Parliaments were united, it was laid down as a fundamental principle of the Union that the Church should be maintained. The Scotch Church is in quite a different position from the English Church which was thrust upon Ireland, because the Church in Scotland is the Established Church of the people of Scotland, and nine-tenths of the people of Scotland belong to it. But I do not say that because our forefathers determined that a certain thing should be a fundamental principle that we should be bound by it. At the same time, I say it is impertinence in English candidates to raise the question of Scotch Disestablishment. I deny the right of the English people to determine this question at all, and I say that it can only be determined by the Scotch people and by the Scotch Members when it comes before them in a Constitutional way. The best way—the only legal way—to change any of the conditions which our forefathers made a fundamental principle of the Union is to constitute either a Commission of the whole of the Scotch Members or a constituent Assembly of the Scottish people for the purpose of determining these questions. I am in favour of Disestablishment, but I do not think it should be rushed through, and I will object to it until the people of Scotland have had the question placed before them and have given their decision in reference to it. I am not going to raise the question of what you should give to Ireland. I do not speak for Ireland. But what you give to Ireland we shall claim for Scotland, and anything less we will not have. The hon. Member for Renfrew (Mr. Shaw-Stewart) has an Amendment on the Paper which sets forth that to require the attendance of Irish, Scottish, Welsh, and English Representatives in local Legislatures would tend to diminish or destroy their proper influence and control over Imperial legislation. I wonder if my hon. Friend since he became a County Councillor has had his influence destroyed for the House of Commons. If these local assemblies met at the same time as Parliament, it would, of course, be ridiculous and absurd to expect Members to be in two places at once. I cannot see what he means by this Amendment, unless he really misconceives what we want. We want to separate local from Imperial measures. I look on Federalism as having been the greatest possible success. We are not asking for something that has never been tried. It has been tried for over 500 years in Switzerland, and has been a success; it has been a success in America for a century, and it has been a success in Canada, though there may have been local corruption. Wherever Federalism has been tried, it has been a success. We must make some change; and if we adopt Federalism, I believe it will be as successful here as it has been in other countries, and we shall be able to solve local and Imperial problems on lines which will tend to strengthen and develop the Empire rather than to weaken it.

*(6.5.) MR. LENG (Dundee): I rise to second the Motion proposed by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), and I do so because the pressure of Imperial business and the innumerable details of local affairs render progress with Scottish legislation so very slow and unsatisfactory. We are so accustomed in this House to much talk and little practical work that I think we do not sufficiently estimate the waste of time that actually occurs, and the number of years spent in the discussion of Bills, without leading to any practical result. I do not know that I can bring this more clearly to the House than by referring to the last list of Public Bills for the Session, 1890-1. It begins with the Access to Mountains (Scotland) Bill, and the record is Second Reading—dropped. Then comes the Acquisition of Land by Local Authorities—Second Reading—dropped; Child Life Insurance Registration (Scotland)—withdrawn; Building Feus and Leases (Scotland) Bill—Second Reading—dropped; Building Land Scotland—Second Reading—dropped; and County Councils Purchase of Land—Second Reading—dropped. Then I come across one brilliant exception, the Crofters' (Scotland) Grazing Bill, the record opposite which is—Royal Assent. I might go on page by page with a succession of Bills dropped or withdrawn, but the general fact is that there were 40 Bills introduced last Session relating to Scotland, and of these 32 were dropped or withdrawn, one was thrown out on the Second Reading, and only seven out of the forty received the Royal Assent. It might be said by those who have not examined the figures that the proportion of Bills carried was as good for Scotland as for other parts of the United Kingdom, but it is not so. There were, altogether, 229 Bills introduced last Session, of which seventy were passed, nearly equal to one in three, whereas of the Scotch Bills just over one in six was passed, so that, in the scale of proportion, only one-half the number of measures was passed for Scotland that were passed for the other parts of the country. I have no wish to detract in any way from the importance of the Bills that were carried, but I can say with accuracy that there were other Bills with which no progress was made of still greater importance. This Session we have thus far had 36 Bills introduced; five of them have got to the Committee Stage; and one—introduced by the Member for St. Rollox—has passed, but the others have not yet reached the Second Reading stage; two have been withdrawn, and one has been practically set aside by being counted out. Not a few of these may be spoken of as hardy annuals, for they come up year after year without making any advance in the way of legislation. Under the present conditions, what chance is there of the majority of these Bills ever passing? Before they can pass, many whose hair is now perfectly black will be grey, many whose hair is now abundant will be bald, and some of us will be dead and gone out of this House. Every Bill has its merits or demerits, and if its merits exceed its demerits it ought to be passed, and if its demerits exceed its merits it ought to be extinguished. But this system of continually dangling in the air measures which have no chance of passing is a system of false pretences. We ought to make the system a reality, and adopt some method by which, if Bills are desirable, they should go on the Statute Book, and, if not, there should be an end of them. As a Representative of a

Dr. Clark

Scotch constituency, I say that the Scotch people have a right to complain of the present state of things. If the Scotch Members constituted a Legislature of themselves all these questions could be rapidly disposed of, and we should avoid the coming up year after year of the same measures. But if it is thought that there should be some check on Scottish legislation, that could be easily accomplished by giving to the Secretary for Scotland the power of vetoing Bills which he thought infringed the limit with regard to national and local measures. I came into this House as a Home Ruler, and I hope as a sensible Home Ruler, and I regard Home Rule as giving to each division of the Kingdom control of its own strictly local affairs. I am not one of those who think that while Home Rule would be good as physis for Ireland it would be poison for Wales and Scotland, for what I would claim for Scotland I would willingly give to any other part of the United Kingdom. I would give to each division of the country the control of affairs that are left to the State Legislatures of the United States, or to the Legislative Assemblies of each province of the Dominion of Canada. It has been said that it would surpass the wit of man to discriminate between what are Imperial and what are local or national affairs, and when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian makes a remark of that kind Gentlemen on the other side of the House do not fail to note it, but without quoting many other things he has said in favour of Home Rule. I would reserve to the Imperial Parliament all those Imperial questions which are reserved to the Federal Congress of the United States. With respect to Ireland I would give to every Irishman at home the same political privileges he would enjoy if he settled in one of the cities of the United States, and that, I believe, would put an end to that strong and continued agitation on the other side of the Atlantic on behalf of Home Rule for Irishmen at home. But again it is asserted that it would be a mischievous thing to sever the control of the Imperial Parliament over any part of the United Kingdom, and it is also said that it would be a grander thing to be a citizen of the United Kingdom than of one part of it only.

All that we propose is that we in Scotland should cease to interfere in the local and strictly national affairs of England and Ireland and Wales, and that, on the other hand, you should cease to interfere in the local and national affairs of Scotland. So far as Imperial affairs are concerned, every man in every division of the United Kingdom would remain as much interested in them as he was before. The fact that a man is a citizen of the State of Illinois, or California, does not diminish his interest in the affairs of the great American Union. When I was in America I found wherever I went that each citizen of each State was anxious to produce the most favourable impression with regard to his own State, and to crack up and magnify it, and was proud of its achievements and growth in all matters; but while he did that he was still prouder of and spoke with greater warmth and intensity of feeling with regard to the great Union of which his own State was a component part. And you will tranquillise the great mass of the people in each division of the United Kingdom if you give them more perfect control of the management of their own affairs; and though they will be attached to, and proud of, the division of the Kingdom to which they belong, that feeling will develop itself into still greater loyalty to the United Kingdom. If this tended to division or separation, I would not say one word in its favour; but I do not believe that it does, and I can quote the case of Canada in support of the idea. The Dominion was organised by a Conservative Government, for it was the late Lord Beaconsfield and the late Lord Derby who, in 1867, passed the measure which united the Provinces of Canada into one Dominion. They solved the difficulty of discriminating between Federal and Provincial affairs, and the same thing can be done with regard to our own country. I am satisfied that if Party prejudices were dismissed and the matter were looked at fairly with regard to the interests of the country alone, and if the use of phrases intended to distract attention from the real merits of the question ceased to be used, and we looked at the matter practically not only with reference to what has been done in Switzerland, but what has occurred in our own Colonies and in the great American Union, then we should cease to be alarmed at the bogie of Separation. We should consider Home Rule merely a true and legitimate development of the principle of Local Government giving to each large division of the Kingdom a more perfect control over its own local affairs. That, I have contended before, would not alienate any section of the population from another; but under wise safeguards, which I am certain do not pass the wit of man to devise, it would make us, instead of being a separate, a more united, a more loyal, and a more prosperous people than we are now; and for these reasons I cordially second the Motion which has been submitted to the House.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, in order to increase the efficiency of the Imperial Parliament to deal with Imperial affairs, and in order to give speedier and fuller effect to the desires and wants of the respective nationalities constituting the United Kingdom, it is desirable to devolve upon Legislative Assemblies in Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and England, respectively, the management and control of their domestic affairs,"—(Dr. Clark),

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

* (6.26.) MR. SHAW-STEWART (Renfrew, E.): It seems to me, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that both the Mover and Seconder of this Resolution have each their own plan of Home Rule; but they speak under the disadvantage of not having any well-considered general plan that they can advocate, and I think it is also a matter on which they should receive condolence that their words have fallen on deaf ears, so far, at all events, as the almost empty condition of the Opposition Front Bench shows the very little interest taken in this question by their Leaders. The hon. Member for Caithness. (Dr. Clark) asked us to look at this matter from an Imperial standpoint, and that is what I wish the House to do. I put an Amendment on the Paper, but by the Rules of the House I cannot move it, but there is, I believe, no reason why I should not refer to it. It is in these words—To leave out all after "House," and insert—

Mr. Leng

"To require the attendance of Irish, Scottish, Welsh, and English Representatives in Local Legislative Assemblies would tend to diminish or destroy their proper influence and control over Imperial legislation."

The hon. Member for Caithness says he does not understand why his proposal should diminish the control of the various Representatives over Imperial questions. I should have thought this was one of the most obvious complications which would arise if his proposal became law. If you send down to the various centres of nationality the popularly-elected Representatives, you must take away a certain amount of their time which is now devoted to the discussion and supervision of Imperial questions. If they are to sit in the various centres of the United Kingdom for three months, it is obvious that you diminish by that amount the time at their disposal for sitting as an Imperial Parliament; and unless you intend to largely increase the time for which Members sit at present you reduce their control of Imperial questions from six or seven months in the year, as it is now, to three months, or even less. I contend that we cannot in these days afford to compress the time which is allotted to us for the discussion of Imperial questions. If anything, we ought to amplify the time for the discussion of Imperial questions rather than shorten it. I have pointed out that the Motion proposes to take away part of the time—when we should be sitting in Scotland—which Scotch Members could devote to Imperial affairs, and I am sure the hon. Member would be the last person to say that Scotland is not pre-eminently concerned in colonial and foreign affairs. There is not a British colony or dependency where Scotchmen are not doing good work, not only for themselves and for their adopted country, but indirectly for Scotland also. The time of the Imperial Parliament for dealing with these affairs would be limited to about three months in the year; and though the English Parliament might during the other part of the year be sitting at Westminster, no question could be asked in it about colonial or foreign affairs; in fact, it would be an injustice to Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, if such questions could be asked while the representatives of those countries were elsewhere. Foreign questions continually arise in this country, and doubtless many of them are quietly disposed of by a strong Foreign Minister; but if the time should come when we should have a weak or incompetent Minister, while the nationalities were discussing local affairs, he could be involving the country in complications which, if Parliament were sitting, the representatives of the people might have had a hand in checking. Even when a strong Minister is in power there are at times difficult questions on which he is glad to be backed up by the strong feeling of the British people concentrated in their Representatives in Parliament. The Imperial Parliament also is not merely for legislative purposes; it ought to have control over the different Departments of War, the Navy, Finance, and the Home Office; and if you diminish the time during which the Members are to attend the Imperial Parliament, you diminish their control and influence over these Departments. The time may come when we can afford to spend less time in anxious deliberation over foreign and colonial affairs. The time may come when we shall have less to do with the different parts of the world and exert less influence, but that will only be when, by a series of disintegrating measures, we have lost our hold on our Colonies, perhaps on India, and on those ports and dependencies which are scattered all over the world. Then we may indulge in the luxury of breaking the Kingdom up into sections by setting up Parliaments to discuss local affairs, and then we in Scotland shall not quarrel whether we shall meet at Glasgow or Edinburgh, for in those days we may well hide our diminished heads in the wilds of Caithness. We are told that Parliament is over-weighted, but since the speech of the right hon. Member for Midlothian quoted by the hon. Member was delivered, we have had County Councils set up throughout Scotland which deal with local affairs; and it is understood on all sides that they will be considerably strengthened and have further powers given to them. There is also the possibility, if hon. Gentlemen opposite would allow of its discussion, of framing a measure for relieving Parliament by a system of Private Bill procedure. But, considering the time at the disposal of Parliament, I do not think it is impossible to deal with the questions that arise.

If the small number of hon. Gentlemen who speak oftenest and longest were to exercise a little self-control, and do a little violence to their vanity, it would be to the advantage of the House. As a Scotchman and a Scotch Member, I not only object to the proposal of the hon. Member, but I resent it as depriving Scotland of a considerable amount of her power and opportunity of discussing and controlling Imperial affairs, and I condemn it as a proposal that would have a destructive and disintegrating effect on the constitution and character of the United Kingdom, with the strength, prosperity, and happiness of which the future of my country is inextricably bound up.

(6.40.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): Although it is true that this Motion has not enlisted the sympathies of a large number of Members, or of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench, it is a question which will attract a considerable amount of attention in future, and one which must be dealt with before we can expect to properly transact Public Business in Parliament. If the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw-Stewart) has put forward all the arguments of the Scotch Unionists against Home Rule for Scotland, I think we may fairly expect that in a short time he will join our ranks. He has raised four objections: The first is, that the Mover and Seconder have not agreed as to the form of Home Rule they desire. I am not sure that they have not agreed, but the proposal does not profess to formulate the form of Home Rule. There are several ways in which it can be dealt with, and it would be unreasonable towards the gentlemen who may be in office in a short time to commit ourselves now to one or other form, and so foreclose the decision of the Members of the next Parliament as to the particular measure of Home Rule they may think fit to adopt. The principle is a matter on which we can all agree or dissent. The hon. Gentleman said that the Members who sit here cannot conveniently sit in Scotland to discuss local matters, because they might be wanted in two places at once.

MR. SHAW-STEWART: I said if you require the attendance of Scotch Members in Scotland at a certain time in the year they would not have that time at their disposal for the consideration of Imperial questions.

MR. R. T. REID: That is what I understood the hon. Gentleman to say. But the Motion does not require that the same individuals should represent Scotland in the Imperial and in the Scottish Parliament. That is wholly a matter of detail, and there is no necessity in law or convenience that they should be the same persons. The hon. Gentleman said that Scotland was interested in colonial affairs, and that no Scotch Member would consent to deprive her of a full share in their management. But nobody proposes that because domestic affairs in Scotland are to be disposed of by Scotchmen, we are, therefore, to be deprived of what we claim as a right—an equal voice with other parts of the country in dealing with Imperial matters. The hon. Gentleman suggested that things might go wrong while we were discussing local matters if we had a weak Foreign Minister, but he must remember that for more than half the year, as things now are, the Minister has the opportunity of leading us into infinite trouble and difficulty if he is so unwise as not to avoid it. If that is the array of argument to be placed before our somewhat hard-headed countrymen in discussing this question, I am not surprised that there is a considerable increase of feeling in favour of this movement in many parts of Scotland. Speaking for myself and my constituents, I wish to say that it is obvious that in this matter Ireland must come first, as she put forward the first claim. The effects of this government have been very serious in Ireland; we in Scotland have not suffered more misfortunes than England. There is great bitterness in Ireland, the result probably of historical causes, which prevents Ireland regarding England with the same loyalty and goodwill which is universal all over Scotland with respect to the Southern Kingdom. Therefore, as far as Scotland is concerned, there is no trace of bitterness or national resentment so far as regards Home Rule. We have nothing to look back on in history which we cannot contemplate with complacency. But Scotland has a great grievance peculiar to herself. For many years the practice of the House was not to over-ride Scotch opinion in regard to Scotch measures. The practice dates certainly from the last century and was continued down to 1886, when the present Government unfortunately broke the continuity of the practice. Since 1886 we have been repeatedly outvoted, notoriously in the instance of a Bill dealing with the questions of lighting, roads, police, and other purely Scotch questions. We were outvoted by English Members in twelve Divisions in a manner calculated to be most offensive to Scotch feeling. We were outvoted by Members who did not hear a word of our arguments, who stayed systematically out of the House during our speeches, and who treated our protests and arguments with contempt. We warned the Government in all good faith that the necessary result of that would be to raise a strong feeling in Scotland for the management of Scotch affairs by Scotchmen in Scotland. Our views have proved to be absolutely true. I ask the hon. Gentleman if he approves of his countrymen being outvoted in this House on Scotch questions by English Members?

MR. SHAW-STEWART: It all depends on the question.

MR. R. T. REID: The Scotch Members have no chance of holding their own on Scotch affairs. What would the feelings of the English Members be if the Church of England were disestablished by a Scotch vote? That is what is being constantly done by English Tory Members with regard to the views of Scotch Members who are as loyal and orderly as themselves, and it is a matter which is deserving of the consideration of Parliament. There is another grievance we share in common with the rest of the United Kingdom, and that is the congestion of business in this House. It seems to be a formal and elementary proposition of Government of whatever form—whether Despotic, Republican, or Constitutional Monarchy—that there should be some authority which can deal promptly with grievances as they arise. That was once the case with this Parliament, but no one can now reasonably pretend that we have in this House machinery which is capable of dealing with the wants of the country with reasonable promptitude. Take, for example, the measure for cheapening the transfer of land in England. All sections of the House agree that that is a Bill which ought to be passed, and, though it was agitated for forty years ago, it cannot be dealt with, because the other business prevents the possibility of the House dealing with it. Then, if there is one question which the Scotch people care more about than any other it is the liquor question. The hon. Member opposite places his name at the back of the Bill, introduced by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. M'Lagan) in 1884, and read a second time, but the hon. Member has been unable since then to get even a discussion on the Bill. It is a question on which every single burgh in Scotland, and every county, I believe, would go for the Bill; and I do not think even the hon. Member for Renfrew (Mr. Shaw-Stewart) would stand for his constituency if he pronounced against the Bill. What have we done to alter this state of things? During the last four or five years we have amended our procedure; we have introduced the Closure and Grand Committees, and the time of private Members has been ruthlessly taken away. There were protests at first, but they have all ceased, for we all know that it is necessary that the Government should have the time, and yet we are no better off than we were before. The hon. Gentleman intimated that the present state of things was the result of obstruction, but I do not think that in his cooler moments he will say that there has been serious obstruction this Session. It is not the necessity for reform, or unwillingness to carry it on, which has caused the arrears of work, but the utter incapacity of Parliament to discharge its duties. This state of things has produced serious results inside the House. I am not surprised to hear that many Members are not going to seek re-election, and that it is becoming more difficult every day to get suitable candidates to take part in the business of Parliament. Energetic men, such as we desire to see in the House, are prepared to see their views overruled, but they are not prepared to spend the whole of their time without an opportunity of these questions being disposed of, and to waste their best energies in forwarding measures which they feel almost certain will never have an opportunity of becoming law. There is a growing apathy also in the constituencies; they feel that there is not the machinery for getting through the work, and Parliament will lose that confidence which centuries of good work have earned for it. Thoughtful men will not deny that something is needed for the reform of procedure in the House. I wish to ask the hon. Gentleman what is the meaning of the remedy to which he refers. Does Local Government mean County Government, or the Government of Town Councils? Why, the hon. Gentleman must know very well that nobody proposes to give them legislative powers at all. How then will they relieve the congestion of legislation in this House? The hon. Member referred to another proposal—namely, that the procedure in reference to Private Bills should be simplified in the method proposed by the Government. Though I differ from many of my hon. Friends on this side, and am rather sympathetic to the proposal of the Government as to procedure on Private Bills; yet, that proposal, if carried out, would not remedy the congested condition of business. Is there anything to be hoped from the legitimate use of Grand Committees? I do not think there is. Only one stage out of five will be got rid of by sending a Bill to a Grand Committee, and we have tried Grand Committees. I do not at all deny that they have done some good; but although they have done some good, they have not been effective for the purpose of preventing that great arrear of business which is now almost choking this House. I say there is only one other remedy that can be considered, and that is the distribution of business—call it devolution if you like—to some other Assembly than this. I think most lawyers will agree with me that you cannot destroy, if you wished to do so, the Imperial supremacy of this Parliament. I am strongly in favour of maintaining that supremacy, and I am not aware, so far as I know, that anybody wishes to destroy it. But, as I have said, you cannot destroy it, even if you wished, according to Constitutional Law. That being so, how do you propose that the business should be distributed to other Assemblies? It seems to me to be absolutely necessary so to distribute it; and in no other way than according to the natural line of cleavage that exists in this country. You have in Ireland and in Scotland—I say nothing in reference to Wales for the moment, I do not see many Welsh Members present—but with regard to Ireland and to Scotland in their relation to England you have this: they have different laws administered by different Judges, they have widely different histories, they have different religions, they have different customs, and, especially with regard to Ireland, they have different races, for, of course, it is well-known that the great bulk of the people of Scotland are Anglo-Saxons, and belong exactly to the same race as the Northern inhabitants of England. But, however, there are racial differences, and racial differences of a very pronounced character. Now, I beg to say that in my opinion those differences show a line of cleavage by which alone any devolution of Public Business can be effected. Nobody wishes that I am aware of in any way to interfere either with the Sovereignty of this Parliament, or with the full presence of Scotchmen and Irishmen in this House, to take part with Englishmen in the administration of all that concerns the common good. But what we feel in Scotland—those whom I represent, and I feel it myself as strongly as any of them—is this: In the first place that we cannot get our business sufficiently done as things are; and, in the second place, that if we had the opportunity we are not only able but willing heartily to transact our own business in a reasonable, conciliatory, and temperate spirit towards all sections of opinion in Scotland. We are also prepared, in addition, to take our full and equal share with Englishmen and Irishmen in the administration and conduct of business common to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Shaw-Stewart

*(77.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I cannot help thinking that those of us who favour the establishment of Home Rule in Ireland would be likely to be opposed to it if we could see that the necessary corollary of the establishment of Home Rule in Ireland was to be the establishment of three domestic Parliaments, with three domestic Prime Ministers and three domestic Lord Chancellors, and so forth in the Kingdom, for Scotland, for England, and for the Principality of Wales. I do not however regard the Motion of my hon. Friend as pointing in that direction. I gather that his Motion is a declaration, perhaps couched in somewhat infelicitous language, that it is desirable that there should be a devolution of the functions of Parliament in respect of certain domestic matters upon certain bodies constituted ad hoc in Scotland, England, Ireland, and Wales. I must say I could not follow the speech, in sympathy at any rate, of my hon. and learned Friend who last spoke, in his somewhat gloomy jeremiad over the condition of Scotland. My hon. and learned Friend adverted to the great want of time which was suffered by Scotland for the transaction of its own domestic business. Now, I am bound to say that with the single exception of the question connected with a very debatable subject—that of the liquor traffic—he did not advance one single instance of a Scotch measure ripe for legislative treatment which has been neglected by the Imperial Parliament.

MR. R. T. REID: I beg my hon. Friend's pardon—I only quoted one instance; but my hon. Friend was not in the House when a long list was given to the House by the hon. Member for Dundee.

*MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: My hon. and learned Friend is inaccurate. I was not in my seat, but I have learned from an hon. Friend what took place, and I say that no question ripe for legislative treatment of capital importance has ever been neglected by this Imperial Parliament. But I admit that undoubtedly there is a very considerable arrear of urgent and pressing business relating to all parts of the United Kingdom. I admit that there are many measures, especially as regards social reform, to which the people of this country look for legislative treatment; but the hon. and learned Member and those who have spoken upon this question must remember that we have been passing through a singularly abnormal period in the history of this country, that the time of this House has been almost monopolised by the great Irish question, and I altogether deny the main premiss of my hon. and learned Friend that the House of Commons is a mere legislative machine. My hon. and learned Friend said there was not time for passing measures, and referred to the great waste of time in talk. What I contend is this, that primarily—or at any rate it is hardly of secondary importance—the function of this House is to debate serious questions and so bring them into a condition ripe for legislative treatment. Has my hon. and learned Friend considered what the establishment of a local Parliament in Scotland means? Does he consider that it means a Parliament with an Executive responsible to the Crown, does he consider that it means a Parliament which will have its alter ego in this Parliament and that it will undoubtedly make this Parliament a battle-ground for continual exactions, for continual fresh concessions? Undoubtedly the whole of the integrity, continuity, and symmetry of the domestic policy which is pursued by this country, would be utterly and entirely destroyed. I should like to ask my hon. and learned Friend, and those who think with him, what would become of this Parliament when domestic Parliaments had been established in the three Kingdoms and the Principality of Wales for the purpose of dealing with all those domestic questions which pertain to Home Government? What I conceive would be left to this Parliament would be a wrangling for further concessions to those various countries, and a mischievous and unnecessary interference with the affairs of our Colonies and with foreign affairs. I am bound to say that I do not look with anything but dismay to the idea of establishing four effective Parliaments in the United Kingdom with four effective Executives, depending upon the Sovereign of this country. I think the proposition only requires to be stated in order to show its absurdity. On the other hand I well recognise the desirability of the devolution of Business.

Mr. R. T. Reid

MR. R. T. REID: How?

*MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: Well, I think the suggestion made by the late Mr. Bright was a very excellent suggestion, and that is the creation of Grand Committees for Scotland and for Wales. I altogether sever and differentiate the case of Ireland from that of Scotland and Wales.

MR. R. T. REID: Why not Ireland?

*MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: Let my hon. and learned Friend show that there is any strong desire on the part of the people of Scotland or the people of Wales for a local Parliament. Why, this very Debate comes off to-night only by the most strenuous and factitious exertions of hon. Members, and already we are threatened with extinction. My hon. and learned Friend says why not for Ireland? Because Ireland has had a history altogether different from the history of Scotland or of Wales in relation to this country. I am not going to discuss the question of Home Rule in Ireland. Theoretically the question may be open to very grave and perhaps doubtful arguments. But I am dealing with the question as a question of practical politics, and I say that there is no doubt that as a matter of practical politics, if my hon. and learned Friend can prove to demonstration such a volume of public opinion extending over such a long series of years, in spite of every effort, both conciliatory and anti-conciliatory, on the part of the Government of England for the concession of a local Parliament, then I say he might have made out a case worthy of the consideration of this House. It is for this reason that I support the Motion of my hon. Friend. I support it in the sense in which I understand it to be, not a declaration in favour of the establishment of separate Parliaments, but a declaration in favour of the devolution of peculiarly Scotch business to Committees and bodies appointed for dealing effectively with those matters which at present are so much neglected.

(7.20.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I am glad that the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has concluded as he has done, and that he is going to vote for the Motion of the hon. Member for Caithness. I also, in voting for this Motion, share the views of the hon. Member for Durham, and claim the same amount of liberty. I intend to vote for it as I read it, or rather, perhaps I should say, as I choose to read it. I am very glad that this question has been raised. At any rate, for one thing it has elicited the expression from the Scotch Members that they also desire Home Rule, and I am very glad of that expression upon their part, because I think it will strengthen the Irish demand. I am glad also that the hon. Member for Caithness said that he thought the minimum amount of Home Rule that should be given, either to Ireland or any other part of the United Kingdom, was that expressed in the Motion on the Paper before the House, that is the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for South Armagh. So that in many respects I consider this Motion a satisfactory one, as ventilating an important question.

However, I may fairly say, having some experience of the history of Home Rule in this House, and possibly out of this House, that it must be allowed on all hands that the demand from Scotland has not been up to the present as strong and as urgent as it has been from Ireland; but there is also no doubt that the demand for some sort of Home Rule—not necessarily the same as in Ireland but some sort of Home Rule—in Scotland is a growing one. I have no right to speak from what I know of the Scotch people; but certainly from what I know of the Scotch Members—having been for 20 years in the House—I must say that every year a larger and larger number of Scotch Members seem to be anxious that some sort of Home Rule should be established for Scotland. So far as Ireland is concerned, I must, to a slight degree, differ from the hon. Member for Caithness. He seems to think that Ireland is especially enamoured of the Federal principle. I have no right to put myself forward as the exponent of the opinion of the whole of Ireland; but I give my own opinion and the opinion of my constituents in the West of Ireland. They do not reject repeal of the Union. They would be very glad to have repeal of the Union; but, of course, if they had repeal of the Union, their position would be extremely anomalous—they could not then have a Regent and could not have an Executive. The Irish people accepted the Bill of 1886 as an honest solution of the question, though not all that they wished or desired, but as an honest, fair solution of the question. The Federal system, as pointed out by the hon. Member for Caithness, is an excellent one. He gave an excellent example of it in relation to New York and the rest of the United States. We should be very glad to take the position Canada has in regard to the United Kingdom. That, perhaps, is asking far too much, or at least more than we are likely to get; but without being particularly in love with the Federal system, I think it is a good one, and I think any one who desires Home Rule can very properly and fairly vote for this Resolution. The hon. Member for Caithness has done one thing in framing his Motion; he has put Ireland first. As he fairly said, Ireland has brought this question to the front, has worked for it for a long time, and four-fifths of the Irish Members have repeatedly voted for something in that direction. The hon. Member for Dumfries shared the views of the hon. Member for Caithness. He said that the case of Ireland ought to come even before that of Scotland and for the same reason, that Ireland had made many sacrifices and had worked strenuously for the last 18 years. I think the Scotch Members have brought forward this question in a perfectly fair and legitimate way, and I think they ought to receive all support from the Irish Home Rule Members. The English Members are apt to make light of this question of Home Rule, and to say that this question is of no importance; but the explanation is a very simple one. The English people have got Home Rule at present. The English Members are about two to one of all the other Members put together, and they could carry any question they liked through the House. There was only one dread I had with respect to this Resolution, and that has been, I must say, completely removed by the speeches of the hon. Member for Caithness and the hon. Member for Dumfries. I was afraid that it might possibly be taken as a pretext to put off Home Rule in the next Parliament, and that a Party might spring up and say, "Let us elaborate a complete Federal system before we give Home Rule to Ireland." That would be very dangerous, for it has already taken 18 years to bring the Irish question to the front, and to thoroughly thresh out and ventilate the question.

Colonel Nolan

(7.30.) MR. MARK J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): My hon. Friend the Member for the Dumfries Burghs has made the congestion of Scotch business the gravamen of his complaint. He has said that there are many Bills like the Liquor Veto (Scotland) Bill and the Land Transfer Bill which have been before the House for many years, and for which no time could be found for discussion. If the question of Home Rule for Ireland had not been started and carried on in the way in which it has been by hon. Gentlemen opposite, there would have been ample time for the discussion of these and other interesting Scotch measures; but so long as hon. Members choose to indulge in hobbies that can never be realised, so long will they prevent real business being done. The system of devolution is undoubtedly a valuable help. The Grand Committees on the Public Health Act, the Bankruptcy Bill, and other measures have saved endless hours of discussion in the House, and good legislation has been the result. As far as local business is concerned, I have always thought that the present Government have done more than any preceding Government. They have brought in and passed measures of Local Government for England and Scotland, and it is therefore absurd to say that nothing is being done, and that nothing has been done in this direction. The congestion of business comes through many Members on both sides of the House not wishing Bills to be carried. Although the House does not pass a great amount of Scotch legislation, when any Scotch question comes up for discussion, and it is felt that it ought to be dealt with, the Government in power are bound to take it up, and this is to a large extent now done. Many questions are decided in this House, which, though they cannot be called exclusively Scotch questions, have a strong bearing on Scotland; and, on the whole, I consider that Scotch business is well attended to. That is, indeed, the opinion of the Scotch people, who would not care to have a Parliament in Scotland. They would sooner send to London a man who had time to attend to questions of an Imperial character than send him to Edinburgh to attend to local matters, and it would be extremely difficult to get gentlemen of leisure to attend a provincial Parliament held in Edinburgh and the Imperial Parliament held in London. If, on the other hand, they paid their Members, what would the ratepayers say? For these and other reasons I need not go into, I am satisfied that there is no real feeling on this question in Scotland, and that the agitation for Home Rule is propagated and maintained by agitators. The empty Benches to-night, especially the Front Opposition Bench, which is deserted by all save the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks), proves that no real interest is taken in the question.

(7.40.) MR. BARTON (Armagh, Mid): I desire that there shall be no mistake or misunderstanding as to the attitude which the Ulster Members take up on this question. We are opposed to any interference with the legislative authority of the House, and we object to this Resolution because it is undoubtedly intended to enlarge the demand for Home Rule. I was astonished to hear hon. Members say that Ireland was more entitled in this matter to separate treatment than Scotland. For hundreds of years Scotland had a separate King, a separate Army, and a separate Navy, as well as the power of sending her own Ambassadors to other Courts. But nothing of the kind has ever occurred in Ireland. Almost from first to last the history of Ireland has been one of feuds and factions, and the only continuity Ireland has received has been from the Union. There is, however, one part of Ireland which has had a continuous history, and which, if racial and historical differences are considered, would be entitled to separate treatment—a part of Ireland which will have to be counted with if this question of Federalism is taken up—and that part is Ulster. This Debate, however, can hardly be regarded as serious, except that everything Scotch is serious to some extent.

(7.44.) MR. THOMAS ELLIS (Merionethshire): I desire to strongly support this Motion, because the number of social, industrial, and political questions which have arisen has produced a congestion of business in this House which can only be increased in future years. The late Mr. Parnell took as keen a measure as any man of the possibilities and capacities of the House, and he said that it was impossible for it to do the work of four Assemblies. The Motion we are now considering indicates a step which must be taken in a few years. The arguments used about Scotland are equally applicable to the case of Wales. The vast majority of the Representatives of Wales are constantly being voted down, and their actually unanimous voice is repeatedly being overwhelmed by the voices of Members for other parts of the Kingdom. It is for these reasons that I support the Motion of my hon. Friend, and I hope to be able to follow him into the Division Lobby.

*(7.46.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I do not think it will be necessary for me to trouble the House at any length. As the hon. Member for Mid Armagh said, it is really difficult to treat this Motion quite seriously, looking at the condition of the House. It is evident, from the small number of Members present, that no great demand exists for Home Rule in Scotland, Ireland, or Wales, and it is impossible for me to come to the conclusion that the statements in the Resolution can at all be borne out. The thinness of the House shows that the interest in the matter is extremely small in three of the nationalities. Last year the hon. Member for Caithness brought forward a Resolution in almost the same terms, and the result was that not 40 faithful Members could be found to assist in carrying the Debate to a conclusion. So it was on Tuesday night last, when a Bill was before the House dealing with the same question; again not 40 faithful Members would support the hon. Member in charge of the Bill to bring the Debate to a conclusion.

MR. R. T. REID: There are only 40 Scotch Liberal Members.

*MR. RITCHIE: Yes; but there are the Irish Members, and surely that remark comes with a bad grace from a Member of the Party which attaches most importance to this question, as it affects Ireland, and says Ireland must come first. Judging from the fact that there is not a single Member from Ireland on the opposite Benches; that there are very few from Scotland, and only two from Wales, I think there is pretty good evidence of the fact that a demand for Home Rule does not find expression in this House. It will be admitted that a proposal of such a vast and drastic character is only warranted by two things—the existence of grievances which cannot otherwise be remedied, or the existence of a demand so general as to render it necessary that it should be considered. Even if we were to admit the justice of every single complaint that has been made by hon. Members opposite, no unprejudiced person would say that anything like a case has been made out for trying an experiment so dangerous as that proposed. What do the complaints amount to? The hon. Member for Dundee cited names from a list of Bills, and said—

“The Access to Mountains Bill has not been passed; that is a reason why we should have a separate Parliament.”

He named other Bills of trivial importance, and said that the failure to make progress with them was an argument for the creation of five Parliaments. No doubt there has been delay in Scotch business, as in other business, so far as legislation is concerned, but what has been the reason? The hon. Member for Dundee frankly stated that the reason of it was that if there were a Parliament for Scotland the Scotch Bills would be passed in a short space of time; but I could not help thinking what a terrible thing it would be for Scotland if the result contemplated were realised. The House of Commons does not exist simply for the purpose of legislation; it exists largely for the ventilation of grievances and debates upon topics that are ripe for discussion. It must not be supposed that because a Bill is not passed, discussion upon it is wasted, or the object of its promoters is not advanced. So it is with regard to Motions—a cause may be advanced by a Debate which appears to come to nothing. Many measures have been passed unanimously which at one time it was difficult to get a small majority to support. Never was so great a change as this proposed upon such small and trivial grounds. The hon. Member for Dundee said that very wisely no details have been given of the plan proposed in the Resolution. No doubt it was wise from the Mover's point of view, and from the point of view of those who desired to support this abstract proposition; but if ever there was a question which ought to be put before the House in detail, it is this question of separate Parliaments for Scotland, Ireland, and Wales. The practical difficulties of the question are enormous. It would be extremely difficult to get a sufficient number of good men to fulfil the functions of Imperial and National Parliaments, and also of the County Councils which happily exist in England and Scotland, and which we hope will soon exist in Ireland. Then there might be enormous friction between the Imperial and the National Parliaments. You might have an Imperial Parliament of a totally different complexion, politically, from the Parliaments in Ireland, or Wales or Scotland.

Mr. Ritchie

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

*MR. RITCHIE: When the interruption took place I was venturing to point out the inconvenience, to say the least of it, that would probably arise in cases where the Imperial Parliament and Executive were of different political constitution from the local Parliaments. It would not require much elaboration to show that in cases of that kind there might be much and frequent friction; and especially in the case where a local Parliament was not satisfied with the limited power conferred upon it, every opportunity would be taken to demonstrate to the Imperial Parliament that more power ought to be given to it and further duties imposed upon it. And so with regard to all the various Imperial questions, all the matters connected with the Colonies, Foreign Affairs, Imperial Finance, and Customs and Excise—these would all give opportunities to gentlemen from all parts of the country to ventilate grievances of which they might think they had just cause of complaint. While hon. Members spoke mostly with regard to Scotland, they undoubtedly felt that of all parts of the United Kingdom Ireland was the one to which attention would have to be first directed. And, great as would be the difficulties in connection with any local Parliament, I think hon. Members will admit that the difficulties of the situation would be infinitely greater in relation to Ireland than in regard to any other part of the Kingdom. While it is impossible to night to enter into the many technical points connected with this subject, it is certain, however, that nothing short of the most complete freedom for dealing with the land, with the administration of justice, and with the constabulary will satisfy the demand of the Irish people; and although we have not, up to the present, got any plan from the Leader of the Opposition, and although we all know his original proposal has been dropped, would not be accepted, and is not likely to be revived, yet we do know that he has pledged himself that whatever scheme of Home Rule he brings forward should be a scheme which should receive the acceptance of the majority of the Irish Representatives and of the Irish people. Consequently we know that the concession must be to confer the administration of Ireland on those who have been elected by people the majority of whom possess sentiments certainly not friendly to this country, and that they would have the control of the most loyal and prosperous part of Ireland. I want to know whether those who propose these things imagine for a moment that the people of Ulster would rest contentedly under a Parliament elected largely under the influence of the Roman Catholic priesthood? ("No, no!") Well, I do not wish to enter upon that question now; but I defy contradiction when I assert that under the late elections which have taken place the Roman Catholic priests have exerted their influence to the utmost, both inside and outside the polling booth, in order to induce people to vote for the candidate they chose. I assert that the people of Ulster would never submit to any Parliament elected under such conditions as those. All I can say is that while we are prepared to consider all reasonable grievances, while prepared to extend the system of Local Government in all three countries—as we have done in Scotland, in England, and as we hope to do in Ireland—and that while prepared, when necessity arises, to increase the powers and responsibilities which have already been given to Local Bodies, we shall, whether in office or out of office, offer the most determined, energetic, and continuous opposition to any such proposal as that before us to-night.

(8.10.) Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 54; Noes 74.—(Div. List, No. 92.)

Main Question again proposed, "That Mr. Deputy Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY.—Committee upon Monday next.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES (PURCHASE) BILL.—(No. 213.)

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

(8.15.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I wish to call attention to the recent peculiar attitude of the Government in the Lobby in preventing us entering the House. The Government Whips were at the door calling upon us not to enter in order to secure a count out. I think this attempt to proceed with Government business is absolutely impudent after they have been defeated in their object. ("Order, order!") To give them an opportunity of defending the attitude they have assumed, I move that you do now report Progress and ask leave to sit again. I have seen many incidents in this House caused by the attitude of Her Majesty's Government; but I never saw more determined impudence than this attempt to do business now after they have only succeeded in defeating the Home Rule movement by 20 votes.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

DR. TANNER: I always bow to your ruling, Sir; because we are here to do the business of the country. We do not go home and leave others to do the work. We bring these gentlemen up to the mark, and now they try to seize the opportunity and proceed with Public Business in a way which I consider is lowering to the dignity of this House, in a manner which is unworthy on the part of common-sense business men at this period of the 19th century. I have much pleasure in moving that you do now report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member has said nothing to convince me that this is anything but an abuse of the Forms of the House.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I think, while we are on Clause 1, I might move to insert a clause which would make this Bill applicable to other countries. In the first line of Clause 1—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Question has been put that the clause stand part of the Bill.

DR. TANNER: I move, then, this clause do not stand part of the Bill. I wish people to take these matters seriously. It is unfair that Members of this House should have been literally turned away by Government officials at the door.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman must confine himself to the Question before the Committee—that Clause 1 stand part of the Bill.

DR. TANNER: As objecting to the substance of the Bill and on other grounds than those presented by the

Dr. Tanner

Bill, I thought I should have the opportunity of expressing myself. I naturally feel indignant at the attitude the Government have followed, and it is for that reason I object to the measure. I object to the clause, and I shall certainly divide the House upon it. I hope that every hon. Member who is possessed of conscientious principle will support me in this vindication of the rights of the House of Commons.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause do not stand part of the Bill."—(Dr. Tanner.)

The Committee proceeded to a Division, and the Chairman stated that he thought the Ayes had it, and on his decision being challenged, it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed; and he directed the Noes to stand up in their places, and Nine Members having stood up the Chairman declared the Ayes had it.

Clause 2.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

THE CHAIRMAN then left the Chair. On his return,

DR. TANNER said: There are many points in connection with this Bill which are deserving of attention. I wish, however, to move just one Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Question was put before I left the House.

DR. TANNER: Then am I to understand that I cannot move an Amendment to this clause? I have not had an opportunity—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Question is, "That Clause 2 stand part of the Bill."

Motion agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

(9.1.) MR. KNOX: In order that equal justice may be done to Ireland I have to move an Amendment. In the town of Cavan and another town which I know, the Town Commissioners had to give their personal security before they could borrow money for public purposes. That is a burden which ought to be thrown on the town, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept this reasonable Amendment, which will only apply to Ireland the same conditions which now exist in England.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 17, to leave out the words "or Ireland," and add "This Act shall extend to Ireland with the following modifications, that is to say, the council or town commissioners of every corporate town in Ireland shall be the local authority for the purposes of this Act, and shall have the same powers as the council of a county or borough in England under this Act, and for that purpose may borrow money under the 'The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878.'"—(Mr. Knox.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'or Ireland' stand part of the Clause."

*(9.3.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I am sorry I cannot agree to this offhand. If the ordinary law applying to Ireland will permit of the alteration the hon. Member proposes, I shall be perfectly willing to accept the Amendment. If the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his Amendment now I will make inquiries.

(9.5.) MR. KNOX: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to apply to Ireland the particular provision which will enable Town Commissioners to borrow under the Public Health (Ireland) Act for the purpose of buying the markets?

*(9.6.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: That is exactly the point on which I must inquire. I have no objection to their buying the rights, but I cannot say whether I could give them the power to borrow.

(9.7.) MR. KNOX: The power is given to the same authorities in England, and I only propose that equal powers should be given to Ireland. At present the Town Commissioners have not the power, and I have quoted two cases in which the Town Commissioners had to give personal security before they could borrow money which was required for public purposes. That, I contend, is very improper, and if the right hon. Gentleman has followed what I have said he can have no difficulty in finding out what is the ordinary law. But what he has said is so vague that I am afraid it is hard to see how far he would go. There is a Public Health Act in Ireland and a corporate authority, and why the corporate authority should not be allowed to borrow for the purpose I have named under this Act, as is the case in England, is more than I can understand.

(9.10.) Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 41.—(Div. List, No. 94.)

Question again proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

(9.17.) DR. TANNER: I have another Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Question is that the clause stand part of the Bill.

(9.18.) DR. CLARK: There are objections to the clause passing in its present form, and I should like the President of the Board of Trade to consider whether he cannot allow it to apply to Scotland and Ireland.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will consider before the Report stage whether the Bill can with advantage be extended to Scotland and Ireland.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

SHORT TITLES BILL.—(No. 227.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 12th April.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Schedule 2.

Amendment proposed, in page 74, after line 9, insert—

The Births, Deaths and Marriages (Scotland) Acts, 1854 to 1860.

17 and 18 Vic., c. 80.

The Registration of Births, Deaths and Marriages (Scotland) Act, 1854.

18 and 19 Vic., c. 29.

The Registration of Births, Deaths and Marriages (Scotland) Act, 1855.

23 and 24 Vic., c. 85.

The Registration of Births, Deaths and Marriages (Scotland) Act, 1860.—(The Attorney General, Sir R. Webster, Isle of Wight.)

(9.20.) DR. TANNER: I think we ought to have some explanation of this matter. It is not enough that an Amendment of this kind should be moved by a simple nod of the head.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Perhaps the hon. Member has forgotten that this second Schedule was intended merely to give a short title to a certain class of Acts. Instead of using the full titles of seven or eight lines, the Acts can be cited in a few words; but I would remind the hon. Member that if he prefers to use the long titles he may do so.

DR. TANNER: Not being a lawyer, I shall suffer no inconvenience in the matter, and I think it is hardly proper or dignified for one of the first Law Officers of the Crown to indulge in these silly and trivial remarks.

Amendment agreed to.

On Motion of Sir R. WEBSTER, the following Amendments were agreed to:—In page 77, leave out lines 2 to 7; page 89, after line 15, insert—

The Police (Scotland) Acts, 1857 to 1890.

20 and 21 Vic., c. 72.

The Police (Scotland) Act, 1857.

21 and 22 Vic., c. 65.

The Police (Scotland) Act, 1858.

53 and 54 Vic., c. 67.

The Police (Scotland) Act, 1890.

*(9.24.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I beg to move, in page 90, line 40, to leave out "banks," and insert "bank."

DR. TANNER: There are so many of these Bills that it seems impossible that they can all be considered under one short title. That arises from the extraordinary way in which the Bill has been drafted, and there is one part of this particular portion of the Bill with which we are now dealing that does not seem to read correctly.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The words Post Office Savings Bank, 1874, should read Post Office Savings Bank Act, 1874.

DR. TANNER: I accept the explanation.

Amendment agreed to.

*SIR R. WEBSTER moved to omit the 3rd Schedule.

(9.26.) MR. SAMUEL EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): It seems to me that the effect of this Schedule is to repeal several Acts of Parliament.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: This Amendment is consequent on the striking out of Clause 2 of the Bill, with the object of making it a permissive measure.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS: I am obliged for the explanation, but I do not see why we should repeal Acts recently passed.

Sir R. Webster

*SIR R. WEBSTER: There are no Acts repealed by this Bill. There was a proposition of that kind, but it has been removed.

MR. SAMUEL EVANS: I am not quite sure that this House would be less usefully occupied if, instead of proposing new legislation, it set itself to repeal old Acts; but it strikes me as a little peculiar that we should repeal Acts which were passed so recently as last Session.

(9.28.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I think the Act will lose very materially by leaving out the 2nd clause, and I apprehend that it will be possible to amend this on the Report stage.

(9.29.) THE CHAIRMAN: On the Report stage it would be competent for the hon. Member to propose any Amendment he likes of the kind he indicates; but we cannot do now something which would undo what the Committee has already done. The Committee must be consistent.

Schedule agreed to.

Bill reported, with Amendments; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next.

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 230.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress, 12th April.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 340.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): These Sanitary Clauses contain the chief point of objection to the Bill, and the arguments against them are very strong. This part of the Bill is objected to by the Association of Medical Officers of Health in Scotland, and since the Bill was last in Committee the Association has sent up a very strong memorial against the clauses, of which I have given notice to move the omission. These officers are chiefly appointed under the Local Government (Scotland) Act, and they are gentlemen of experience; they are required in every case to hold a special diploma, and are forbidden by the terms of their appointment from engaging in private practice. They devote their whole time and energy to the preservation of public health in Scotland, and are recognised by the Government, which in the Local Government Act made provision for assisting in the payment of their salaries. These officers say they are satisfied that the passing of the Bill in its present form would be in the highest degree detrimental to the public health. Such a strong expression of opinion from gentlemen well qualified to give one, justifies the strenuous opposition on the part of myself and my hon. Friends. I do not blame the Government, who have taken an old Bill and have not taken the trouble to modify it to meet existing circumstances. These Medical Officers say that no better illustration of the injurious effect of these clauses can be found than in the initial clause of Part V. of the Bill, which provides for the compulsory notification of disease. That was, they say, all very well in 1888; but since then an Imperial measure designed for the same purpose—the Infectious Diseases Notification Act—has been passed, and has been adopted by burgh as well as county sanitary districts throughout the country, and the provisions of this Bill are utterly at variance with that Act. They go on to say that the machinery of that Act has been brought into a condition of working smoothly, and that this Bill would upset what has been done, and would establish two systems of notification side by side. Under the Bill jealousies would arise between the medical officers of health and private practitioners, and it would render nugatory the object you have in view, which object would be better carried out by the Act which has been in force for three years. I think this is a convenient time for asking the Government whether they intend to press these Sanitary Clauses or not. They must see that the highest medical opinion in Scotland is against them, and that the only effect of proceeding with the clauses will be to confuse and muddle the law of Scotland to an injurious extent. The Medical Officers of Health appointed under the Local Government Act are men of the highest qualifications, and the small burghs cannot expect, in the great majority of cases, to be able to appoint men of equal qualifications; they will have to appoint a local practitioner, and as he will have to look for the greater part of his income to private practice his utility as a Medical Officer of Health will be almost nil. The Association to which I have referred says that the tendency of modern legislation has been in the direction of recognising the solidarity of questions affecting the public health, but that this Bill proceeds in the direction of dispersion and confusion. The Association has not come to the conclusion to oppose these clauses without great reluctance. One member of it wrote to me to the effect that, after long and earnest endeavour to see if he could not devise some governing clause which would meet the objections of the Association, he was very reluctantly forced to the conclusion that he and the Association must confine themselves to destructive criticism, and not attempt to amend the Bill. What the Association suggests is that you should drop these clauses, and adapt to Scotland the two Public Health Acts passed for England in the last couple of years, which course would accomplish everything that is desired. The Acts would apply to all Scotland, and would save us from the injurious effects of having one kind of Sanitary Law in the burghs, and another in the counties round it. Such a state of confusion would make it impossible to bring about that improved condition of sanitation which is desirable in any civilised country. The highest Sanitary Authority in Scotland is against the clauses; no evidence was taken on them before the Committee; and, whatever was the case years ago, they are inapplicable now. Since these clauses were drafted there has been important legislation on the subject; the Infectious Diseases Notification Act has been passed; there is an organisation for sanitary work in the counties which has made their condition of sanitation one considerably in advance of that in even the large towns. If these clauses be dropped, the Bill, as a Police Bill, will grant all the powers the burghs can reasonably desire, as to police, bye-laws, and so on; and then the question of Sanitary Laws for Scotland, not for the burghs only, but for Scotland as a whole, can be left to be dealt with by some more comprehensive and better-devised measure. I move, Sir, the omission of the clause.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "To leave out the Clause."—(Dr. Cameron.)

(9.43.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): The hon. Member for the College Division said that I had, on a former occasion, expressed myself as having a poor opinion of the Medical Officers of Health in Scotland. I rise to say I have no recollection of saying that. What I did say, and what I say now, is that, with all respect to the Medical Officers of Health in counties, in passing a Bill like this, the Municipal Authorities cannot safely put themselves in the hands of the Medical Officers of Health of the counties and say that the laws shall be made applicable to them without any respect for the popular wants and experience of the burghs. The hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron) represents a constituency outside the purview of this Bill, for Glasgow and the large cities came forward and said they were so advanced in municipal law and matters of health that they preferred to work under their own Acts with regard to sanitary matters, and they were accordingly excluded from the purview of the Bill. Does my hon. Friend suppose that the experience of the officers appointed last year in the counties is sufficient to discount all the experience of the Medical Officers of Health who have been appointed in Glasgow, Edinburgh, Dumfries, Aberdeen, and other large towns of over 50,000 inhabitants for the last ten years? I may, I think, claim to have some interest in sanitary affairs. In the town of which I have been Chief Magistrate we had great difficulty in introducing a Medical Officer of Health at all, but public opinion changed, and we have now in all our large cities Medical Officers of Health, men of great experience, to administer the law. These are not the men who have come forward to object to these clauses; but they are the men on whose opinion we passed the clauses in the Committee. There is no objection to my hon. Friend extending the County Sanitary Regulations to the burghs if they are found to be more applicable than these clauses. We who support the Bill say that in sanitation these small burghs are far behind, and these clauses would greatly improve the present state of things; that is also the opinion of the burghs themselves. My hon. Friend proposes to destroy the individual Home Rule of the burghs, and put them under the County Councils, which has very strong objections on the face of it. The Bill has between 500 and 600 clauses; and the Government knows, the burghs know, and Scotland knows that if we discuss all these clauses it will be impossible to give the Scotch burghs the benefit of the Act. We appeal to our Friends to make such Amendments as are possible and which the Government will accept, and to pass the rest without discussion; then, when we come to apply the Public Health Act of England to Scotland, there will be no more difficulty than exists now. Taking the Bill as it stands, I think it would be well not to disregard the opinion of Medical Officers of Health who have had some experience in municipal affairs. I can remember my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness pressing this Bill a short time ago, and saying that the Sanitary Clauses were most needed. If these Medical Officers had had the courage of their convictions, instead of saying, "Omit the clauses till we can give you another Bill," they would have sent up the Amendments they desired to see made.

Mr. Esslemont

(9.53.) MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): The majority of the Scotch Members were in favour of this Bill as it stands, until certain Amendments were suggested by the Medical Officers of Health. I appeal to the Government to consider these suggestions, which deserve attention, and can be met by Amendments which can be readily drafted. If the Government desire that the Bill should pass—and there is no question that Scotland desires that it should be passed—it should be referred to a large Committee, and then Amendments, which would meet the reasonable objections which have been pointed out by these officers, could be submitted. If such a course were adopted, the Government would see the Bill pass this Session.

(9.56.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): To put the discussion of these clauses in order I move to report Progress. I think if we had not had these speeches we should have got through about 200 clauses by this time. I have been looking over these Sanitary Clauses, and I think they will all require amendment. In Clause 340 the words,

"Unless it be found on diagnosis that such practitioner was incorrect," will require to be left out, as they will create bad feeling, and the medical man's certificate is sufficient. In the same sub-section you compel a medical man to send in reports up to seven days, and do not give any fees: I shall propose that no report be required for seven days, so that if you want them you will have to pay for them. The sub-section would make medical men give unnecessary reports without being paid for them. The easiest course would be to treat these clauses as contentious clauses, and it would be found easier in a Bill of a few clauses to incorporate the English Act of 1890 and apply it to Scotland with such alterations as the differences of administration require. I think if that were done, you could get through the other 250 clauses, including the codifying clauses, to-night, and then you could begin on some other occasion with the contentious clauses. By this means you will be able to give the Bill a chance of passing; but if you begin fighting now on the Public Health Clauses, it would take a great deal too much time, and prevent the Bill passing. I have said—and I say so still—that so far as the public health in Scotland is concerned, both in the burghs and the country, I believe there are tens of thousands of cases where disease and death could have been prevented if there had been a proper Public Health Act, and if it had been properly applied. Hence, I desire to see the Public Health Clauses better than they are here, and applied generally, not only to the burghs, but to the counties. In many cases the small burghs will not have a medical officer themselves, and they will get that work done by the county officer; and the county officer will be in the position of having to apply one Act to one portion of the county and another to another; one Act on one side of the street and another on the other. I think the proposal I have made is a very fair one—namely, that the Police Clause, having nothing to do with public health, but more to do with the apprehension of prisoners, should be dropped out of the Bill for the present, and let the Government consider the comments of the Press on the matter. I think in last week's Lancet one of the strongest articles I ever read appeared with regard to this Bill. I beg to move that you do now report Progress, in order to obtain some explanation as to the course which the Government propose to take.

Motion made, and Question proposed
“That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again.”—(Dr. Clark.)

(10.3.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I greatly regret that the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down and the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow should have taken the course which they have taken with regard to this Bill. Undoubtedly, it is in the power of these gentlemen, if they devote their abilities to the task, to wreck the Bill; but if, happily, we should be able to purchase their forbearance by a concession on the declaratory clauses, or on what the hon. Member describes as the contentious part of the Bill, I should be willing to accept or consider the suggestion of the hon. Member. But I hope the two hon. Gentlemen, if we adopt this compromise, will meet us half-way, and that they will not be too strict in their definition of what is a Sanitary Clause and what is a Police Clause, and, at all events, that the Police Clause may be allowed to pass without any prolonged discussion. I do not deny the force of what has fallen from both hon. Gentlemen who represent the opinion of a very large and important body of the people of Scotland—the medical officers of Scotland. I should be the last to depreciate the opinion of these gentlemen; and though I regret that they have come to the decision that nothing short of amendment on a very large scale of the clauses dealing with sanitary matters will content them, yet I think it would be worth while to defer the discussion on the Sanitary Clauses, and to content ourselves with passing into law the clauses as regards what are in the main unobjectionable improvement. But I think it would be impossible for us to-night to arrive at a definite conclusion as to whether a compromise such as has been adumbrated ought or ought not to be accepted. We cannot really decide that question on the floor of the House; and, therefore, I concur with this view: that we should pass the uncontroversial portion of the Bill, and that we should defer to another occasion the discussion of the Sanitary Clauses. But I hope that when the hon. Gentlemen consider what course should be adopted on the subject, they will feel that if it is decided to make this very important concession—if that concession is made—some concession should be made by them with regard to the discussion on the police portion of the Bill, and that it should be passed without any unduly prolonged discussion. I would suggest that the hon. Gentleman should withdraw his Motion for the Adjournment of the Debate, and that we should proceed to pass through Committee those remaining portions of the Bill which do not deal with sanitary matters, and which, therefore, are not of a contentious character.

(10.7.) DR. CLARK: I beg to withdraw my Motion. So far as I can see, the only other clauses that are controversial, and that would require to be postponed, are Clauses 383, 388, 389, 402, and 415, which are all really Assessment Clauses. The 450th clause is one of the Penalty Clauses, and I think it will require to be postponed; and the 480th clause, by which we are to have one law for the pawnbrokers and marine store dealers in one place and another in another. I do not care much about that. It is a question for the Government themselves to consider. But these are the only clauses that require to be postponed, so far as I can see—six, and three of them are consequential. We might take all the other clauses as they stand.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(10.9.) DR. CAMERON: These are the clauses which are described in the Memorandum which has been circulated as the clauses that should be postponed. In one of the clauses it is provided that if a man break a lamp-post through carelessness he may be brought up before a Magistrate and fined. It is perfectly right to enforce some fine, but what is objectionable is that there should be a different remedy for the recovery of a civil debt in the case of a Public Body as compared with a private individual. As regards the Pawnbroking Clause, pawnbroking in Scotland is regulated by a general Act; and if it is advisable to amend that Act, I have nothing to press upon that point, though it appears a very curious thing that such a provision should be introduced here. But if the Government like to indulge in this futile form of legislation, and the pawnbrokers do not object, I do not object. As to the penalties, discussion would be required as to what should be considered the maximum. The Sheriff at the present time in summary cases has only the power of inflicting a maximum of two months' imprisonment; and according to some clauses of this Bill a Police Magistrate, who has no legal training, can give three months' imprisonment, or one month more than the Sheriff, who is a trained lawyer and an experienced Judge. I think if heavy penalties are to be given, at least they ought to be given by a trained Judge. I should certainly never dream of offering an opinion of my own against that of the majority; but the reason why I have made a stand upon the Sanitary Clauses is that I was convinced that my friends had not looked into the matter as closely as that matter required to be looked into, and that it required a certain amount of discussion to represent the bearings of the proposed legislation to the House in its true light.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

*(10.14.) MR. LENG (Dundee): I can assure the Committee and the Government that it will be extremely regretted in the police burghs generally if the Health Clauses should be withdrawn. It is now eleven years since this Bill first came before the House, and the great fear is that if it is cut in two—if there is to be a Health Bill as well as a Police Bill—eleven years more may elapse before a Health Bill is passed. If we were to adopt that line at the present time it would be very much to be regretted. Recognising the very conciliatory tone of the First Lord of the Treasury, and the desire that exists that the Bill should be passed, I would say to hon. Members let them use the time between this and the further stages of this Bill for the purpose of drafting reasonable Amendments for it. Do not let it be spoiled by passing it as it now stands. I trust that while the Government are conciliatory in their attitude they will not give way to the opposition which emanates from a limited class.

(10.18.) MR. JOHN WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I wish to emphasise what has been said by the hon. Member for Dundee, and to state that my constituents are very anxious that this Bill should not be any longer delayed. I am sure that the passing of the Bill will give universal satisfaction throughout Scotland.

*(10.19.) SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I think that a very reasonable offer has been made by the right hon.

Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, and I hope that it will have the effect of getting a certain portion of the Bill through Committee. The opposition of hon. Members who speak for the medical profession is founded solely on the desire to put all systems of sanitary administration in Scotland upon one and the best level. If there is one thing to be avoided more than another in sanitary administration it is to have two different systems of arrangement in contiguous areas. It is for the sake of securing uniformity that my hon. Friend below the Gangway has raised this discussion.

(10.24.) MR. MARK J. STEWART: Unless we can come to some compromise with regard to this Bill, it is absolutely impossible that it can get through Committee. I am not in favour of every clause in it; for there are certain things in it which must be amended before it can be made a successful measure; but I am anxious that it should go through Committee, and I will not stand in the way of its doing so. I would venture to express the hope that the compromise which has been suggested will be carried out.

*(10.25.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I quite agree that it is a matter for great regret that the Health Clauses in the Bill should not be passed along with the Police Clauses. This is a very important Bill on the whole, and there is practical unanimity on both sides of the House with regard to the Police Clauses; but, unfortunately, there is not that unanimity in regard to the Health Clauses. The same arguments that apply to the Police Clauses do not apply to the Health Clauses. My hon. Friends who object to the Health Clauses undoubtedly have something like a prima facie case against them; and if they persevere in their opposition, they can no doubt defeat the Bill. I do not say that their opposition is well founded on every point, but it certainly seems to me that it would be advantageous to Scotland to have the Police Clauses passed even without the Health Clauses. I hope that hon. Members for Scotland will treat the matter in a spirit of fair compromise.

(10.28.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): The Committee appear to me in a very sensible frame of mind. I can see no difficulty in the way of settling this matter. I think that the Bill might be divided into two parts; and that if the Scotch people wish to have the Health portion pushed forward, it should be the duty of hon. Members to promote the welfare of the people of Scotland in that direction.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause postponed.

Clause 383.

DR. CLARK: Clauses 383, 388, and 389 are contentious. The only other clauses which will require to be postponed are 402, 415, which are chiefly Assessment Clauses, 450, which is a Penalty Clause, and Clause 480, under which there is one law for your pawnbrokers and marine store dealers in one place, and another for those engaged in those businesses elsewhere.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 384 to 387, inclusive, agreed to.

Clauses 388 and 389 postponed.

Clauses 390 to 395, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 396.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Lanark, Govan): I suggest that in the interests of poor people unable to pay the police rates that permission should be given to the Magistrate before issuing the warrant to relieve these poor people from the expense and trouble they may be put to in order to raise the money. I find in the Poor Law Act a provision whereby the poor can be relieved of the rates by coming before the Magistrate and pleading poverty. I think it would be wise to save the infliction and annoyance of a warrant in such cases.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): Although I should be willing to give the utmost consideration to any suggestion based upon those grounds, I must point out that the question has nothing whatever to do with this clause. This is not a clause to relieve anyone; it is a clause to provide for appeal where the collector has done something that causes anyone to feel aggrieved.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 397 to 401, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 402.

DR. CLARK: This clause is out of its place. It is like 140 and 141, and should, therefore, follow them.

SIR C. J. PEARSON: It is among the Assessment Clauses, and is quite in its proper place.

DR. CLARK: The proposals of Clauses 141 and 142 relate to the upkeep and maintenance of the pavements. The present law is that they are maintained by the landlords. If these clauses pass, then they will be maintained by the Town Councils or the Commissioners as the case may be; so that when we discuss Clause 140 it will govern and rule this 402.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 403 to 406, inclusive, postponed.

Clauses 407 to 414, inclusive, agreed to.
Clause 415.

DR. CLARK: This is also one of the Assessment Clauses.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I think that is true to a certain extent, but I must not be considered as acquiescing in the previous clause or the one under discussion. I think the hon. Member is mistaken, but as the one is postponed I do not object to the other being similarly treated.

Clause postponed.

Clause 416.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I desire to omit the words beginning with "other than," in line 7, and ending with "provided," in line 9. It is a matter of considerable importance, and yet I do not think there is any risk of its being contentious. A recent decision in the Court of Session raised the question whether public authorities were disabled from borrowing for the purpose of making, enlarging, ventilating and re-constructing sewers. Public authorities have been in the habit of doing so, and that there may be no doubt as to their power I propose to omit the words.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 417 to 421, inclusive, agreed to.
Clause 422.

DR. CAMERON: This clause renders persons liable to a fine of £10 or 60 days' imprisonment, to be inflicted by an untrained Magistrate, although two months' imprisonment is as long a term of imprisonment as can be inflicted by a Sheriff. In certain instances the terms of punishment are longer, because a man may be sentenced to 60 days' imprisonment, and, failing a fine, to another 30 days. That confers upon the Magistrate power of very summary treatment. I desire the right hon. Gentleman to look into the matter, and consider whether it would not be safer to provide that the Sheriff should deal with the persons.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): This power has been always in the hands of the Burgh Magistrates, and I know of no case in which it has been abused. It is true there is a good deal said against unpaid Magistrates altogether, but that is a different question from the one now before the House.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I rather think the hon. Member will find that under this Bill all the penalties to which he objects are of 60 days or under, or if they do exceed that it is only in exceptional cases. It must not be regarded absolutely as a £10 fine or 60 days' imprisonment whenever this Bill mentions those penalties. In every case, as far as I recollect, it is a penalty "not exceeding" the one or the other, and I think we may well trust the Magistrates to award such penalties as, in their opinion, are fair and reasonable in the circumstances of the case. As to the proposal that these offences should be relegated to the Sheriff, I am surprised to hear that suggestion from the hon. Member, and at the same time it is not one that I can accept. To relegate these offences to the Sheriff would overwhelm those hard-working officers with additional work; and, in the second place, it would take away from the Burgh Magistrates a class of offences which I think they are more competent to deal with than the Sheriffs.

DR. CAMERON: I do not wish to say a word against bailies and Burgh Magistrates, but what I say is that unpaid and untrained Magistrates should be restricted to small penalties.

MR. LENG (Dundee): If this clause errs at all, I think it is in the direction of leniency. There are a number of human brutes who care little for the imposition of a fine, and I think the only thing likely to have a deterrent effect would be the power of imprisoning the offender. In my opinion, therefore, the alternative of imprisonment might with advantage be added to some of the clauses of the Bill.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I believe hon. Members must agree that the penalties proposed in the Bill are only fair and reasonable.

DR. CAMERON: I do not say the penalties are too heavy, but what I should be opposed to would be increasing the powers of these Burgh Magistrates in the way of inflicting long terms of imprisonment.

MR. ESSLEMONT: Sixty days is the outside limit, with a further limit for caution, but I have never heard of this being used, or of any complaints being made on the point.

DR. CAMERON: I move that the clause be postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Clause postponed.

Clause 423 agreed to.

Clause 424 postponed.

Clause 425 agreed to.

Clause 426 postponed.

Clauses 427 to 449, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 450.

DR. CLARK: This clause refers to begging, and I should like to know if it introduces any alteration into the law of Scotland as it stands now. Does it introduce any new punishment?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It is substantially the same as the old Act.

DR. CAMERON: Is it the same in respect to persons conducting themselves as vagrants?

SIR C. J. PEARSON: Yes, substantially the same.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 451 to 469, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 470.

DR. CAMERON: I think these clauses ought to be postponed.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: No doubt these clauses are very closely connected with the policing of our large towns, but they scarcely seem to me to be Public Health Clauses.

DR. CAMERON: I did not understand that all the postponed clauses are Public Health Clauses. I think it would be better if we could in some way follow the clauses as they are put down in the Memorandum which we have received, and then, when we come to talk them over quietly afterwards, we shall easily be able to arrive at an agreement.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I have not gathered previously that the hon. Member intends to consider all these clauses as Public Health Clauses. It is perfectly plain that some of these go a long way beyond what is called Public Health.

DR. CAMERON: The First Lord of the Treasury distinctly informed us that the Government did not wish to force these clauses through if we were not ready.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government have no desire to press any clause to which the Scotch Members make any objection, and if on consideration they think there is a prima facie case for objecting, I do not desire to ask the Committee to accept it as part of the Bill at present. If they adhere to the view that has been expressed, we shall not endeavour to force the clauses through Committee.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 471 to 476, inclusive, postponed.

Clauses 477 and 478 agreed to.

Clause 479 postponed.

Clauses 480 to 534, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 535.

DR. CAMERON: I wish to direct the Lord Advocate's attention to this clause. It says—

"It shall be lawful for a Magistrate in case of any offence committed by a child not more than twelve, to summon the parent or guardian of such child to appear in Court, and ordain such parent or guardian to find caution for the good behaviour of such child as aforesaid, and to sentence the person ordained to find such caution to imprisonment till such caution be found."

If a boy commits an offence, the Magistrate does not punish him, but punishes the parent if he cannot find caution. Surely that is not intended?

MR. ESSLEMONT: By the proviso you have to show that the child is under the control of the parent before calling on him to find caution. I have had before me cases where parents aided and abetted the crime in order to get the child sent to a reformatory or industrial school. The object of the clause is not to punish such a child sent out to steal, but to punish the parent who sent it out. The clause proposes to punish parents when they have responsibility, but they will not be punished unless they are guilty to such an extent as I have mentioned. I know of no clause which is more needed.

DR. CAMERON: If anything were required to make me more dubious than ever of the sagacity of unpaid Magistrates, even if they have been chief Magistrates of a great city, it is the defence my hon. Friend has got up for the proposal to punish the parent, who has committed no crime whatever, for a crime committed by his child, if he is so poor that he cannot find caution.

MR. ESSLEMONT: I said the desire was to punish the parent for the crime of sending out the child to steal, as I have known to be done. Nothing has convinced me more of the incapacity of my hon. Friend than his having supposed that poverty was a crime under the clause.

DR. CLARK: The clause says nothing about the fault of the parent or guardian, but faults on their part can be punished under the innumerable offences created by the Bill. I think the punishment of a parent sending his child out to beg is provided for in the Vagrancy Clause just passed. This clause calls upon the parent to find security instead of punishing the child. That is a capital provision constantly adopted in first offences. If the parent cannot find security, however, he is liable to imprisonment.

MR. ESSLEMONT: The last part of the clause shows that if the parent has exercised all due caution there can be no offence.

DR. CAMERON: That is during the six months which the security runs. My point is that if the parent cannot find security he may be sent to prison, and surely that is not intended.

DR. CLARK: I think there is some change in the first part of this clause since we passed it in the Committee, as it stands if a man, from poverty, cannot find the security he can be imprisoned till he has found it.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I think it would be wiser to postpone this clause, and I will undertake to give it my very careful attention.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 536 to 547 inclusive, agreed to.

Mr. Esslemont

Clause 548 postponed.

Clauses 549 to 558, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 559.

DR. CAMERON: My Amendment is to substitute the "Secretary for Scotland" for "Lord Advocate." The analogous minister to the English Home Secretary is the Secretary for Scotland, and he would be the proper person to put the Court in motion.

Amendment proposed,

In page 204, line 11, to leave out "Lord Advocate," and insert "Secretary for Scotland."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That 'Lord Advocate' stand part of the Clause."

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: The objections to the Amendment are that the Lord Advocate has always made the applications in the High Court of Justiciary, and it would not be appropriate for the Secretary of Scotland to appear there to make motions. Secondly, the Lord Advocate has been the official, so far as I understand the practice in Scotland, who has to initiate any proceedings for fixing forms of procedure even in Police Courts. It is expedient that should be done from time to time to secure uniformity, and I see no reason why the rule should be altered.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 560 to 562, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 563.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I can relieve the Committee of one clause. This is a purely Departmental clause, and is I think unnecessary in this Bill. I move that it be omitted.

Clause omitted.

Postponed clauses further postponed till after the Schedules.

Schedule 1 agreed to.

DR. CLARK: I think Schedules 2 and 3 should be postponed, as they will require Amendment if they are retained.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: It was my intention to move the postponement of the Schedules, as it would not do to pass them till we have decided whether they should include the Police and Public Health Acts or not.

edules 2 and 3 postponed.

Schedule 4.

DR. CLARK: The other Schedules, I think, may be considered non-contentious, although they occupy many pages.

DR. CAMERON: In connection with the clauses I think they may require a little modification; but I do not press the postponement if the right hon. Gentleman thinks differently. Some details, however, may want modification. I thought the right hon. Gentleman agreed to postpone all the Schedules?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I have no objection to the postponement of all the Schedules, and to do so will probably conduce to brevity afterwards. They will have to be gone over carefully in consequence of alterations made in the Bill.

Schedules 4 to 11, inclusive, postponed.

Committee report Progress: to sit again upon Monday next.

ACCUMULATIONS BILL.—(No. 277.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(11.35.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I have to say it only touches a few cases and a very small part of a subject which has received a good deal of attention in past years. There are a few cases in which directions have been given, by will or otherwise, for the accumulation of the rents or profits from property, and the investment of such profits in the purchase of land. Owing to the alteration of the circumstances under which land is held, from those obtaining when the direction was given, very great inconvenience is found to arise therefrom, and it is proposed to limit the accumulations for the purchase of land to the period of the minority of the person who, under the trusts of the instrument directing the accumulation, would be entitled to receive the rents, issues, profits, or income of the property if of full age. The Bill will touch only a limited number of cases, and I now ask the House to read it a second time, for I think no question arises that may not be dealt with on the Committee stage.

VOL. III.

[FOURTH SERIES.]

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir R. Webster.)

(11.36.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): I hope the House will consent to the Second Reading. The Bill has a useful purpose, and deals with a need much felt in the country. Although, as the Attorney General is well aware, it does not go to the full extent of the evil to be remedied, certainly it is a Bill which ought not to be opposed.

*(11.36.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I am not surprised at the praise given to the Bill by the hon. and learned Member opposite; but I am surprised that this Bill should have been brought in by the Government. The Bill certainly has a rather misleading name. I should have thought it would have been better described as an "Accumulations in Land Prohibition" Bill. But it may occur to hon. Members to wonder why people may accumulate everything else but land. The day, I suppose, has gone by when the wishes of a testator received respect and consideration, and I suppose it would be considered an anachronism now to say that some regard ought to be paid to the wishes of a man who made sacrifices in his lifetime for the benefit of his successors, and to get back the land which had gone from the possession of his family. I am not interested in the possession of land, but I do say that nothing can be more calculated to destroy the value of land than such a Bill as this. We are told there are some cases in which the Bill might be useful; we are told of the altered conditions of land; but those who made arrangements for their property after their death on behalf of those they wished to benefit must be supposed to have had some knowledge that land might rise or fall in value. It seems to me there is no reason, because land has now fallen in value, why all the wishes, all the sacrifices men have thought it right to make during their lives for those they loved and wished to benefit, should be completely ignored and disregarded. Of course, I know it is not in my power to stop the progress of the Bill, and therefore I confine myself to suggesting a slight alteration which I trust the Government may agree to. The offence aimed at by the Bill is the dire offence of attempting to accumulate land. Now, if it is an offence—and I will suppose it is a gross offence—I cannot see why the offence which is created by the instrument under which the land is accumulated requires a provision such as this in the Bill. A man may not leave the rents and profits of property to be accumulated for the increase of the area of his land. By law the profits are not to be used to buy land; but why, if land is not to be accumulated, may not the rents and profits be allowed to be accumulated in some other form? You allow a man by any instrument to provide that after his death the accumulation of profits shall be invested in stocks of all kinds; but you say this shall not be the case in the matter of land; but why should not the rents and profits from land be accumulated in the way of investment in stocks? That would prevent the mischief—if it be mischief, though I cannot conceive how it is so—at which the Bill aims. I wish to ask the Attorney General if he will consent to a slight Amendment putting an end to accumulations in the way of land, but allowing people who happen to die possessed of land, and wish to increase their property for the benefit of those who are interested in the same way as those who have been more fortunate and have invested in stocks, to re-invest the interest and profits derived, if not in land, in certain specified stocks? I express my regret that the Bill has been brought forward, and I cannot understand what is the great mischief that is deemed to be met by it. I think it is lamentable that the wishes of those who during their lives have made great sacrifices for the purpose of accumulating property for the benefit of those in whom they are interested should be utterly disregarded and ignored.

*(11.40.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I am glad on this occasion to support the Government in what I believe to be a step in the right direction, and I trust that the hon. and learned Gentleman will not allow the Bill to become a farce by accepting such an Amendment as that which has been suggested. Although this is a very small Bill, it is a step in the direction of free trade in land, and I hope it will be carried into law without being mutilated as proposed.

*(11.41.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): This Bill is of a very peculiar character, and deserves, I think, a little more explanation than has been given to it. The Thellusson Act has been in force for a long time, and I think it is only right, before we are asked to alter an Act which has been so long in existence, and which on the whole has worked well, that we should have some explanation of the cases which have arisen, and which make it necessary to introduce these alterations. I am not aware that there are any greater objections to instruments directing the accumulation of profits to be invested in land than to the accumulation of funds to be invested in any other way. We are entitled to some kind of explanation why this particular form of investment is objectionable. But I specially call attention to Clause 2, and, assuming that there is something obnoxious in investing accumulations in land, and that it would be proper to direct that trusts, so far as they require this particular kind of investment only, should be void in the future, that is not the way to treat existing trusts. The fault, so far as we can judge from the Bill, is not that accumulations are wrong, but the mode in which the accumulations are directed to be invested is objectionable. The remedy, then, is not to declare that the direction for accumulation shall be void, but that the direction for this particular form of investing the accumulations shall be inoperative. Surely it is a sound principle to say you ought not to affect trusts more than is necessary to carry out the object of this Bill; and the object of this Bill is, for some unknown reason, to declare that accumulations shall not beyond a certain period be invested in land. Then why not limit the change to preventing the mischief which is supposed to arise, directing that trusts shall be so far modified as to allow investment in other ways to which there is not this great objection? I hope we may hear from the Attorney General that he will be prepared in Committee to consider whether the Bill can be modified to this extent.

Mr. Kelly

*(11.45.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I think explanation is sorely needed both by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), and also by the hon. Member for Camberwell (Mr. Kelly), and I think it is just as well that some explanation should be attempted to be furnished from this side of the House, as none appears to be forthcoming from the Treasury Bench. My own view of the reasons which have led to the introduction of this Bill—a Bill to which I do not object—is this: that, emanating from a Tory Government, we may naturally suppose it is an emanation from those who have landlord interests at heart, and not only these, but the interests of landlords' descendants. What I believe has induced right hon. Gentlemen to introduce the Bill is this: they say the pestilent Radicalism of modern times is certain to reduce the value of land; and they say that it will be a very horrible thing if, as time goes on, noble Lords and those who possess a great deal of land will go on making wills, as they have continued for generations to do, directing that profits shall be invested in the accumulation of more land. The result will be that noble Lords and their descendants will be compelled to go on buying land in what right hon. Gentlemen know very well will be a falling market, until the Radicalism of modern legislation, the coming legislation, has the effect, in the near future, of reducing land to its real agricultural value in contradistinction to the fictitious value it has hitherto possessed, and which to some degree it possesses at present. In the absence of all voice from the Government, this is the explanation I, from below the Gangway, venture to offer to hon. Gentlemen behind the Treasury Bench.

*(11.47.) SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): Some explanation is required of Clause 2. It appears to be retrospective in its operation, and we ought to know whether that is intended or not? I have no objection myself to either of the clauses; but I think we should pass the Bill with our eyes open, knowing whether or not it will affect trusts created many years ago.

*(11.47.) SIR R. WEBSTER: Only by the indulgence of the House can I answer the questions which have been put. First, in reference to the question raised by the hon. Member for Camberwell (Mr. Kelly), of course, if he proposes an Amendment in Committee stage in reference to any direction to be given as to what is to be done with the money which otherwise ought to be invested in land according to the will or instrument, that Amendment will be carefully considered; but it is difficult to say off-hand whether we could accept it until we see the way the condition is imposed, and how far it agrees with the object of the Bill, which is to alter the law, and put an end to the accumulations of land by trusts created for that purpose. Then my hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson) asks what is the necessity for the introduction of the Bill, and perhaps I ought to apologise for not having made a longer statement in moving the Second Reading; but when I remembered how this matter has been discussed twice in the last two Sessions on a Bill introduced by the hon. Member for North Norfolk (Mr. Cozens-Hardy), and by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Wellington Division of Somerset (Mr. Elton), when the matter was gone into very thoroughly, I could not conceive that hon. Members had forgotten these discussions; but had I known there was any wish for further information, I would have endeavoured to have fulfilled that wish by making a more lengthened explanation. My hon. Friend also raises the question as to the disposition of the income which otherwise would be invested in land. It is a question for the House to decide whether, accumulations in land being no longer permitted in the way provided by the testator, the profits should take some other form of investment, or should go to the person who would be entitled thereto, had there been no such direction. It is part of the proposition of my hon. Friend the Member for Camberwell. The hon. Member for Ilkeston (Sir W. Foster) asks whether the second clause is retrospective in its action, and, as I understand, it is so intended. If, however, in the view of the House it ought not to apply to trusts other than those created after the passing of the Act, then the operation of the clause may be so limited; but I frankly say that the clause as it stands will take effect against all future accumulations even though they might arise under trusts created before the passing of the Act. Should the view be taken that the clauses should not be retrospective, that view may be developed by Amendments in Committee. I would have directed my explanation more to details if I had thought that had been expected; but I thought, in view of what has taken place before, that was not necessary.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES (LEASEHOLD ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL).—(No. 114.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [18th February], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(11.54.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Here I think I may fairly ask for some explanation. So far as I am concerned, I should be glad to see any proper scheme formulated by which Industrial and Provident Societies may acquire the freehold of their leaseholds; but I do not understand what safeguards the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Seale-Hayne) proposes to secure that the Bill should apply only to those whom it is intended to benefit. I am quite well aware that this matter formed the subject of discussion before a Committee upstairs—the Town Holdings Committee, I think—and that it is upon the result of that discussion the Bill is introduced; but that does not seem to me a sufficient explanation when we are asked to deal with only one branch of that inquiry. I think the House should have some explanation, so that we may judge of the principle which has been adopted before we assent to the Second Reading. I do not think you ought to take out any particular part of the subject without saying if you are able to separate it from those evils some of us think accompany it. I have not the slightest objection to discuss the Bill, but it must have a fair discussion. The Second Reading cannot be taken pro forma, and possibly the House will consider it will be more convenient to adjourn the debate now.

(11.56.) MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): The Bill simply carries out a unanimous recommendation of the Town Holdings Committee that Provident Societies should be empowered to purchase the reversion of their leases; it does nothing more than carry out that recommendation. The Bill has nothing of a Party character about it, hon. Members from either side of the House having set their names to it. The Bill is earnestly desired by Provident and Industrial Societies throughout the country, and I trust that the Attorney General will consent to the Second Reading, allowing points of detail to stand over for the Committee stage, which I will appoint for any day he pleases, allowing ample time for the consideration of Amendments.

*(11.58.) MR. TOMLINSON: I do not happen to know the grounds upon which the Town Holdings Committee made their recommendations, and the hon. Member has not enlightened us. But I assume there were some cases of hardship in reference to Societies of this kind upon which this recommendation was made. But this, I understand, was not the only recommendation made by the Town Holdings Committee, and I very much doubt the expediency of taking one kind of property here and another kind of property there, and dealing with them in separate Bills. As to this Bill being very much desired by these Societies, I may mention that I received a request from gentlemen representing a Co-operative Society that I would support the Bill, and I wrote to them asking them in what way they expected the Bill would benefit them, for I had a strong impression that they did not know whether the provisions of the Bill would be of any use to them, but I have received no reply.—

It being Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

TREES (IRELAND) BILL.—(No. 80.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Objection taken.

*(12.0.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I ask the hon. Member (Mr. Kelly) to withdraw his objection. Last year the Government assented to the principle by allowing the Second Reading of a precisely similar Bill.

*(12.0.) MR. KELLY: I am perfectly well aware what the Bill is, and if the promoters of it will agree to accept the Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for South Antrim (Mr.

Macartney) there will be no difficulty in getting the Bill through.

MR. KNOX: If the hon. Member had taken occasion to mention this Amendment we should have been very glad to have considered it.

*MR. KELLY: The Amendments have been down on the Paper two successive years, I believe, and I am perfectly sure that some were actually discussed in Committee last year.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILL.—(No. 266.)

Read a second time, and committed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 267.)

Read a second time, and committed.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 3) BILL.—(No. 268.)

Read a second time, and committed.

PUBLIC HEALTH (SCOTLAND) PROVISIONAL ORDER [MILNATHORT WATER] BILL.—(No. 280.)

Read a second time, and committed.

PUBLIC ANALYSTS IN POLICE BURGHS BILL.—(No. 225.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

Leave given to present another Bill instead thereof.

PUBLIC ANALYSTS IN POLICE BURGHS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 225.]

MOTIONS.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 4) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Urban Sanitary Districts of Halifax, Milford, Northampton, Rochdale, Tenterden, and Wigan, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 305.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 5) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Urban Sanitary Districts of Dover, Merthyr Tydvil, Plymouth, and Torquay, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 306.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT PROVISIONAL ORDERS (NO. 6) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm certain Provisional Orders of the Local Government Board relating to the Boroughs of Chard and Henley-upon-Thames, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 307.]

ALLOTMENTS PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Long, Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the County Council of Gloucester under the Allotments Act, 1887, relating to the Parish of Abson-with-wick, in the Rural Sanitary District of the Chipping Sodbury Union, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Long and Mr. Ritchie.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 308.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): May I ask the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston) who has charge of the Assistant County Surveyors (Ireland) Bill, and has set the Bill down for Monday, not to move the Second Reading then. I have inquired at the Bill Office and I am informed that it has not yet been printed.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): The Bill will be further postponed from Monday.

(12.4.) DR. TANNER: I had occasion to-day to put a distinct question to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, in reference to the treatment in prison of the convict, Mrs. Montagu, whether she is wearing her own dress or the prison dress; and strange to say, owing to the extraordinary answers, the embarrassing answers I received to-day, and on a former occasion, from the right hon. Gentleman a misunderstanding on the point remains, and many journals in the country have been led astray, and have led their readers to suppose that Mrs. Montagu is wearing prison clothes. I asked the right hon. Gentleman to-day to answer me in plain and simple language whether Mrs. Montagu is wearing prison clothes or her own attire. I have also called attention to the fact that when the prisoner was removed to Derry Prison she wore a silk dress and mantilla, was conveyed first-class, and had every possible attention paid to her; and I also endeavoured, in my questions, to indicate the contrast to the treatment we received when we were political prisoners, every indignity being heaped upon us. But this woman, this murderess of her own child, and for whom none of her Antrim supporters will stand up to say a single word, has been treated with the highest consideration, taken first class from one prison to another, accompanied by her maid and allowed to dress in her own attire. Yesterday I asked the right hon. Gentleman a question couched in the plainest possible terms, and again this afternoon I repeated my question, seeing that in different sections of the Press the answers given were not understood. Once more I ask the right hon. Gentleman by his answer to clear away these doubts, and say, is this woman to receive better treatment than my hon. Friend the Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien), or any of our friends received? Is this rich woman, who murdered her own child, to receive the lenient treatment awarded to the Belfast forgers, to suit the exigencies of their station, while we, imprisoned for political offences on behalf of our land and people, suffered all the indignities our political adversaries thought proper to inflict? Will the Chief Secretary settle the matter once for all, and say whether Mrs. Montagu is required while in prison to wear a prisoner's dress?

(12.8.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I must say a word. I know nothing of Mrs. Montagu, but I do protest against my hon. Friend using the expression "murder." She committed an act of folly—of gross folly—but she had not the faintest intention of causing the death of her child. Another thing I may mention. Mrs. Montagu is a Catholic, and she did not have a fair trial, because Catholics were struck off the jury. I believe this lady, who has been foolish, criminally foolish, has not been fairly treated. She was a Catholic living in the North of Ireland, and a great deal of Protestant prejudice was excited against her. I believe she has been too severely punished. She incurred, and no doubt deserved, public censure, and this alone was sufficient punishment, a year's imprisonment is altogether too much. I wish to dissociate myself altogether from what the hon. Member for Mid Cork has said, and I really think he ought to get up and withdraw the expression "murderess." There is nothing in the evidence, the finding of the jury, or the speech of the Judge to justify the horrible imputation. It is a terrible responsibility to level this accusation of murder without a shadow of foundation, and certainly when this unfortunate woman has suffered heavy punishment this should not be added.

Dr. Tanner

(12.10.) DR. TANNER: If I may be allowed a word of explanation, let me say in this matter I do not stand alone, and that the hon. and gallant Gentleman's friend and colleague, the hon. Member for North Monaghan (Mr. Patrick O'Brien), joined with me in raising this question. I have nothing to withdraw, and this lady—this woman, I must still call a murderess.

*(12.11.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I do not propose to do more than simply answer the question of the hon. Member for Mid Cork. I thought I had made the matter clear. I endeavoured to explain that there had been no exceptional treatment in this case. A rule was laid down after very careful consideration, and amended in 1889, giving power to the Prison Commissioners to permit prisoners to wear their own clothes upon application made. I said application had been made, and that the Commissioners acted within their discretion, as they had a right to do; and I think, if the rule is carefully studied, we must even go so far as to say that in the circumstances under which the rule was framed it was contemplated that, unless there were sufficient reasons to the contrary, such permission need not be refused. No exception was made in this case, and I should regret if there had been. I think it must be clear from my answer, and I hoped I had made it clear yesterday, that permission to this prisoner to wear her own clothes was given by the Prisons Board. I do not see how there can be any doubt after the answer I gave yesterday and to-day. To the other questions it is quite unnecessary to go into them, and I feel sure that it will not be consonant to the feeling of the House to refer to matters which may make this painful case still more painful.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 2nd May, 1892.

SAT FIRST.

Lord Kilmarnock (E. Erroll), after the death of his father.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ALLOTMENTS BILL.

Returned from the Commons with the Amendments agreed to.

RAILWAY PASSENGERS ASSURANCE COMPANY BILL.—[H.L.]

Returned from the Commons agreed to, with an Amendment.

STATUTE LAW REVISION.

Message from the Commons to acquaint this House that they have added a Member to the Joint Committee appointed by both Houses to consider the subject of Statute Law Revision, as requested in their Lordships' Message of the 7th April last.

PILOTAGE PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND)

PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 1) BILL.

House in Committee (according to order): Bills reported without Amendment; Standing Committee negatived; and Bills to be read 3^a to-morrow.

SHERIFF COURTS (SCOTLAND)

EXTRACTS BILL.—(No. 67.)

Read 1^a, and to be printed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Ordered that the Evening Sitting of the House to-morrow do commence at a quarter past Four o'clock.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 2nd May, 1892.

QUESTIONS.

THE HOUSE OF COMMONS SIGNAL LIGHT.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works what is the cost per Session, including attendant's wages, of the signal light on the Tower of the House of Commons, and what would be the cost of an electric light so placed on the summit of the Tower, as to be visible from all parts of London; and whether he proposes to replace the present light by the electric light?

VOL. III. [FOURTH SERIES.]

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The cost of the signal light of the House of Commons per Session, including the attendant's wages, is £60. The initial cost of substituting an electric light, as suggested by the hon. Member, would not be less than £750, and its annual cost £150. I believe, however, that it would be possible to re-arrange the existing gas signal light so that with the assistance of lenses it could be made visible all round, at an initial expense of, approximately, £400 or £500. I cannot undertake to carry out any change this Session, but I think there is substance in the complaint of the hon. Member, and I will take care that it is considered in connection with next year's Estimates.

OIL RIVERS TERRITORY.

MR. WILLIAM H. CROSS (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Courts of Equity established on the Oil Rivers for the purpose of counselling and assisting Her Majesty's Consuls in regard to the administration of that territory have been, or are now being, abolished by Major MacDonald, Her Majesty's Commissioner; and, if so, whether it is in accordance with the intention of Her Majesty's Government that the representatives of British trading firms shall have no participation whatever in the affairs of that district, the trade of which has now been laid under heavy taxation?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): The so-called Courts of Equity, for which provision was made by the Order in Council of 21st February, 1872, were merely arbitrators having no jurisdiction except by consent, nor any power to enforce their decisions. They have ceased to exist since the Order in Council of 26th March, 1885, supplemented by the Order in Council of 22nd October, 1889, has established a regular judicial administration and furnished it with power and authority. Trade is not heavily taxed in the district, except that in distilled spirits and firearms, which are being taxed in accordance with the provisions of the Brussels Act. No other taxes are, or will be, levied beyond such as are requisite to balance the cost of administration.

LOCAL BOARDS AND SUNDAY CLOSING PETITIONS.

MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it comes within the province of a Local Board to affix the seal of the Board to a Petition for the Sunday closing of public-houses?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam) (who replied) said: My right hon. Friend desires me to say that the Local Government Board has no jurisdiction in regard to the proceedings of a Local Board in such a matter. At the same time, my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board desires me to say that the question of the Sunday closing of public-houses does not appear to him to come within the province of a Local Board.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): Have not Local Boards power to petition for legislation?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: I did not say they have not the power to pass such resolutions.

VACCINATION.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the attention of the Board has been called to the conduct of Mr. Sutton, the Medical Officer of the King's Norton Board of Guardians, concerning the vaccination and the death of a child named Dangerfield; whether he is aware that the Guardians, at their last meeting, by a majority of one, refused to ask the Local Government Board whether chicken pox is a disease which under the General Order of the 28th February, 1887, should preclude a public vaccinator from vaccinating a child suffering from it, and if a protest has since been received from the minority; and whether he will make special inquiries into the case, and give instructions with a view of preventing in the future the vaccination of a child without proper previous examination by the Medical Officer into the state of its health?

MR. STUART WORTLEY: My right hon. Friend has requested me to answer the question. The Local Government Board has received a communication signed by six Guardians of the King's Norton Union, in which it is alleged that a public vaccinator lately vaccinated a child suffering from chicken pox, and inquiring whether, in the opinion of the Board, the public vaccinator was right in his view that the existence of this disease was no objection to the vaccination of a child. This is probably the case to which the question of the hon. Member refers. I am making further inquiries, and have requested the Board of Guardians to procure from the public vaccinator who vaccinated the child, and to forward to the Board, a detailed Report upon the circumstances of the case alluded to.

SCARIFF PIER.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what was the tonnage of goods delivered at the Scariff Pier during the twelve months ending 31st December, 1891, and the amount of tolls received by the Irish Board of Works there during the same period?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The tonnage was 3,740 tons, and the tolls and wharfage amounted to £18 10s. 2d.

MR. COX: I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman is labouring under some mistake, because the books of the Board of Trade show items making up a total revenue of £92 10s. and a total tonnage of 5,290 tons. Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire into this question again; and if the figures I have given prove to be correct, will he re-consider his previous answer and ask the Board of Works to have a crane erected there?

Mr. J. W. Lowther

SIR J. GORST: I can only give the information supplied to me by the Board of Works, from which the hon. Member's information shows a discrepancy. I have no means of ascertaining which is correct.

MR. COX: But my information is from the Board of Works, books at the place.

MRS. MONTAGU'S CHILDREN.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether any steps have been taken, or are intended to be taken, to deprive Mrs. Montagu of the custody of her children at the expiration of her sentence?

MR. McCARTAN (Down, S.): Before the right hon. and learned Gentleman answers may I ask is he aware that it appears from the report of the trial that, in the opinion of the Judge who tried the case, the prisoner acted from a mistaken sense of duty, and never intended the consequence that followed her treatment of her child?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): As to the latter question, I can only say that I have no further knowledge than is possessed by any member of the public who has read in the Press the verdict of the jury and the language used by the learned Judge. In answer to the question on the Paper, I have to say that during the imprisonment of Mrs. Montagu her husband is solely entitled to the custody and care of his infant children, and there is no reason to apprehend his duty to them is not being properly discharged. At present I have no power to take any steps, and there is no reason for any intervention.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Does the right hon. Gentleman think it is desirable that the husband should have charge of the children, considering that the treatment to which they were subjected was within his knowledge, and he was unmanly enough to allow it?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman has not quite answered my question, which is whether Mrs. Montagu, when she comes out of prison, should have custody of the children? Should not protection be secured for them?

MR. MADDEN: That question will not arise until April, 1893. I gather from the hon. Gentleman asking me what course I intend to take as Attorney General at that date, that he does not anticipate any change in the Government of Ireland in the interval. I fully adopt the hon. Gentleman's view of the probabilities of the case, and if he will put the question to me in April I shall be glad to answer it. In the meantime, I can assure him that the case has been, and shall be, carefully considered.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): Can the right hon. Gentleman say if there is any foundation for the rumour that Mrs. Montagu is about to be released from prison?

MR. MADDEN: No, Sir.

CIRCULARS BY POST.

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the notices sent out by a Benefit Society, such as the Goldsmiths' and Jewellers', are to be considered circulars or letters; and whether he will issue a general instruction, so that a uniform practice may be carried out at the various offices, and thus avoid the inconvenience caused by different interpretations of the Post Office Regulations?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The notices sent out by Benefit Societies are treated in the post as circulars, passing at a halfpenny, provided that the statement of account is distinct from the circular. The Society in question does not appear to have conformed to this rule, with which I understand that generally the Friendly Societies are well contented. It is a modification expressly designed in their interest. The instruction issued is quite definite, but there has been in some cases a failure to comply with it. There is a substantial reason for the requirement; for if such circulars were allowed to contain varying particulars, all others must be allowed the same latitude, and a considerable loss of revenue would result.

THE ERASMUS SMITH ENDOWMENT.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland why the publication of the draft scheme with reference to the Erasmus Smith Endowment, promised at Easter, is still delayed by the Endowed Schools Commissioners; how long is it since the Commissioners held their inquiry as to these Schools; and what is the cause of the delay in publishing the draft scheme, and when it will be published?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Educational Endowments Commissioners report that the scheme for the Erasmus Smith Endowment has been settled, and that the final revise is in the hands of the printers. The publication of the scheme has been fixed for the 14th. The delay has been due to questions arising out of the complications of the case.

INSURRECTION IN VENEZUELA.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any communication has been received from Her Majesty's Consul or Acting Representative at Caracas with reference to the recent outbreak in Venezuela; and whether any instructions have been sent with regard to the protection of the lives and property of British subjects in Venezuela?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: No Report has yet been received from the British Consul at Caracas with reference to the recent outbreak in Venezuela, but Despatches from him are probably now on the road home. The Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's Naval Forces on the West Indian Station reported on the 13th April that he had ordered H.M.S. Canada to La Guayra, the port of Caracas. H.M.S. Tourmaline had also been ordered to proceed to La Guayra with authority for both of them to remain there if the state of affairs should be such as to necessitate their joint presence.

CIVIL SERVICE SICK LEAVE.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he can say how many months' continuous sick leave, or continuous sick and private leave combined, are allowed, with full pay, to Civil servants of the Crown; whether the same period of continuous leave, with full pay, is granted equally to ordinary clerks and to the superior officials, and if the same rule applies equally in all Departments of the State; whether there is any truth in the rumour mentioned in the Civilian newspaper, of the 9th April last, that there has lately been more than one instance in which certain highly placed officials have been allowed to draw full pay when absent from duty for more than six months; and whether the Comptroller and Auditor General has any means of checking a proceeding of this kind?

SIR J. GORST: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer the question. Six months' continuous sick leave may be given, at the discretion of heads of Departments and without distinction, to clerks of the Second Division and to officers of higher standing under Order in Council, and the rule applies to all Departments. The Treasury have expressed the opinion that this allowance is a very liberal one, and ought to include ordinary leave. I am not aware of the circumstances alleged in paragraph three. The Comptroller and Auditor General has, so far as I am aware, no means of checking the allowance of leave to Civil servants.

ALLEGED FISHERY DISTURBANCES IN THE SHETLANDS.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state on what authority, and on what information, H.M. gunboat Watchful has recently been despatched to Shetland to prevent the alleged threatened disturbances in the Island of Whalsay?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): Information was recently received by the Fishery Board that disturbances in relation to fishery matters were apprehended in the Island of Whalsay, and the gunboat Watchful, being the nearest available steamer, was despatched to the locality, but finding that her presence there was not required returned after a few days.

CORK POOR LAW ELECTION.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the fact that Mr. Edward Fitzgerald, a Poor Law Guardian of the Cork Union, was recently convicted on three charges of having forged and tendered proxy voting papers in his own favour when a candidate in a recent Poor Law election, any action will be taken by the Local Government Board to test the legality of the election of Mr. Fitzgerald and a number of other Guardians in the Cork Union alleged to have been returned at the late election by means of forged proxy votes?

*MR. JACKSON: Adjourned summonses in other instances are still pending against the newly-returned Guardian mentioned. The case has already engaged the attention of the Local Government Board, who, upon the completion of the legal proceedings, will come to a determination in the matter.

POST OFFICE TELEGRAPH FINANCE.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what were the gross receipts and expenditure respectively of the Post Office telegraphs during the year ended 31st March, 1892; what was the amount expended during the same year on account of the annual charge for the securities created for the purpose of the Telegraph Acts, 1868 to 1870, and any Acts amending the same; and when will the Returns required by Act 24 & 25 Vic., c. 47, s. 33, and Act 39 Vic., c. 5, s. 4, for year ended 31st March last, be laid upon the Table?

*MR. J. FERGUSSON: The first Act referred to by the hon. Member does not relate in any way to telegraphs, but to Ramsgate Harbour. The Returns required by Act 39 Vict., c. 5, s. 4, are those which give the information asked for in the first and second paragraphs. They cannot be prepared for the year ended 31st March last until the accounts of that year have been closed; this will not be possible until November next, nor does the Act require them to be laid before the 30th November.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Can the right hon. Gentleman give the figures?

*MR. J. FERGUSSON: No; it is not possible to do so yet.

LORD GUILLAMORE'S ESTATE.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state at how many years' purchase of the Government valuation a tenant, named Daniel M'Coy, of Cooltown, County Limerick, has purchased his farm from Lord Guillamore under the Ashbourne Act; whether he is aware that M'Coy made, through Mr. Nicholas H. Darcy, a previous offer to purchase the same farm, which the Land Commissioners refused to sanction; what terms did M'Coy offer; and why did the Commissioners withhold their sanction?

*MR. JACKSON: The Irish Land Commissioners report that no such person as Daniel M'Coy appears to have purchased a farm on the estate mentioned in the question. Mrs. Margaret M'Coy, the Commissioners report, purchased under the section of the Act of 1891 as an evicted tenant. The purchase money was £1,250, being 18½ years' purchase on the tenement valuation, and 15½ years of the previous rent. The Commissioners are not aware that Daniel M'Coy or Mrs. M'Coy made any previous offer to purchase through Mr. Darcy; but in 1888 they received an application from Mr. Darcy to purchase on his own account, and this was refused by the Commissioners because it did not appear that he was the bona fide tenant of the holding and did not appear to have stock of his own to work the farm, and because in the preceding year two farms held by him had been sold under execution.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Does the right hon. Gentleman know how many years' purchase Mr. Darcy offered?

*MR. JACKSON: I have no information as to that.

POST OFFICE SUNDAY DUTY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether eight hours per month Sunday duty is deducted from the pay of the hall porters in the General Post Office, Dublin, while all other officers are paid full time at time and a quarter rate; and, if so, why; whether he has yet considered the case of these officers; and if he is yet prepared to state the result?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is not a correct statement of the case to say that the two hours of duty done on Sunday by the hall porters at the General Post Office, Dublin, constitute a deduction from their pay or an addition to their duty, for that amount of Sunday attendance formed part of the terms upon which they entered the Service upon weekly wages; nor is it correct to say that all other officers are paid at a higher rate for Sunday work. There are large numbers of Post Office servants in all parts of the Kingdom similarly employed for a short time on Sunday. I told the hon. Member in February that I would consider the matter, and returns of the Sunday work thus done are being furnished, but I cannot state at present whether there is any intention of altering the rate of pay given, which is, as I have said, in accordance with the conditions upon which the men took service.

THE FLINTSHIRE CORONER.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the repeated complaints made against the Coroner for Flintshire with regard to the delay in holding inquests in his district, for instance, in the case of Joseph Edwards, Primrose Hill, Connah's Quay, who was drowned at Saltney on Wednesday 13th April, while no inquest was held until Saturday 16th April, and in the case of Henry Lynch, who was found dead in bed at Wepre, Connah's Quay, on 18th March, no inquest was held at all, though the body remained unburied for four days, and in both cases timely notice had been given to the Coroner?

MR. STUART WORTLEY (who replied) said: We learn from the Coroner that in the case of Edwards, who was drowned on the 13th April, no intimation of the death reached him until the next day. The Coroner's officer was unable to get his warrant issued to summon a jury until the day following, which was Good Friday, a day on which the inquest could not take place. The inquest was held on the Saturday morning, which, under the circumstances, was the earliest possible day. As to the case of Henry Lynch, who was found dead on 18th March, the Coroner informs us that on the day following he received a police report which stated the cause of death to be unknown, and that he immediately telegraphed for further inquiries to be made, and for the result to be reported to him by telegraph. Upon receiving a telegram in reply the same day that the deceased was supposed to have died from heart disease, and that there were no suspicious circumstances, he thereupon issued his certificate that no inquest was necessary. The Secretary of State is informed by the Coroner that he has not heard of any complaints being made against him except those contained in the hon. Member's question.

FOOD IN IRISH MODEL SCHOOLS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the dietary for pupil teachers in the Irish Model Schools is prescribed by the National Board of Education; and, if so, whether any pains are taken to insure that the food supplied is either sufficient in quantity or of a prescribed quality?

*MR. JACKSON: I understand from the Commissioners of National Education that the dietary for the pupil teachers is prescribed by the Board, and that it is part of the duty of the Inspectors in charge of the Model Schools to see that the dietary is sufficient both in quantity and of the quality prescribed.

IRISH GRAND JURIES.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the proceedings at the recent Quarter Sessions at Londonderry, when a Grand Jury, summoned from every part of the county, was empannelled, and told by the Judge there was no business to go before them; whether the same thing occurred in the following week at Dungannon, County Tyrone; and if he will endeavour to devise some means, either legislative or otherwise, by which jurors may be freed from attendance when there is no business to go before the Court?

MR. MADDEN: I am quite sensible of the inconvenience suffered by jurors in the discharge of a public duty, and if any practical suggestion is offered by which that inconvenience may be lessened I shall be very glad to consider it. At the Quarter Sessions mentioned, it was impossible for the Sheriff to ascertain that the services of the jurors would not be required. The Grand Jury of Londonderry were not selected from every part of the county, but from the city and liberties of Londonderry and the surrounding barony.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is it not the case that at Quarter Sessions there is a day fixed for Crown business, and called "Crown" day, and is it not possible for the Clerk of the Peace, when there are no criminal cases coming on, to telegraph to jurors to prevent them coming in? Every opportunity offers for doing this, as Crown business does not come on until one o'clock.

MR. MADDEN: The matter referred to by the hon. Member has no bearing on the question of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, which has reference to Grand Juries who must attend to find bills, and bills may be sent up at the last moment. Of course it is impossible for the Sheriff to know if they will be required or not. The course suggested by the hon. Member has never hitherto been adopted.

MR. MAC NEILL: I meant the Grand Juries at Quarter Sessions, and I understand that bills are never framed on the morning of the proceedings, and the Clerk of the Peace would have the opportunity to send a telegram.

TREASURE TROVE AT DOLGELLY.

MR. RANDELL (Glamorgan, Gower): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether certain correspondence took place between Sir A. K. Stephenson, the Solicitor to the Treasury, and the junior Member for Merthyr, July 1890, respecting a chalice, paten discovered at Dolgelly, and disclaimed as treasure trove by the Crown.

and whether Sir A. K. Stephenson was informed by the junior Member for Merthyr that the person entitled to the possession of the articles, pending inquiry, was the Coroner for the county, Mr. W. R. Davies, who would doubtless have been able to obtain possession of them for the Treasury; whether any steps were taken for the possession of such articles until after their sale lately in London for several hundred pounds; whether Mr. Boare, of the Strand, who purchased them at a sale at Christy's, has been served with a notice by the Solicitor to the Treasury, that such articles are claimed on behalf of the Crown; and, in the event of the Crown proceeding to enforce its rights, whether he will pay to the purchaser the amount which he paid for such articles, he having purchased them in market overt?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In answer to the hon. Member's question I have to say that some correspondence did pass between Sir A. Stephenson and the junior Member for Merthyr, respecting a chalice and paten stated to have been discovered at Dolgelly under circumstances which the Advisers of the Crown believe would entitle the Crown to claim the articles as treasure trove. Since that time the Treasury has been unable either to ascertain in whose custody the articles have been, or to obtain sufficient information to justify proceedings for their recovery, and it was only after the sale referred to had taken place that they received any information which would enable them to trace the articles. Instructions have been given for the immediate commencement of proceedings to obtain possession of them. The position of Mr. Boare, and the manner in which he will be dealt with, will depend upon the facts elicited in the course of these proceedings.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware that at the sale there was a bid for the Government within a few pounds of the amount at which the articles were purchased?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I certainly have not the information the right hon. Gentleman seems to have at his disposal.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil) : May I ask whether the fact that the purchaser, having paid for the articles in market overt, is not an answer to the claim of the Crown ?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It must not be assumed that the sale was in market overt.

CONVICTS IN MOUNTJOY PRISON.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether convicts Cooney, tinker, Mc Donagh, tinker, and Philip Cullen, returned convict—who was flogged in Spike Island—have at their own request been given permanent changes of work in Mountjoy Prison ; and whether there is any difference in this respect between their treatment and that of convict O'Leary ; and, if so, why ?

*MR. JACKSON : The hon. Member has been misinformed. The Report received from the Prisons Board shows that none of the convicts referred to in the question were given permanent change of work at their own request.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR : Were they granted change not permanent, but for any time ?

*MR. JACKSON : The point of the hon. Member's question is whether any change of work was made at their own request, and I understand that no change has been made at their own request.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR : The right hon. Gentleman has not stated if there was any difference in the treatment of O'Leary ?

*MR. JACKSON : My answer is that none of the convicts mentioned had any change made in their work at their own request. As a matter of fact the change may have been made as a punishment.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork, N.E.) : Is it not a fact that there have been several complaints of the treatment of political prisoners under the present Governor of Mountjoy Prison, and will the right hon. Gentleman consider the desirability of ordering an independent outside inquiry to ascertain if there is any foundation for these complaints ?

*MR. JACKSON : I do not think there is any such necessity. I had an opportunity, and personally inspected this prison, and came to the conclusion that I had never seen a prison better ordered.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN : Of course, the prison officials, knowing of the right hon. Gentleman's intended visit, had everything in "apple-pie order."

*MR. JACKSON : The hon. Member has made a very bad shot. I purposely went to the prison without announcing my intention of doing so, and nobody knew I was going there. When I arrived the Governor was not there, and no one knew me.

MR. MAC NEILL : How did the right hon. Gentleman get in if he was not known ?

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR : Did the right hon. Gentleman have an interview with O'Leary and take his account of his treatment ?

*MR. JACKSON : I must have notice of any further questions.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN : If the right hon. Gentleman has not had the accounts of prisoners I do not know how he can judge of their treatment.

POLITICAL PRISONERS ON THE GOLD COAST.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies how many prisoners are now detained under the authority of Ordinances of the Gold Coast Colony ; how many are there so detained against whom charges were made and not substantiated, and how many others against whom charges were made and dismissed ; how many were released and subsequently imprisoned without any formal charge being made against them, and how many have been brought from the interior and detained in prison ; has the ordinary process of law been set aside in cases of persons charged with offences at the Gold Coast ; and, if so, why ; and has the Governor of the Gold Coast recently visited Elmina ; and, if so, has he inquired into the cases of prisoners detained under exceptional legislative measures, and with what results ?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth) : There are 13 political prisoners detained, of whom six are from the Gold Coast Protectorate and seven from Sierra Leone. Only one prisoner is detained in custody, against whom the Government failed to establish a charge of murder. There are none against whom charges were made and dismissed. One was released and subsequently re-arrested, having broken the conditions of release. All except one were brought from the interior districts of the Protectorate. In ordinary circumstances the usual process of law is observed; but the persons referred to are detained under special Ordinances for political offences. I am not aware whether the Governor has recently visited Elmina. He has standing instructions to report every six months whether any of these prisoners can be released. A Report is now due and may shortly be expected.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: Did not the right hon. Gentleman state, or was it not stated on his behalf, about twelve months ago, that the Governor was about to visit Elmina, and would inquire and report to the Colonial Office upon these matters? Has that inquiry taken place, and has a Report been made?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I have stated that instructions have been given for a Report every six months.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: But this was twelve months ago.

BARON H. DE WORMS: A Report is now due.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can accelerate that Report.

THE SALE OF CIDER.

GENERAL SIR F. FITZWYGRAM (Hants, S.) (for Mr. BYRON REED, Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any Customs or Excise Duties are collected under any circumstances on cider; whether any cider on which no such duties have been paid may be sold by retail without an Excise licence; whether he has any information showing the strength of the ciders imported into and manufactured in this country; and whether beer of the same strength as such ciders is on the same footing as regards the payment of duty and the conditions of sale by retail?

SIR J. GORST: There are no Customs or Excise Duties on cider as such; but if on importation it is found to contain or to be fortified with spirit, duty is charged. Cider cannot be sold without an Excise licence. I have no information as to the strength of ciders imported and manufactured, but such information is being collected. Beer is not on the same footing as cider as regards the payment of duty. The conditions of sale by retail are practically the same for both.

AGRICULTURAL BANKS IN INDIA.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to a paper read by Sir William Wedderburn, at the Society of Arts, last Wednesday, on Agricultural Banks in India; whether he is aware that the Government of India sanctioned an experiment in that direction ten years ago, but that was checked by the reply of the India Office; whether he is aware that 2,000 similar agricultural banks exist in Germany, doing an annual business of £150,000,000 a year, to the immense advantage of the peasantry; and whether, considering that the Indian peasantry are deeply in debt to the money lenders, and are paying an average of at least 24 per cent. per annum of interest for their advances, the Secretary of State for India will give facilities to try this most important experiment in India?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The Secretary of State has seen a copy of Sir W. Wedderburn's paper, but has not read any report of the discussion to which it gave rise. A Return which was moved for by the hon. Member in 1887 contains the proposals made by the Government in India in 1884 for the experimental establishment of an agricultural bank in the Poona district, and the reasons for which the then Secretary of State was unable to accept these proposals. A reference to the Return of 1887 will show the hon. Member that the Secretary of State is not ignorant of the fact that these banks exist in Germany and other parts of the world. Lord Kimberley's Despatch of 1884, negating the scheme then submitted, invited further proposals, which, however, have not yet been received. Like his predecessors, the present Secretary of State is most anxious to promote any practicable scheme for mitigating the evils caused by the indebtedness of the landed classes in India. And I should add that a Report on the subject is now being prepared under the orders of the Governor of Madras by an Indian officer who has studied on the spot the system of rural banks obtaining in Germany and Italy.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH LOUISBURG.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been drawn to the grave public inconvenience caused by the absence of telegraphic communication with Louisburg, County Mayo, which is 13 miles from the nearest telegraph station, and which has a population of 1,888 persons within the Electoral Division; is he aware that a large number of steam trawlers from England and Scotland are at present making this bay their headquarters, and that the Congested Districts Board have under consideration plans for starting an important fishing industry in the immediate neighbourhood, the success of which would be greatly promoted by telegraphic communication with the English markets; whether electric communication is about to be established with the lighthouse on the adjoining Island of Clare, and is not Louisburg the nearest point of land from which such a connection could be formed; and whether, under these circumstances, the memorial of the inhabitants of Louisburg, praying for the extension of a telegraphic service to that town, will be reconsidered?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: A memorial was presented in November, 1890. It was ascertained that the cost of establishing telegraphic communication would be £337; and that the guarantee, on the terms then in force, would have to be fixed at £109 a year. The revenue was estimated at only £10. It is plain that the Post Office could not undertake the service at so great a loss, and the extension was, therefore, offered under guarantee in the usual way. Since then the terms of guarantees have been considerably modified, and this one could now be fixed at £62 instead of £109. Under the Act of last Session, 54 & 55 Vic., c. 46, the Local Authorities are empowered to undertake the guarantee. The question of an extension of electrical communication to the lighthouse on the Island of Clare is one for the Royal Commission which Her Majesty's Government propose to appoint.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: In this particular instance, who are the Local Authorities?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Board of Guardians.

THE MOMBASA RAILWAY.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is the fact that the British East African Company have been unable to communicate with Uganda, or to receive any information with reference to the condition of the country in that district since December last; and whether he is able to state what is the present position of the officers engaged in the survey of the Mombasa Railway, and at what distance they are supposed to be situated, by the last accounts from Mombasa and the Lake respectively?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The difficulties of communication between the British East Africa Company and their officers in Uganda are due to the great expense involved in sending caravans to and fro between Uganda and the coast. The last expedition to Uganda was sent in August last. No communication has been received from Uganda since last October. On the 5th March last Captain Macdonald wrote from Mackado that the survey party had reached Kikuyu, and had found a practicable route for the railway for 350 miles. Kikuyu is about 150 miles from the Lake. There had been a slight delay at Mackado due to difficulties in obtaining supplies and transport.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I understand from the hon. Gentleman that no news has come from Uganda at all since October last?

Mr. Curzon

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: No news has been received through the English sphere of influence. The news which has reached us has come through the German sphere of influence. As far as I have been able to trace it, it comes from a trader who resides at the south end of the Lake. It appears that in February last he wrote stating that two gentlemen named Ash and De Winton, missionaries to the west side of the Lake, had been killed. A month later another communication was received from him, stating that they were both quite well. The same gentleman had also written to the effect that Mwanga had been driven out of the country, and was on the west side of the Lake, collecting a force for an attack on Uganda. But in the last letter, written in March last, the gentleman stated that Mwanga was now in the German sphere of influence at the south side of the Lake, and not at the west, as previously reported by him.

LAND CASES IN CAVAN.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Sub-Commissioners who sat to hear land cases in Cavan last summer adjourned, leaving some twenty cases which had been listed unheard, saying they would return in three weeks, but have not sat there since; whether he is aware that some cases in the district which were entered four years ago have not yet been heard; and whether the proper steps will be taken to have these cases disposed of?

*MR. JACKSON: I should be much obliged if the hon. Member will postpone this question in order to enable us to make inquiries with regard to it.

LORD WANTAGE'S COMMITTEE AND ARMY DRAFTS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if his attention has been called to a reply given by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught before the Committee on the Terms and Conditions of Service in the Army (Q. 9410), in which His Royal Highness stated that the draft sent out in October, 1889, to the 1st Battalion of the Rifle Brigade was the youngest draft he had ever seen, and that he had written home to say that he feared one-half of them would die, a result which His Royal Highness heard later had actually occurred; and whether any Regulations are in contemplation to prevent the waste of young life in future?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE): Yes, Sir, my attention has been called to the statement made by His Royal Highness as regards the alleged mortality in the 1st Battalion of the Rifle Brigade, and I have caused careful inquiry to be made. I find that the information given to His Royal Highness was altogether inaccurate. The strength of the draft was 154, not 250 as stated. Only ten deaths out of a total of 35 deaths which occurred in the whole battalion in 15 months can be assigned to the men composing the draft, and seven out of the ten died of enteric fever. The ages of the men composing the draft ranged from 20 to 26 years. The year 1890 appears to have been an abnormally unhealthy one in the district in which this battalion was stationed. I may add that the Report of the Inspector General in India upon this draft was as follows:—"The draft that came were a good-looking and able body of young men"; and he further stated that the battalion was full, and in a first-rate condition of efficiency.

THE LOUGH ERNE DRAINAGE SCHEME.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will produce in full, for the inspection of Members interested, Mr. Price's statements of 19th and 31st August, 1891, parts of which are printed in the Report of the Board of Works in Ireland on the Lough Erne Drainage Scheme, at pages 10 and 11; whether it is the fact that, though no reference is made to the matter in the Report, no part of Mr. Price's scheme relating to navigation has been carried out; and whether, if any improvement in navigation has been effected, will he explain what that improvement is?

SIR J. GORST: I do not think that it would serve any useful purpose to lay upon the Table the unpublished parts of Mr. Price's Reports, which do not affect the object of the Return.

I am informed that all works as contemplated in Mr. Price's scheme have been carried out; but I am not able to say how far the navigation has been improved.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury in how many cases the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland have raised the rents of tenants whose lands are alleged to have been improved by the Lough Erne Drainage; what is the total amount of increase; what is the acreage of the land alleged to have been improved, and on which the rents have been increased; and how many of such tenants held under judicial tenancies?

SIR J. GORST: An inquiry is being made by the Board of Works, and when it is completed I will give the hon. Member the information he requires.

MR. KNOX: Can the right hon. Gentleman give me information as to the cases in which compensation has been given by the Board of Works?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir; but if the hon. Gentleman will give me notice I will endeavour to get him the information.

WELSH MEDICAL INSPECTORS.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether, having regard to the fact that there are in Wales many districts subject to medical inspection in which the Welsh language is almost universally spoken, he will, in filling up future vacancies among the Inspectors attached to the Medical Department of the Local Government Board, give the preference to one candidate at least—if in other respects competent—who can speak and understand that language?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): It was stated by the President of the Local Government Board, in reply to a question a short time since, that in the event of his having to fill up a vacancy in the office of Medical Inspector, where the duties of the officer would chiefly be in Wales, and he had before him two candidates who, apart from the question of the Welsh language, were in all respects equally well qualified for the position, he would be willing to give the preference to the candidate with a knowledge of the Welsh language. I cannot give any further undertaking on behalf of the President of the Local Government Board.

Sir J. Gorst

THE NEW FOREST RIFLE RANGE.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that, at the recent local inquiry as to the safety and suitability of the proposed rifle range in the New Forest, evidence of there being other sites safe and suitable within the Southern Military District was excluded, he will fully consider such other sites as have been found before proceeding further with the proposed site in the New Forest?

MR. E. STANHOPE: Certainly, Sir, I will consider the alternative sites that have been suggested.

LIBRARIES FOR VILLAGES.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, with regard to the purchase of Messrs. Cassell's National Library, or some such library, by the school managers in villages where no library exists, and the great importance of having some lending library in such rural districts, whether he will take steps to make it obligatory on school managers to avail themselves of the permission he has given them to purchase such libraries in such cases?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (SIR W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): No, Sir, it would be entirely outside the province of the Department to take any such steps as those suggested by the hon. Member, although we may do our best to popularise a movement such as that he refers to in his question.

ADULTERATED BUTTER.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) (for Mr. McLAREN, Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board how many samples of butter were analysed under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act last year, and how many were found to be adulterated; and how many such samples were detected by means of the Margarine Act?

MR. LONG: The Reports for 1891, which have been furnished to the Local Government Board, under the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, show that 3,558 samples of butter were analysed by the public analysts, and that 551 were adulterated. It does not appear from the Reports how many of these samples were detected by means of the Margarine Act; but generally the Board has no information as to this.

FREE RE-DIRECTION OF LETTERS.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether there is any reason why effect should not forthwith be given to Section 3 of the Post Office Act, 5th August, 1891, for the free re-direction of letters?

No reply was given to this question at the time it was submitted, but later on

*SIR J. FERGUSSON rose and said: I must apologise for not answering the question of the hon. Member for West Waterford. I did not reply to it at the time because it was not in my name. I may state that the question is still under consideration.

HIGHER EDUCATION IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will give the names of the burgh schools, endowed schools, and private schools referred to in the Memorandum on the proposed grant for higher education in Scotland, and mention the counties in which they are situated? I would also ask him whether he will supply copies of the Memorandum to those hon. Members who have not been furnished with them?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: In reply to the last part of the question I may say that I was unaware that the copies of the Memorandum had not been supplied to all the hon. Members who required them. In reply to the first part of the question I think the hon. Member will find the information he requires in that with which I have already provided him.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): It would be impossible to properly discuss the Bill to-night unless we had this information. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman how many burgh schools, endowed schools, and private schools are referred to in the Memorandum?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: The information I have supplied contains all that the hon. Gentleman requires.

MR. BUCHANAN: I hope we shall be furnished with this information before we discuss the question.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON (later): I am now in a position to answer the question. I will not read the names of the burgh schools, but will give the endowed schools and private schools. The endowed schools are: In Aberdeen, the Robert Gordon College; in Ayr, Beith Spiers School; in Clackmannan, the Dollar Institution; in Edinburgh, Daniel Stewart's College, George Watson's Boys, George Watson's Ladies, Ladies' College, Heriot's Hospital School, and Fettes College; in Fife, Anstruther Waid Academy, Cupar Bell Baxter School, and St. Andrew's Madras College; in Inverness, Inverness Royal Academy; in Lanark, Allan Glen's School, Hutcheson's Girls' Grammar School, and Hutcheson's Boys' Grammar School; in Nairn, Rose's Academical Institution; in Perth, Crieff Morrison's Academy, Perth Sharp's Educational Institution; in Ross, Tain Royal Academy; in Wigton, Newton Stewart Ewart Institution, High School for Boys and Girls. The private schools are: Edinburgh Academy, Edinburgh Institution, Merchiston Castle School, Edinburgh, St. George's High School for Girls, Dundee High School, Glasgow Academy, Kelvinside Academy, Glasgow Park Girls' School, and Polmont Blair Lodge School.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

COLONEL WARING (Down N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture what is the present state of Glasgow, and the West of Scotland generally, with regard to the foot-and-mouth disease; and when he hopes to be able to remove the restrictions on the movement of cattle which the existence of that disease has rendered necessary?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I am happy to say that I am not aware of the existence of any case of foot-and-mouth disease in Glasgow or the West of Scotland. The restrictions imposed by the Board of Agriculture in respect of those districts have been withdrawn since April 13th last.

MR. HERBERT KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has received any information with reference to the reports in this morning's papers as to an outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease near Sittingbourne?

MR. CHAPLIN: There has been no new outbreak in Kent, but there has been an extension of the existing outbreak in the district of Sittingbourne, where it appears to be difficult to suppress it.

THE MURDER AT KILLINKERE.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether Buchanan, who was suspected of a brutal murder near Killinkere, County Cavan, and who, at the Ulster Winter Assizes, was released on condition that he would at once leave the country is still at home pursuing his ordinary avocation; and, if so, what reason is there for allowing the undertaking given at Omagh to be disregarded?

MR. MADDEN: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the information he requires.

EXTRA REMUNERATION IN GOVERNMENT OFFICES.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury why an allowance has been made to the subordinate officials in certain Offices in consideration of the increase of hours, while it has been refused to the same class in other Offices?

SIR J. GORST: As a Committee is now considering the remuneration paid to messengers and other subordinate employees, it has been thought desirable to defer the decision upon some particular applications for additional pay for increased attendance, pending the report of the Committee.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Why were servants in different Offices not treated in the same manner?

SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Member will specify, either publicly or privately, the particular Offices he refers to, I will endeavour to give him some information on the subject.

THE TOBACCO CONCESSION IN PERSIA.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can assure the House that no pressure is being put on the Persian Government by Her Majesty's Representative to give an indemnity to the Company owning the tobacco concession for the abrogation of the contract; that no suggestion is being made to the Persian Government to pay more to the Company than the amount of money actually expended by it, exclusive of the £300,000 paid to Major Talbot for the concession; and that all Papers in regard to this matter will be laid upon the Table of the House before the Foreign Office Estimate is submitted to it?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): My hon. Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs has promised to lay the Papers on the Table at an early day. I do not think it would be convenient, or even possible, to discuss the question until the Papers are before the House, and surely no public advantage would arise from the attempt.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Will the right hon. Gentleman state when the Papers will be laid before the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot state the exact date at which the Papers will be laid before the House; that must depend upon the completion of the case; and no Papers can be produced until the case has reached a complete stage. When such a stage is reached, no time will be lost in making the House fully aware of all the facts.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I give notice that unless that stage is reached before the Foreign Office Vote comes on, I will discuss the question upon that Vote.

SCHOOLS FOR PUBLIC MEETINGS.

MR. H. GARDNER : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, considering the uncertainty of the date of the introduction of the Rating of Schools Bill, and the near approach of the General Election, he will introduce at once a Bill giving effect to the unanimous Resolution of the House with regard to the right of public meetings in elementary schools?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The uncertainty of the date which the hon. Gentleman thinks hangs over the introduction of the Rating of Schools Bill arises, as he knows, from the condition of Public Business in this House, and the same uncertainty, therefore, hangs over any other Bill which the Government might prepare on the same subject. I see no reason to depart from the arrangement come to on both sides of the House that the subject of employing schools for other than educational purposes should be associated with the particular measure to which the hon. Member alludes.

MR. H. GARDNER : I think the subject is one of great interest to both sides of the House, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, considering that the Rating of Schools Bill is a very contentious measure, and the proposal that public meetings should be held in schools is unanimously accepted by both sides of the House, the First Reading of a Bill as to the use of schools for meetings is not likely to be assented to without further discussion?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : It is possible to bring in a Bill under the new Rules so that there may be only two speeches upon it; but the difficulty will arise at the later stages, and although the House may be unanimous as to an object to be arrived at, there may be great difference of opinion as to the method of attaining it.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON LABOUR.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he can explain on what grounds, although the Assistant Commissioners to the Royal Commission on Labour have been directed to inquire into the wages and earnings of agricultural labourers in the counties of Suffolk, Norfolk, and Cambridgeshire; Bedfordshire, Buckinghamshire, Oxfordshire, and Berkshire; Dorsetshire, Somersetshire, and Wiltshire, and also in Wales, the hop-growing counties of Kent, Sussex, Herefordshire, Hampshire, Worcester, Surrey, and Shropshire have been specially excluded from this list; and whether, in view of the importance of the hop-growing industry to the wage-earning agricultural community, he will use his influence to have two or three hop-growing counties included in the Reference?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I believe it is a mistake to infer from the arrangements that have been made that the hop-growing districts are excluded from the scope of the inquiries, or that any injustice is likely to be done to them.

WITNESSES BEFORE PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES.

SIR C. RUSSELL (Hackney, S.) : I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the interest expressed on both sides of the House on the subject of the protection of witnesses before Parliamentary Committees, the Government would bring in a Bill to deal with the matter, or give facilities for the discussion of the two Bills which stand on the Paper for Second Reading?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I must thank the hon. and learned Gentleman for having given me notice of this question, and say, that while I quite recognise the importance of the point raised by the Bill of the hon. Member for Chester, and by that which the hon. and learned Gentleman has himself introduced, I do not think it would be possible to divert Government business in order to give time for the discussion of these measures, important though they may be. It seems to me that the House might adequately deal with the matter if it would take the Second Reading of the Bill without opposition or prolonged discussion on the understanding that both, when read a second time, should be referred to a Select Committee. The question is one of great importance, because it cannot be disguised that while both Bills in terms preserve the jurisdiction of the House, the practical result of passing them would be to destroy that jurisdiction. Further it is proposed to give to witnesses before Royal Commissions, and before Parliamentary Committees, a kind of protection which has never yet been thought necessary for witnesses before the ordinary Criminal and Civil Courts. If the House will accept the suggestion I throw out it may be a solution of the difficulty agreeable to all and would not involve any loss of Parliamentary time.

SIR C. RUSSELL: I personally will accept the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, and would remind him that, as regards witnesses examined before Courts of Justice, the Judges possess powers to protect them by processes for contempt of Court.

FIGHTING AT TONIATABA.

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN: I wish to ask whether the Government have any information confirmatory of that which appeared in a telegram in the second edition of the Times with reference to occurrences at Toniataba?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Toniataba is a town near the banks of the Gambia, which was held by a sub-chief of the Marander, Fodey Cabba, against whom, it will be remembered, it was recently necessary to send an expedition. On the 15th March a detachment of West Indian troops under Major Madden was sent to Toniataba to summon the chief to surrender. This he refused to do, and Major Madden attempted to force his way into the town, but failed to do so. It accordingly became necessary to reduce the place; and, as soon as the Tambai expedition at Sierra Leone was over, arrangements were made for effecting this object. The following telegram has been received from the Administrator—

"Bathurst, 1st May.—Toniataba stubbornly defended, but completely destroyed 28th April. Officer commanding sending full particulars."

The Admiralty have also received a telegram from the Senior Naval Officer at Bathurst, also dated 1st May.

"Toniataba destroyed. Naval brigade under Wilkin landed. Casualties: No. 149, 266 William Godley, seaman, severely wounded; doing well."

Mr. A. J. Balfour

IRISH EDUCATION BILL.

SIR J. McKENNA (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the strongly expressed wishes of the Irish Catholic Hierarchy, Her Majesty's Government will consent to withdraw from the above Bill the clauses for the enforcement of the compulsory attendance of children at the free schools, in order that sufficient time may elapse after the passing of the Bill to test whether the natural desire of Irish parents for the education of their children is sufficient to induce a full attendance without compulsion?

*MR. JACKSON: I do not know whether the hon. Member has read the Education Bill, but I think he will find that the provisions of the Bill will afford a sufficient time to test whether the natural desire of Irish parents for the education of their children is sufficient to induce full attendance without compulsion. The compulsory provisions of the Bill are not to come into operation until the 1st January, 1893, and by Clause 3 of the Bill the Local Authority may appoint officers to assist the School Attendance Committee. I presume the number of officers which the School Attendance Committee would deem it necessary to appoint would be largely determined by the fact of the attendance being satisfactory or unsatisfactory. I think, therefore, the hon. Member will see that his desire has been already anticipated.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: Can the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury inform the House when the Irish Education Bill is likely to come on for discussion?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Second Reading will be taken as soon as possible; but it cannot come on until the Small Holdings Bill is out of Committee.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Can the Government lay before the House Returns relating to education in Ireland?

*MR. JACKSON: I am told that the Returns which the hon. Member asks for would involve a great deal of labour on teachers and on the Department, and would take a long time to prepare. If, notwithstanding that, the hon. Member still desires to move for them, there will be no objection to his doing so.

MR. SEXTON: We should like to have the full Returns; but, in the meantime, could the Government not supply us with the essence of the information?

*MR. JACKSON: It would have to be derived from the school teachers, and it would take a long time to prepare.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR: I desire to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether as the people of Ireland take the deepest interest in the Irish Education Bill, and no interest at all in the Local Government Bill, and having regard to the nearness of the General Election, he will so arrange business that he can bring on the Education Bill before the Local Government Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can assure Representatives from Ireland that if they will show practical interest in the passing of the Bill by abstaining from the discussion of it at very great length, there will be no difficulty in bringing the discussion to a close before the General Election.

MR. JOSEPH BOLTON (Stirling): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Scotch Private Bill Procedure Bill will be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It cannot be taken until after the Second Reading of the Irish Local Government Bill.

MR. SEXTON: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has considered the question I raised some time ago as to the separation of the contentious from the non-contentious portions of the Education Bill, in order to facilitate its progress through the House?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If I understand it, the hon. Member's proposal is that we should separate that part of the Bill dealing with compulsion from the part relating to relief from school fees. I think my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Jackson) has more than once explained this Session, as I explained last Session, that he could not see how public interests would be served by losing an opportunity to pass the whole of this measure, which I believe a great number of those interested in Irish education desire to see become law.

MR. KNOX: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what will be the Order for to-morrow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That, of course, depends upon the progress made to-night. If, as I hope, we pass the Committee stage of the Scotch Bill, I think the first Bill for to-morrow is the Criminal Evidence Bill.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Thomas Osborne, esquire, for the County of Essex (Mid or Chelmsford Division.)

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

Electric and Cable Railways (Metropolis)—That they do propose that the Joint Committee on Electric and Cable Railways (Metropolis), do meet in Committee Room A, on Monday the 9th May, at Twelve o'clock.

Lords' Message considered.

Ordered, That the Select Committee appointed by this House to join with a Committee of the Lords on Electric and Cable Railways (Metropolis), do meet the Lords Committee in Room A, at Twelve of the clock, on Monday the 9th day of this instant May, as proposed.

Message to the Lords to acquaint them herewith.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EDUCATION AND LOCAL TAXATION RELIEF (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 208.) COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

*MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.) moved, in page 1, line 16, after the word "paid," to insert the words "in the financial year ending the 31st day of March next after the passing of this Act." The effect of this Amendment is to make this measure only operative for one year, and the means by which I propose to carry out that object are taken, as far as I can do so, from the words of the Probate Duty Act, 1888. That Act, I think, forms a precedent for the action which I desire the Government to take in regard to the present Bill. When this system of allocation was first initiated, there was at the outset a temporary allocation, and the following year a more satisfactory allocation. Therefore, I venture to think we have a precedent for the course I now propose. It is known to every Scotch Member that the mode of distribution which has been proposed is not thoroughly satisfactory to any of the parties concerned. Indeed, we cannot think that the Government have themselves satisfactorily thought out their own proposals. Of this it would have been impossible to have a better illustration than the incident which has occurred in regard to the Returns asked for by the hon. Member for Lanark (Mr. Crawford). The Memorandum, on which it is expected the Education Office Minute will have to be based, has only been issued within the last few days; and it refers in somewhat vague terms to a number of schools to which this grant is to be applied. The hon. Member for Lanark moved for a Return of these schools on Friday; and as he could not obtain a Return in time for this discussion, he gave notice of a question to the Lord Advocate, who tells us that he has given my hon. Friend the information. But that information has not been given to the House—he (the Lord Advocate) has not even got a copy of the information himself. I think that single illustration is sufficient to show how crude and unfinished are the proposals of the Government. Another reason why the allocation should be a temporary one is that we are in the last Session of a dying Parliament. An objection is that it will destroy the financial arrangements of the various Local Bodies in Scotland. As a matter of fact, it is perfectly obvious that the present system of allocating by Bill leads to annual changes, and thus has no permanence. Then I take a fundamental objection to the whole financial system of these grants. I think we ought to return to the system which was in vogue before 1888. As hon. Members are aware, there were before that date large grants to Local Bodies. They were invariably given by annual grants on the Estimates, and that is the right method by which Imperial aid should be given. It by no means follows that aid given from year to year is not as permanent in character as the grants which have been given under this new system since 1888. I think that if the Government could see their way to accept this Amendment they would greatly facilitate the progress of their Bill. The Lord Advocate is well aware of the strong objections taken by different sections in this House to almost every part of the measure. These, I believe, would be considerably modified by the acceptance of the Amendment, which I beg to move.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 16, after the word "paid," to insert the words, "in the financial year ending the thirty-first day of March next after the passing of this Act."—(Mr Buchanan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): While anxious to yield to Amendments which will remove the opposition to this Bill, I must say that the proposal is one to which the Government cannot accede. The Government came to the conclusion that it was desirable to embody in the Bill the allocation of this money, and, looking to the subject-matter, that considerable elasticity should be observed as regards some portion of the money. We demur altogether to the suggestion that the Memorandum which has been mentioned, or the information I have just read out, has anything to do with the question. The question is whether this Bill is to be confined to the present financial year, or whether it ought to be extended beyond it, as we desire it should. The Memorandum has not been out merely for two or three days, as my hon. Friend (Mr. Buchanan) suggests; it has been before the country since the 15th of April, when it was published in the newspapers. We think it is desirable that the Local Bodies who have the administration of the various parts of this grant should know where they are from time to time. We think, also, that any temporary scheme for the allocation of this money would paralyse the efforts of the localities to do what they can with the fund, and, further, there would annually be strife and turmoil in these various localities which would go far, in my opinion, to upset any usefulness this scheme would otherwise possess. I believe the first persons to deprecate such an alteration as the hon. Member proposes would be the localities and the bodies themselves, because we all know there has already been a considerable amount of contention as to the proper allocation of this money. I think, however, that public opinion has now settled pretty fairly in the main in favour of the Government proposals. This Amendment would foster such continuous local agitation and uncertainty that the proposals of the Bill would be practically rendered ineffectual.

Mr. Buchanan

MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I hope I may say, without any discourtesy to the Government, that this Bill—perhaps excusably on account of the novelty of the task—is a measure hasty and unconsidered in character. It is a crude and confused proposal. While we are prepared to vote the money according to the scheme for the present year, we are not, however, prepared to establish a plan which can only be reversed with the sanction of the House of Lords, and by the passage of a Bill through all its stages. This proposal to devote a considerable sum of money for secondary education is new to Scotland, and, therefore, it is of the utmost importance that we should proceed on the right lines. In this connection I think I may say that by the representations which have been made the Government must have been considerably shaken in their conclusion that the lines of this Bill are the right ones.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I am very much opposed to this allocation becoming permanent. In the first place, Scotland never asked for this system which the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government have adopted. I believe the large majority of the people of Scotland are opposed to this mode of giving the grant. What we want to do is to tax the land, and by this and other means to give Local Bodies the product, so that they may further lighten the burden of the ratepayers. We have already three different systems, and the next Government will have again to consider the question when it has to inquire as to the relations between the Imperial Exchequer and the Public Bodies. As to the £30,000 for the Universities, we have had no evidence submitted that the Universities want the money. I think the information ought to have been laid before us, and that a similar course ought to have been observed in regard to the grant for secondary education and the other sections. We have not any adequate information before us as to the wishes of the Scotch people on these matters, and under such circumstances the only wise course is to prevent the bodies who are going to get this money thinking this scheme is, first, one that the Government have well considered; secondly, that it is one Parliament has well considered; and, thirdly, that it is one which has every chance of being permanent. The Local Bodies who get the money will only be able to use it for lessening the rates. Therefore, if you give this money to the Local Bodies for one year or for five years, they will not be able to do any special good with it unless the character of the Bill is changed and the Local Bodies are given a free hand. It would save time, and the Government would be able to get this Bill through easily if they were not to insist upon carrying out the policy of preventing the House of Commons from settling these questions without the intervention of the House of Lords. I think the course the Government are taking in connection with this and other Bills of the same character—of preventing the House of Commons having the power of determining these questions of finance and giving to another House the power they should not have, is contrary to the Constitution, and we should take every opportunity we can of protesting against it.

(5.3.) MR. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I must confess I think the course the Government seem inclined to take in this matter is one which is open to very grave suspicion. Here is a large sum of money which is taken from the Imperial Exchequer, and the question is: How can it be best disposed of? or: What is the opinion of Scotland with regard to it? For my own part, I do not know what the opinion of Scotland is on the subject, and I do not believe it has yet been ascertained. We who sit on this side of the House are not at the present time plenipotentiary representatives of Scotch opinion on this question. We are within measurable distance of a Dissolution, and this is one of the things which might be properly reserved for an expression of public opinion on that occasion. For that reason alone I shall be prepared to vote for my hon. Friend's Amendment, which proposes to limit this Bill to one year. Now, what is the answer of the Lord Advocate? Really, so far as I can make it out, it amounts to this—that the Local Bodies will be embarrassed unless they can rely on this scheme being a perpetual one, and that it would be inconvenient for the Local Bodies to have the administration of this fund unless they can rely upon it being permanent. I should like to hear if that is not so.

SIR C. J. PEARSON: That is one point.

MR. ROBERTSON: Well, I cannot reconcile that with the language of the Bill. It appears to me that the Bill contains a distinct warning to the Local Authorities that the Government do not regard this as a permanent scheme, but as a provisional scheme. If the Committee turn to Clause 2—the Distribution Clause—of this Bill they will find these words of warning: "Be it enacted that until Parliament otherwise determines" this distribution is to take place. It is not to be a perpetual distribution, but is only to take place "until Parliament otherwise determines." Why were these words inserted? I cannot suppose for a moment that the Government in using them intended nothing but a piece of impertinent superfluity. Now, Sir, when we come to these words I shall propose an Amendment which, if this Amendment is lost, may meet the views of some of my hon. Friends, although I am afraid it will meet with some resistance in the Conservative instincts of hon. Members opposite. The Amendment I shall move is to leave out the word "Parliament," and insert the words "House of Commons as hereinafter provided." The scheme then would be this: that the Bill will have effect until the House of Commons, as hereinafter provided, shall otherwise determine. Then this House would have the sole means of deciding what is to become of this money. Otherwise, the Bill is open to the great objection that if any change is decided upon by the Scotch people at the next Election, we should have to go to the House of Lords and ask them to amend the Act. I do not think that is a position we should be put in, and I will join in any Amendment which will have the effect of avoiding that result.

(5.12.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): Under this Bill a sum of money is voted by the House of Commons, and I think it is a constitutional question that all moneys so voted for Imperial purposes should be under the control of the House of Commons alone. This money will form a charge upon the Imperial Revenue of the country, and the question is: Who is entitled to see to the application of moneys which are levied by Imperial taxation? Now, there is no better known constitutional rule than that the House of Commons, which raises the money annually, is the Body entitled to review and consider annually how that money is to be applied. As the Bill now stands, the House of Commons will not have the sole control of determining how the money is annually to be applied, but the House of Lords will have it in their power to practically control the mode in which that shall be done.

Then it is said that these Local Bodies wish to have some idea as to the permanency of the grant. Well, nothing was more common up to the time that the present Government came into Office than that all grants to Local Bodies were annually laid before Parliament, and annually reviewed. There are the educational grants. Has there ever been any doubt as to their permanency? Have not schools been built, teachers engaged, and heavy expenditure of various sorts incurred on the faith of these grants; and who would suppose that they would be withdrawn while serving a useful purpose? And if in the future any grants should not be serving a useful purpose, why should they not be withdrawn? What is the purpose for which this money is to be applied according to the Government Bill? It is to relieve local taxes, and not to enable the Local Bodies to execute new works or undertake any additional responsibility. There is, therefore, no force in the argument of the Lord Advocate that the Local Bodies will be inconvenienced if they are not led to suppose the grant is of a permanent character. Then it is said, if this grant is an annual one, it will be a subject of strife. Have we any strife upon the educational grants, or the Police grants, or any other grants? Nothing of the kind. We have only that legitimate criticism and discussion which ought to take place in this House with regard to all expenditure; and it is only right, if the money has to be raised annually by taxation, that this House should have the opportunity of discussing whether the money is being usefully applied or whether it might be more usefully applied in another direction. Then we have the important fact to consider that Scotch opinion is not yet clearly pronounced as to the method of appropriating this money. I believe the Government like to act on precedents. Well, all the precedents relating to Scotch grants are that the grants are of one year only. That being so, I contend that there is no good reason why this House should not have the power of fully discussing annually the grant proposed in this Bill.

(5.19.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I am bound to say that the proposal to vote this grant in a permanent way is unprecedented. Nothing of the kind exists in this House or elsewhere. The right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate has not, I am bound to say, answered my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan). That is to say, he has not given any valid reason, as far as I can see, for making this a permanent grant. He says if it were not permanent an agitation would be carried on. Why, Mr. Courtney, should an agitation be carried on if this proposal is entirely satisfactory, as he says it is, to the people of Scotland? If this is the best proposal, and is satisfactory to the people of Scotland, it will be impossible to carry on an agitation with reference to it. But if, as I believe to be the case, the mode of applying the money does not meet with the wishes of the Scottish people, then I think it will be well that some agitation should be stirred up, and the matter re-considered. In my opinion, this Bill as it now stands will require a great deal more discussion than would be necessary if it were to be only experimental and for not more than a year. If we are to discuss the great principle as to whether this money is to be applied to relieve the poor rate, the council rate, the city rate, for education or other purposes, upon a permanent basis, the conditions of which are unalterable unless we go to the House of Lords, then it will be necessary to continue this discussion at much greater length. I would press upon the right hon. Gentleman that the amount of information he has placed at the disposal of the House is entirely insufficient to justify this grant being made on a permanent basis, and that it would be in the interest of all concerned to have further information as to the feeling of the people of Scotland before asking the House to agree to a permanent settlement of the question.

*(5.23.) MR. JOHN B. BALFOUR (Clackmannan, &c.): I submit that the Government have not shown sufficient reasons to justify them in departing from the ordinary course in respect to this grant. It is deviating from the constitutional principle to withdraw from the House of Commons the sole power of reviewing yearly any grant, and making the appropriation of money raised by taxation dependent upon the will of another House. Therefore I apprehend that, unless it can be shown that there is either some very strong convenience or some reason of principle, the Government should adhere to the ordinary course. Now, I listened very attentively to what my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate said, and I think it resolved itself into this: that it would be very inconvenient for the recipient bodies not to know what they had to rely on. Well, I quite appreciate that consideration as far as it goes; but how far does it go? It does not go very far, as all experience shows that a grant made once, particularly a grant for educational purposes, is not withdrawn; if the money is well applied there can be no fear of a meddlesome interference on the part of Parliament with an appropriation of money approved by experience and by the will of the people. But the matter does not rest there, because not only have the Government not shown any sufficient reason for their departure from constitutional usage, but there are some considerations in this case which make in the other direction. This is certainly a proposal of a somewhat novel character, and in regard to which the country has not had very much time for making up its mind and communicating with its Representatives. It has been said—and said truly—that there is a good deal of difference of opinion as to how this money should be appropriated. I feel sure that every one of us who represent Scotch constituencies has been receiving a number of communications of an opposite character to the proposals of the Lord Advocate, and even amongst ourselves we find that a good deal of difference exists as to the best way of using this money. This should be one of the matters on which, at the General Election, an opportunity should be afforded to the constituencies of expressing their views; and, after all, in the application of public money, the deliberate judgment of the constituencies ought to be the guide of this House. We on this side of the House do certainly attach great importance to this matter, not only as involving a constitutional principle, but as also involving considerations special to this Bill of a character which, I trust, the Government, on mature consideration, will yield to, and limit the operation of the Bill to one year only.

(5.27.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): This is an equivalent grant Bill—an equivalent of what has been granted to England and Wales, and will be granted to Ireland, for assisted education. I must say I should have preferred that the terms of the Bill had been, with regard to the Educational Department, so much per head instead of a particular sum as mentioned in one clause of the Bill. But I feel sure that, assuming the amount is increased in England, we in Scotland shall be able to get a further sum in the future, either from the Estimates or elsewhere, and I believe the Government are following a reasonable precedent, such as was adopted in the case of the measure introducing assisted education for England, in their action with respect to this Bill.

(5.29.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): The Lord Advocate in his remarks quoted the opinions of Local Bodies in Scotland, and he said that several of these Local Bodies, on this question at all events, might be taken to represent the opinion of the people. Sir, I can only speak of Aberdeen, but there the Local Bodies speak with a divided voice. The Town Council by a large majority passed a resolution protesting against any portion of this money being appropriated to the relief of the rates. Another body—the Trades Council—passed a unanimous resolution that, for whatever purpose this money is devoted, it should not go towards the relief of the rates. Now, Sir, upon a question of this kind the Trades Council is a better indication of the opinion of Aberdeen than the opinion of the Town Council. Why should the Government object to the Amendment of my hon. Friend? All the Government can do by this Bill, which they could not do if this Amendment is carried, is next year to interpose the veto of the House of Lords between the people of Scotland and the realisation of their wishes. We are going to have a General Election, and I suppose the hopes of the Government to support from the people of Scotland are of a somewhat shady character. They expect that when they come back they will be no longer supported by a majority, and so they wish now to give to the House of Lords a veto in this matter. Now, what does this Bill do? It is a Bill that allocates money obtained from the Imperial taxes. These taxes come mainly out of the pockets of workmen. But how do the Government propose to distribute the money? Almost entirely into the pockets of the owners of property. Do the Government think they are protecting these interests by interposing the veto of the House of Lords? Do they imagine they are giving any security beyond the security which exists now? The right hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken if he thinks that we shall rest satisfied with the distribution of the money. As a representative of the working people I say that all those who represent the interests of working men in this House will come back after the General Election determined that this disgraceful system of raising money which is not required for Imperial purposes, but is merely taken out of the pockets of the poor, and put into the pockets of the rich, shall be stopped. There is a special reason, arising out of the Memorandum which has been circulated with reference to this Bill, why any attempt to stereotype this Bill is as foolish as can be. One of the proposals of the Government is to give £60,000 to secondary education, and I know many people in Scotland entertain great doubt as to the propriety of employing public money for the purposes of secondary education. The reason of the doubt is that secondary education really means the education of the children of middle class people who can well afford to pay for it. Of all the schemes that have ever been suggested to determine the allocation of money, that made by the Government in this Memorandum for secondary education is absolutely the worst. It is one which I venture to say will not meet the view of the friends of education in Scotland.

It is not calculated to promote education, and, so far as I can understand, it only makes it a little cheaper for rich people to get their children educated than it is at the present moment. It is not a scheme to improve education, and least of all is it a scheme to enable the poorer classes to get the benefits of education. Is it right or reasonable that the Government should attempt to stereotype a crude and ill-considered scheme of this kind which has not received the support of any educational authority, and against which protests are rising on all sides? This question of secondary education is complex and difficult, and requires a great deal of consideration and inquiry. I never was unprepared to give a reasonable amount of public money to secondary education on proper conditions being applied, but to my mind the essential condition is, that you should provide an educational ladder by which the children of poor men may be able to get that secondary education, equally with the rich. If you open up secondary education to all, I do not even grudge the cheapening of education to the higher classes. I do not wish to regard the subject in a niggardly spirit, but in the whole of this scheme the Government do nothing for the poorer classes, and for education, as distinct from fees, it does nothing. Surely, under these circumstances, the Government could consent to limit the application of the Bill for one year, and even if the Government were to go further and suspend the allocation of this money until a better scheme is devised—until they have consulted with the Town Councils, the County Councils, and the School Boards, and endeavoured to formulate a proper scheme—I would support them. Under present circumstances, however, I think there is a very strong reason why we should endeavour to prevent the allocation of this money in the way proposed by the Government.

(5.35.) MR. BARCLAY (Forfarshire): So far as I have been able to discover, the opinion of Scotland is generally in favour of the proposals of the Government in this Bill, and I think I may refer in support of that statement to the Resolutions passed by public bodies all more or less in favour of those proposals. I must disagree with my hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter) as to the value of various opinions. I prefer the opinions and resolutions of Public Authorities to those of self-elected bodies. I think, further, that it is very necessary that this Grant should be of a permanent character. We know very well that if an Act of Parliament is permanent, the House of Lords or the House of Commons can deal with any of its provisions that do not prove to work satisfactorily, and I think my hon. Friend is unnecessarily alarmed about the House of Lords. I do not think there is any reason to anticipate that the House of Lords would take the unprecedented step of interfering in a matter of this kind, and if they did, it would provide a very strong argument in favour of the abolition or reform of that House, which so many Gentlemen on this side profess to desire. One reason why this measure should be of a permanent character is that Local Bodies, knowing that the grant is to be reasonably permanent, will thereby be enabled to make better use of the money. Another reason is, that the Town Councils, and, I hope, also the County Councils, will be able to apply this money not only to objects that are absolutely necessary, but also to securing the comfort of the people. I should be prepared to support any proposals in this Bill to extend the scope of Town Councils and County Councils in dealing with the money at their disposal. I think Town Councils might do something in the way of making provision for the comfort of the people under the provisions of the Public Health Act, and I should be very glad if the Government could confer corresponding powers on the County Councils. I have recently had the advantage of being amongst my constituents, and though I have received many representations in support of this measure, I have not heard a single objection to it. I cannot understand my hon. Friend (Mr. Hunter) when he says that this money will not be disposed of for the benefit of the working people in the burghs, because, in point of fact, in all the burghs the working people pay almost all the rates. In the burgh represented by the hon. Gentleman I believe the occupiers of the houses pay four-fifths of the rates, and in the Burgh Police Bill, which is now being urged through this House, the proposal is made that all the rates, except the Sewer Rate, shall be levied upon the occupiers. Consequently the whole of the money that is given by this Bill to relieve the rates will go to relieve the occupiers, and the poor men will relatively get their fair share of relief. Of course, if it is nothing that the working people should have two-pence or threepence taken off these rates, it follows from that argument that it is nothing to the working classes if they have a penny, or two-pence, or threepence put on. I hope the Committee will support the Government, and I hope the Government will give the County Councils greater scope in dealing with the money. I think the proposals with regard to secondary education will require a good deal of discussion and some explanation, but we can wait for that till we come to that part of the Bill.

(5.40.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): It is rather amusing to notice how the Government rely on buttresses on this side of the House rather than upon their own immediate followers who sit opposite. The only words we have heard in opposition to the Amendment of the Member for West Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) have proceeded from the Member for Falkirk (Mr. Sinclair), and the Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay). But it seems to me that all the speeches that have been delivered, have been beyond and beside the question raised by this Amendment. The hon. Member discusses this Amendment as if it referred to the Equivalent Grant, whereas it refers to the Fee Grant, which is a different thing, and is applied in a different manner. I think one great argument in favour of limiting this Fee Grant to a single year is, that in Scotland we are not treated with regard to this grant in the same way as the people in England are treated. In English schools 10s. per. head is paid for the children, whilst in Scotland we are paid in proportion to the attendance in England, and as the attendance in the English schools rises and falls, so we in Scotland get a larger or a smaller sum. That is all very well. It may be to the advantage of Scotland to have this money dependent upon the attendance in England, but whether it be to our advantage or not the distribution rests upon a bad principle, and what I do claim is, that we in Scotland should have our fee grant money distributed in proportion to the attendance of our Scotch children.

Mr. Barclay

THE CHAIRMAN (MR. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): Order, order! The subject to which the right hon. Gentleman is referring will be raised by a subsequent Amendment.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I am not discussing that Amendment at all. My object is to point out that this vicious principle which I believe is inherent in this clause is a reason for limiting this clause to a single year, and it is on that ground rather than any ground which has been put forward that I should support the Amendment of the Member for Edinburgh.

(5.42.) MR. CALDWELL: It must not be forgotten that in allocating the money dealt with in this Bill we are dealing with Scotland's own money, and the allocation of it ought to be determined by Scotch opinion. What is the competent authority to represent Scotch interests in the disposal of this money? The money is to be raised by Imperial taxation, and it is a sound principle that the party who raises the money is entitled to determine how it shall be expended. The House of Commons raises this money, and I venture to say that the Scotch Members should determine the way in which it should be spent. The Town Councils and the County Councils dispose of the money which is raised by local rates, and this House does not interfere with their spending the money they raise in any way they think proper. But when we are dealing with Imperial taxation it is this House which is responsible for the raising of the money, and it is the opinion of the Scotch Members which should prevail as to how it should be expended. Then the question arises as to who are the Members who represent Scotch opinion in this House. Is it the twelve Conservative Members out of the 72 Members for Scotland? They do not represent Scotch opinion; they are the minority in Scotland. We are not dealing with Imperial money; we are dealing with money which, rightly or wrongly, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has allocated to Scotland, and it is a most outrageous thing that, because the Conservatives this year happen to be the Government, these twelve Members should have the power of fixing how this money is to be determined in after years, when perhaps they will not be the Government of the country. It may be said that there are 17 Liberal Unionist Members, but even then they do not halve the representation, and it must be remembered that these Liberal Unionist Members occupy Liberal seats, constituencies which are Liberal on all other questions save the question of the Union. I contend that it is an outrageous thing that the minority should want to fix, by this Bill, not only the way in which this money should be allocated this year, but the way in which it shall be distributed in future years when they will be out of office.

(5.47.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): According to this Bill this money is to be devoted to certain purposes which will not be under the control or the annual review of Parliament or of the Local Authorities. The money which we are now asked to vote will not come under our notice annually, and unlike the revenue, which is administered by the County Councils and the School Boards, it will be under the control of no Local Authority. The money for education will be handed over to the Scotch Education Department to do as it pleases with, and I think we ought to have some very strong reasons for a new departure of this kind. We are going to be made the subjects of a new experiment in Scotland, and under these circumstances I think we may well be surprised at the weakness of the case which is being made out for this Bill. We have urged our objections to the financial arrangement under which this measure has become necessary, but if it were not proposed to make it permanent, if the allocation had been for one year, or had the Local Authorities been allowed a free hand in the spending of the money, there would have been much less objection to the Bill on this side of the House. I think we ought to have some answer to the arguments we have brought forward, and I trust we shall have a strong Division in support of the Amendment which, in all the circumstances, I think very well justified.

(5.49.) DR. CLARK: I am not sure whether this is the best place to take a Division, because the proposal covers only the money devoted by Parliament to educational purposes. My hon. Friend has a similar Amendment on Section 2, and perhaps it would be better to take the Division then. We must get the money voted by Parliament, whether it is at the rate of 10s. per head, or some other equivalent; but on Section 2 we come upon the question of whether we shall stereotype the spending of the balance.

Question put.

(5.15.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 133; Noes 192.—(Div. List, No. 95.)

(6.5.) DR. CLARK: I beg to move to leave out "£265,000." This sum is calculated upon the vicious principle, introduced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, of paying back in proportion to what he considers the sums paid into the Imperial Exchequer. I do not consider that the proportions of 11 per cent. for Scotland and 9 for Ireland are a fair equivalent, even if the Committee, which has not been appointed, had sat and the facts on which it were based were true. I propose to insert the words in the English Act, under which a grant is made of 10s. per child in average attendance. We have about 540,000 children in average attendance, and the grant at 10s. per head would amount to about £270,000, £4,000 or £5,000 more than we get under the Bill. The question affects Ireland more vitally than Scotland, as it will probably make a difference in her case of £80,000 or £100,000. The average attendance in Scotland bears a higher proportion to the possible attendance than is the case in England, and in the Bill you are trying to limit the more progressive country so far as education is concerned. It is only fair that the rule of 10s. per head per child should apply to Scotland and Ireland. The basis you have taken for England is the average attendance, and you should take the same for Scotland and for Ireland; it is surely a more rational method of working.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 19, to leave out the words "two hundred and sixty-five thousand pounds," and insert the words "ten shillings a year for each child of the number of children over three and under fifteen years of age in average attendance at any public elementary school in Scotland, not being an evening school."—(Dr. Clark.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

(6.10.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman who has moved this Amendment will see that the balance of advantage is on the whole in favour of the scheme proposed by the Government. If you were carrying out in the three parts of the United Kingdom—England, Scotland, and Ireland—precisely the same object, under precisely similar circumstances, then no doubt all you would have to do is to pay the money to each country and carry out that object in precisely the same way, whether the proportion be, or be not, in precisely the relative magnitude of 9, 11, and 80 per cent. That I grant. But that is not the case in the matter of education. You are not carrying out precisely the same object under precisely the same conditions, because the conditions of Irish education are very different from the conditions of English education; and the conditions of Scotch education are very different from those of both England and Ireland. If you were to give 10s. in Ireland for every child in average attendance, you would extinguish every school fee in Ireland and would have a very great deal of money to devote to purposes wholly alien to free education. If, on the other hand, you were to give Scotland 10s. per child in average attendance, you would not give the Scotch parents the same advantage as you are giving the English parents.

DR. CLARK: I think you will find it more. On what facts do you urge that?

Mr. Munro Ferguson

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The amount given for the fee in Scotland is 12s. per head and not 10s., so that while 10s. would be far too much to free education in Ireland, it would not be enough to give free education in Scotland. Therefore, you cannot, and ought not, to attempt to deal with the three countries, when their conditions are essentially different, as if they were the same, and the only other principle on which you can allocate the money is that which my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has adopted, to pay each country in proportion to the amount of the contribution of that country to the general Exchequer of the Empire. That is the plan adopted in the Bill. If it should turn out in future that the average attendance in England were either to grow or to fall to any material extent, it might be necessary to modify the proportion of Scotland to make it bear a proper proportion to the English Grant, but you cannot treat Scotland and Ireland in this matter as if they were on the same basis as England; they are not on the same basis. The hon. Gentleman has pointed out quite truly that the difference in Scotland would be about £5,000 more than she gets under the Bill. With regard to the £265,000 dealt with in this Bill, I agree with him that it is very nearly the sum that would be given if the share of Scotland were founded upon the basis of 10s. per child in average attendance, therefore Scotland's concern in this matter is theoretical rather than practical. The case of Ireland, I am afraid to press more at length now, but in Ireland it could not be adopted, for the mere fact that 10s. is paid in England, is not sufficient reason for giving Ireland 10s. to free education, which would more than meet the cost. I hope I have satisfied the hon. Gentleman that the provision of the Bill is really based on sound principles, and that if his Amendment were accepted Scotland would not gain in the long run.

(6.18.) DR. CLARK: The present condition in Scotland is that you are paying from five to 14 years of age, and in England from three to 15; my Amendment adopts the words of the English Act, and you would, therefore, begin to pay at three and not five, and pay till 15 and not 14. There are about 540,000 children between three and 15, and that would give us about £270,000, or about £5,000 more than under the Bill. The great bulk of the Scotch Members are content to have the same age limits as in England, but the Government are opposed to it. If you made 15 the limit, you would put more money into our pockets. Why should we not have the £5,000, because if you were to apply the same principle to Ireland she would get £80,000 or £100,000 more.

(6.20.) MR. CALDWELL: I am very glad the First Lord of the Treasury has intervened, as the Amendment raises a very important question of policy. He says the principle of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to give Scotland in this matter a grant for education in proportion to her contribution to the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not a grant for education.

MR. CALDWELL: We are an integral country, and as England has got 10s. per child in average attendance, I claim for Scotland as an integral part of the United Kingdom the same grant from the Imperial purse.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It has a great deal more.

MR. CALDWELL: Nothing of the kind. I am dealing with the question of principle. Is Scotland to be treated in this matter as part of the United Kingdom or as a separate Kingdom? If we are a portion of the United Kingdom, and the English parent gets 10s. per child, then the Scotch parent ought to get 10s. per child. Out of the Probate Duty Scotland got 11 per cent. which is no more than our right, and if the Scotch people chose to appropriate more of that money to free education than you have done in England, they did it out of their own money, and not out of the Imperial Grant, and, therefore, when you are going to give out of the Imperial purse—a new transaction altogether—a grant of 10s. to England, you are bound, if you treat Scotland as an integral part of the United Kingdom, to give her 10s. also. In the matter of 10s., whether the total be more or less than £265,000, my contention is that we should be treated the same as England. This is a grant out of the Imperial purse to encourage education. Is it not obvious that the grant for education is always according to the work done? If our school attendance in Scotland is large the grant is large, and if it be small the grant is less, but is always for the actual amount of work done. The Government does not pay Scotland according to the education she gives her children; but goes the round-about way of finding out the total sum England gets, and then Scotland, whether she educates few or many, is to get eleven-eighths of it. This is an attempt to stereotype the Separatist policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; he wishes to treat Scotland in the future not as an integral part of the United Kingdom, but as a separate nationality, under which plan England is to get 80 per cent., Scotland 11 per cent., and Ireland 9 per cent. I can see a reason why the Probate Duty should be so distributed, but this is a grant out of the Imperial purse, and a different thing altogether. Under your principle the richer country will get the most, and the poorer, which most needs help, will get least.

(6.25.) MR. HUNTER: I am glad my hon. Friend moved the Amendment that we may have an opportunity of protesting against the proportion assigned to Scotland. I do not say I quite agree with the proposal of my hon. Friend, but I shall vote against the proportion in the Bill. Four years ago we had the principle for the first time; the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that money be allocated to the three countries, so that England got 80 per cent., Scotland eleven per cent., and Ireland nine per cent., and that was supposed to be the proportion of the contributions of the three countries to the Imperial Exchequer. Since that time the Government has put in a Minute the grounds on which the Treasury arrived at that conclusion. The Government recognise that the House ought not to be asked to accept without inquiry the figures which they put before us, and they have for two years undertaken to appoint a Committee to inquire into the financial relations of the three countries, to ascertain if those proportions are correct. That Committee sat for a very short time and this document was the consequence. Last year the Committee was not appointed, and now, in May, and though the Motion is on the Paper, it is clear the Government do not intend to take any practical steps to secure the appointment of the Committee, and under these circumstances I enter my respectful protest against being supposed to be bound by the provision in the Bill. We are entitled to this Committee and this inquiry, and if the proportions be found correct we shall, of course, accept them. I should like to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if there is any real intention on the part of the Government to appoint the Committee in the present Session?

(6.28.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer is extremely anxious to appoint the Committee, and I need not recapitulate the circumstances which have unfortunately caused the delay. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, it arose from the desire on the part of Welsh Members that the Committee should also take into consideration the financial relations between Wales and England, as well as those between England, Scotland, and Ireland. Had that difficulty not arisen the Committee would have been long ago appointed, but I have reason to hope that that difficulty may be got over, and that my right hon. Friend may be able to get the Committee appointed.

(6.30.) DR. CLARK: The right hon. Gentleman has not given us any explanation, especially as to these words which are placed in brackets. Are we to understand that what practically will be done in future will be this, that a certain sum shall be placed on the Estimates for education in England, and that a certain sum shall be placed on the Estimates for education in Scotland, and every year these sums may vary? Of course it is clear that, from the growth of population in England, the number of children will very much increase in England. Now, if we are defeated on this question of giving us 10s. per head, we will only have eleven per cent. every year. The result will be that progress will be hampered and hindered in Scotland, because I am sorry to say that in this matter England is not so progressive as Scotland.

(6.31.) MR. HUNTER: I wish to understand the announcement which the right hon. Gentleman has made with regard to the Committee. I dare say we all know that the reason why the Committee was not appointed was because it could not be appointed without a Debate; and the Government have declined hitherto to afford time for a Debate to take place. Do I understand now that the Government intends to bring forward this Motion at a time when it can be discussed and the decision of the House taken upon it?

(6.32.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is the hope of the Government to be able to find some reasonable time for the discussion, so that the sense of the House may be taken on the Motion. Of course it would be in the power of the hon. Gentleman and his friends, if they were so disposed, to render the Motion inoperative and useless by prolonging the discussion after twelve o'clock. But I am anxious, as well as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to afford some brief amount of time for the purpose of discussing the Motion.

(6.33.) MR. BARCLAY: With reference to the explanation which has been given, I must say that the words of the clause are very obscure, and I should like to be assured that the Government propose to give the same percentage to Scotland as is provided in the proposals of 1884.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is so.

(6.34.) DR. CLARK: I am unable to withdraw my Amendment; in the first place, because I should not like to lose £4,000 or £5,000, and, secondly, because I am unable to modify the form of the Scotch Education Committee. I have, besides, another object in this Division, and that is that the sum should be paid for children over three and up to fifteen, instead of, as is proposed, for children over five and up to fourteen.

(6.35.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no limit with regard to Scotland such as the hon. Gentleman supposes. There are no limits in Scotland, either superior limit or inferior limit. There is no limit of age at all. Fifteen is not the limit; and therefore the condition of things in that respect is better even from his own point of view than that which he desires to set up.

(6.36.) DR. CLARK: The sum to be paid per head in England is for children from three to fifteen, whereas in Scotland it is only for children in attendance from five to fourteen—unless it was changed this year.

(6.35.) Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 178; Noes 132.—(Div. List, No. 96.)

(6.48.) DR. CAMERON: I beg to propose as an Amendment, in page 1, line 25, after the word "Parliament," to insert the words—

"Provided always, that no fee grant shall be paid to any School Board in respect of any school in which fees shall be exacted from scholars between five and fourteen years of age."

I think that amongst the great majority of the Scotch Members it will be admitted that the money given to Scotland is, in the first place, to be applied to the freeing of our system of education in our public schools. In Scotland there are some 3,100 public schools. There are 42 public schools in which fees are charged, and which obtain a free Government grant; besides there are some 15 schools which charge fees, and receive no grant. What I contend is that on the present occasion, when a large sum of money is going to be given to secondary education, the best use that can possibly be made of it is to apply the total, or a portion of it, in freeing these schools. Of the 42 fee-paying schools throughout Scotland, there are seven or eight existing in Glasgow; and the rest are to be found in the towns, which are well provided, as a general rule, with the endowments for secular education. These fee-paying schools in Glasgow are supported by the ratepayers at a cost of some couple of hundred thousand pounds, or a quarter of a million sterling. The sites on which these and are situated in the order to provide for the wants of the respective and now they are not carried the purposes for which they were built. They are carried on as genteel academies, and the parents living in the districts near them who cannot afford to pay fees for their children, are compelled to send these children often long distances to inferior schools in order to get that education, for which the ratepayers have provided these schools at their own doors. If this scheme were adopted we should have some seven or eight very excellent secondary schools at once thrown freely open to all and sundry. As it is at present, and under the provisions of this Bill as it stands, I cannot see what earthly good can be done to Glasgow by any paltry portion of this grant. I propose then that the fee-paying schools in Glasgow, and throughout the country generally, which are to be found chiefly in the towns which are well supplied with endowments for the purpose of secondary education, should be thrown open free, so that the people living in the neighbourhood, who are at present obliged to send their children to inferior schools at a distance, should be able to send their children to these schools. In Glasgow a very large proportion of the children attending these fee schools come from outside the city altogether. There are some 600 children in attendance in these fee paying schools, for whose accommodation the ratepayers have to pay more or less out of the rates. I think this Amendment will commend itself to the representatives of burghs in Scotland. I think I could show that under the existing scheme Glasgow will obtain really a very small portion of the money to which she is entitled as her share of this educational grant. Glasgow contains about one-sixth of the population of all Scotland, and she contributes consequently about one-sixth of the £60,000 proposed to be given for the purposes of secondary education. According to the scheme shadowed forth in the Memorandum laid before Members of the House by the Scotch Education Department, Glasgow will not get more than a very small fraction of the amount which she contributes in taxation to this £60,000. This grant will not practically do her any good. As a matter of fact Glasgow is thoroughly well supplied with endowments which are available for the purpose of secondary education. She has very rich endowments; so has Edinburgh and Dundee. Under these circumstances it is a very remarkable fact that the number of children between 13 and 16 years of age attending school in Glasgow, in all sorts of public schools, is only some 7,000. I believe the failure of a larger number of children to be in attendance at school is not due to the want of endowments, but is really due to the inability of the working classes, who form such a large proportion of the population of Glasgow, to take their children away from work at the age mentioned. The proportion of children above 14 years of age in all the schools of Glasgow is under 3,000. It appears to me that the best way of meeting the requirements of these large towns is to utilise the grant for the purpose for which it is best suited—namely, for the purpose of secondary education, devoting a portion—and I only ask for a fair portion—so far as it is necessary in the first place towards freeing these schools. That is not at all an unfair allocation. Of the balance, each of the other districts and other boroughs are entitled to have a share for the purposes of secondary education in the way best suited for their requirements.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 25, after the word "Parliament," to insert the words, "Provided always that no fee grant shall be paid to any School Board in respect of any school in which fees shall be exacted from scholars between five and 14 years of age."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

* (7.2.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities): This is not a subject which is being discussed for the first time in the House or in the Committee. It is one with which the House is familiar. The acceptance of the Amendment, however, would involve a proposition which I could hardly accept. If the hon. Member were to show, or to attempt to show, the Committee that there is any defect in the elementary education of Scotland, that would be one thing; but it is a totally different thing to say that the scheme of elementary education is not complete simply because certain elementary schools charge fees. Those are not the same things at all, and I venture to say that no hon. Member could point to any part of Scotland where the system of free elementary education is not completely operative. The contention was urged that the Local Bodies ought to have a say in this matter, and I think Glasgow was mentioned by one hon. Member as having had certain views at one time on this subject. But that is not the case now. An election of the School Board has taken place since, and the continuance of the fee-paying schools was confirmed, so far as one can judge, by a considerable majority of the ratepayers who decided that election. The outcome of this Amendment, if it were carried, would be to free certain of the schools of Glasgow which, while under the School Board, might still be regarded as higher-class schools. That is going beyond the proposition that it is desirable to free elementary education, and, so far as it goes beyond that proposition, it goes beyond the main scope of the Bill. That question could be more satisfactorily discussed on the Code than by way of Amendment to this Bill.

(7.5.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I think the right hon. Gentleman rather underrated the reasons which justified my hon. Friend in taking action in this matter. It has become a very serious matter, indeed, in consequence of the Bill of the Government. In the first place, that Bill is the final arrangement of what may be called the fee-paying side of Scotch education, and it is quite impossible to allow that final arrangement to pass without a protest against a system which many of us regard as in the highest degree unjust, and as in a high degree disadvantageous to the education of the community which is circumstanced as my hon. Friend described Glasgow as being. But there is another, and a new reason, and I think a very important reason indeed. The Memorandum on the proposed grant for higher education lays down the manner in which the £60,000 is to be distributed, and a large part of that sum, £14,000 or £15,000, is to be given to the higher departments of elementary schools—a new institution—and for every scholar in those higher departments £3 is to be paid. Just let hon. Members consider what the position will be of the great mass of the inhabitants of a city in which this system of these privileged fee-paying schools exists. At present it is bad enough that all the educational knowledge and the enthusiasm of the district should be concentrated on one or two or three schools to which the mass of the ratepayers have no admission whatever. These schools have been built out of the ratepayers' money; but this Bill will bring a very great additional grievance, because it is these privileged fee-paying schools which will have the higher departments, and which will enjoy, perhaps, the entirety of the new grant that is given to the town; and from those schools, which are to carry the children who are receiving elementary education on to the old Scotch higher education, of which we hear so much, the great mass of the people will be excluded by the fact that they are not free schools. Now, Sir, I would just ask hon. Members to consider how this question is dealt with in another great city. There is a city in England—Birmingham—where the whole question of education has been most carefully studied. In Birmingham there is already, I believe, one school that practically is a school of a higher department. I believe they call it the Seventh Standard School. They are going to make another school of this description; but the elementary schools which educate the children in order to enable them to take their place in these Standard Schools are all absolutely free to every citizen of Birmingham. We ask that the same shall be the case in Scotch communities, and that you shall not give another £15,000 to schools which will be filled not with the children of the great mass of the community, but only with the children of those parents who can afford to pay the fees. Not only will you keep the old grievance in these towns, but you will add to it, for this grant for secondary education, which Parliament intends, I believe, to be shared by the great mass of the Scotch people, will practically be expended almost entirely upon the children of a very small, and that the richer, part of the community.

(7.10.) MR. BARCLAY: I support this Amendment on the same grounds as the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I have no objection whatever to fee-paying schools. If certain parents desire to send their children to fee-paying schools, by all means let them do so; but I cannot agree that this money, which is to be used for the purposes of secondary education for those who are unable to provide it without such a subsidy, should be devoted to the education of the children of rich people. They have the option of sending their children to free schools entirely; but if they prefer to send them to fee-paying schools, by all means let them pay the full value which the School Board thinks it desirable to exact. The result of this grant will be to reduce the fees of the higher schools from £6 and £7 to £3, which is putting the money directly into the pockets of the rich people. I think this is a very strong point, worthy of the consideration of the Government, and I should like to hear their view of the subject.

(7.15.) MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): This Amendment will affect these so-called fee-paying schools; that is to say, public schools mainly teaching elementary education under the School Board, but which, under the present arrangement, are permitted to charge fees. Those schools exist mainly in the City of Glasgow, and there are comparatively very few which exist in two or three of the other towns in Scotland. I venture to submit to the Committee this proposition—that, while it is necessary and desirable in rural districts to encourage the establishment of secondary departments in the Board Schools, the encouragement of secondary education in elementary schools in the large cities is not a thing to be desired. Where you have a city like Glasgow, with a large number of secondary schools—and possibly you may have more in the future—an arrangement ought to be made to encourage the children to go to those schools, and not to seek for secondary education in the elementary schools. If the clause were passed as it stands, it would be a great encouragement to those fee-paying schools to go on to secondary education; and there would be children there who, not being able to get through a first-class secondary education, would remain at these half-and-half schools getting a half-and-half secondary education. This, in addition to the reasons already given, and to which I entirely subscribe, is why I support the Amendment.

*(7.15.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): There is a good deal to be said for the contention of the Glasgow Members; but, on the other hand, I ask my Friends from Glasgow to remember that other parts of Scotland are included in the Bill.

DR. CAMERON: I specifically stated I did not propose to take away the share due to each locality. The Amendment would not be unfair to any other district.

*MR. C. S. PARKER: That was not my objection. There are elsewhere in Scotland burgh schools which are counting on this grant as the only means of carrying them on as not very ambitious secondary schools, but schools not to be dropped into the rank of ordinary schools. If you were to put the Amendment in the Bill as it stands, the effect would be to preclude any grant being given to any of these burgh schools where the children under 14 years of age are charged any fee.

DR. CAMERON: There is a subsequent Amendment providing for the matter which my hon. Friend refers to.

(7.18.) MR. J. PARKER SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I think it would be a very great mistake, and we should be doing a very rash and very unwise thing, if we were, by any act of ours, to destroy these existing schools in Glasgow and in Govan, where they are doing exceedingly good work. The circumstances surrounding them will be changed very much by the scheme of this present Bill. They have grown up under the old circumstances, and I challenge altogether the statement that they are composed of the children of the rich. They are not the richer people. They are composed of the children of people of all classes who wish to carry on their education beyond the primary elements, and to go on into secondary education. It is, as every educationalist will tell you, of the greatest importance that these children should, from the first, have the wider curriculum opened to them. It is a misfortune to a school when children intending to go on with secondary work are not brought in till they are 13 or 14, because, while they are very well up in certain lines of work, in other lines they are very much behind the children who have been in the secondary school all the time, and they hold back the secondary school very much. This is not a new point. It has been before Glasgow and Govan—the two places most concerned—for a very long time. It was before them at the last Election, and has been repeatedly raised in the House. And yet, by very considerable majorities, the present state of things was maintained. Therefore, the injustice may seem a burning one when proclaimed from these Benches; but when you go to Glasgow and Govan you will not find the people there persuaded that it is so. I did not quite understand what the hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron) wanted to do with these schools. He said that as a result of his Amendment seven or eight excellent secondary schools would be thrown open free to all and sundry. That sounded as if he wanted to proclaim free secondary education. He spoke as if the result of the throwing open of these schools to all would be that any one would go to them, and yet that they would maintain their character as secondary schools, as if the character of a secondary school was just as much impressed upon the face of that school as the nature of its architecture. The fact of a school being a secondary school depends on the children going to it, and how long they are prepared to carry on their education there. It is not true that these schools are more expensive than other schools. I was down opening a school in Partick that is better in architecture and everything else than either the Hillhead School or the Hamilton Crescent School. The schools that exist are doing excellent work. The circumstances of these schools will be changed under the Memorandum, and it seems to me that it would be most imprudent if we were to open up this question now.

(7.25.) MR. CALDWELL: This matter lies very much in a nutshell. The Amendment has reference to the ordinary Board Schools in Scotland, and not to any secondary system that may be introduced under this Bill. What is the contention of the Amendment? It is this. School Boards in Scotland receive 12s. per child in average attendance in respect of the abolition of school fees; and what we contend is that School Boards should abolish school fees in every school for which they receive this grant of 12s. per child. It is attempted to have a roundabout method in the application of this money. We get it for each school; but instead of abolishing the school fees in a certain school the Department say—"You may abolish the school fees in some other school, and that will be held to be equivalent." That is what we object to. We say each school should stand on its own merits. It is pretended that the poorer schools benefit by the present arrangement, because in them the school fees are abolished. But observe, in England they only get 10s. per child in average attendance, while in Scotland they get 12s. for the same purpose. Education in the poorer schools does not cost more than 12s. In Glasgow the School Board want to have certain schools fee-paying for the purpose of keeping the children attending them socially distinct from the poorer classes of the community. What is the School Board of Glasgow endeavouring to do? They are endeavouring to make these fee-paying schools the schools in which secondary education is to be conducted. The result is that if you deplete the ordinary free schools of the higher subjects, and concentrate them in the fee-paying schools, you give the fee-paying schools an enormous status for the purposes of education. Everyone knows that in a school which has secondary education at the top the elementary education is better taught than in a school where no secondary education is taught. The hon. Member for Partick (Mr. Parker Smith) says some of these free schools are architecturally better; but when we talk about a school being better we refer to it as being educationally better. In Glasgow there are a great many educational endowments open to competition by scholars in all the poor schools. The effect is that these bursaries are carried off by the scholars in the fee-paying schools, who have better opportunities of competing for them than the scholars in the free schools. We say—"If you are going to have free schools you are not to pauperise these free schools." If we are to have free schools, then the children attending them should have equal advantages for education with the children who pay fees. We wish the children in State-aided schools to have equal advantages with children of other schools. It has been stated that this is not a new question, and that it was raised at the School Board Elections. That is quite true; but the question has not been settled, and never will be settled so long as the present state of things exists. It will crop up at the General Election, and will no doubt be an important factor in it. It will certainly always be cropping up until the existing grievances are remedied. All that we ask is, that in the schools which obtain money for the abolition of fees the school fees should be abolished. It is against the fee-paying system that we protest in this Bill, and we shall continue to protest until the grievance has been remedied.

(7.32.) MR. W. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk): I will detain the House for only a few minutes. I object to this Amendment because in my own constituency it would kill the only higher class school that we have. We have been told that the boys who attend the fee-paying schools are the children of wealthier people. That is not the case in my constituency, because there we have made special provision, and have reduced the fee to a very small amount, so that all might have access to the school. I do not know from my own knowledge the state of things which exist in Glasgow in regard to fee-paying schools, but I have been told by Glasgow people that such schools are there absolutely necessary. The question was emphatically before the electors in Glasgow at the last election, and the same may be said with regard to my own constituency. I will only further say that I hope nothing will be done to impair the usefulness of fee-paying schools.

(7.34.) MR. SINCLAIR: It seems to be assumed that in these so-called privileged fee-paying schools all the places are paid for, but that is not the case, because I know instances in which there are a number of free places. When children are found to be very quick and able to take advantage of secondary education, places are provided for them, and they are received into the higher schools. I do not say that it is done to a very large extent, but it is done to some extent, and under this Bill it would be done on a much larger scale. I believe that it would be a great loss to the community at large if the fee-paying schools were done away with, and I take it that the proposal embodied in this Bill is to improve their efficiency, and to enable a greater number of the children of poorer parents to benefit by them than is the case at the present time.

(7.37.) MR. HUNTER: Do I understand that it is the intention of the Government that the money for secondary education shall be given to schools in receipt of the Government grant?

MR. C. J. PEARSON: If they otherwise comply with the conditions.

(7.40.) MR. BARCLAY: I do not object to the fee-paying schools, but I do object to this money for secondary education being applied to such schools for the benefit of the children of wealthy parents. That they are wealthy is manifest, or they would send their children to the free schools.

*MR. C. J. PEARSON: I am not sure that I followed the hon. Member. If I did, I think he was talking of an Amendment that might have been made on the part of the scheme dealing with secondary education.

DR. CAMERON: We have been twitted again and again that this question was raised at the last School Board Election, and that we were in favour of freeing these schools; but things have entirely changed since then. If the system of freeing these fee-paying schools had been endorsed at the Election, the expense would have been met by increasing the rates; but here you have the opportunity of obtaining £60,000, to which Glasgow contributes £10,000, and the proposal I make will not create any hardship.

MR. BARCLAY: Do I understand that any part of this sum of £60,000 will be paid for secondary education in the fee-paying schools?

Mr. Caldwell

SIR C. J. PEARSON: No part of the £60,000 will be devoted to the relief of elementary schools, but in so far as such schools have higher departments they may be assisted out of that money.

MR. BARCLAY: What I object to is that any portion of the £60,000 should go for secondary education in the fee-paying schools, because they are only intended for the children of wealthy parents.

(7.45.) MR. CALDWELL: Is it not evident that if you take away higher education from fee-paying schools, you remove the only excuse there is for fee-paying schools? You make them then nothing but purely elementary schools. It is not in the interest of education that you keep on these fee-paying schools; you do it only for the purposes of class distinction.

(7.46.) DR. CLARK: You can solve this question without trouble by simply transferring these fee-paying schools from the elementary class to the secondary class, when you will get a lump sum—so much a head for the children.

(7.50.) Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 90; Noes 128.—(Div. List, No. 97.)

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to move—

“In page 2, line 5, to leave out the words ‘until Parliament otherwise determines,’ and insert the words, ‘in the financial year ending the 31st day of March next after the passing of this Act.’”

The object of the Amendment is that the allocation of the new money should be limited to a single year. In asking this I think we have strong claims, for I think it must have been evident from the discussion which has already taken place that there is—and particularly with regard to the educational part of the scheme—great diversity of views, great uncertainty as to what the scheme really is, and ignorance as to what the operation of the scheme is to be. Therefore I think it would be a great misfortune to pass, in a sub-section of a Bill of this sort, an Act for secondary education in Scotland. It surely is only reasonable that at any rate this part of the proposals of the Government should be made temporary in its operation. If it is found that the method works better than we anticipate, then next year the money can be devoted to the same purposes. As the matter is so important, I venture to urge the principle of my amendment on the Government.

MR. ROBERTSON: I rise on a point of Order. I have an Amendment to leave out the word Parliament. If all the words proposed in the Amendment now before the House are left out, I am afraid my Amendment would be excluded.

THE CHAIRMAN: It seems to me that the issues are precisely the same, that the object of the hon. Member is the object of the other hon. Member (Mr. Buchanan).

MR. ROBERTSON: My object is, I submit, entirely different. It is to enable the House of Commons, by Resolution, not merely next year, but any year, to provide, alter, modify, or repeal, a scheme in any way the House may think proper.

THE CHAIRMAN: So far as the object of the hon. Member is to preserve the freedom of the House of Commons in future years, it is the same as that of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan): if the object is to give the House of Commons power to set aside the arrangement this year, it is otherwise irregular.

MR. ROBERTSON: My Amendment goes a long way beyond that of my hon. Friend. What I really want to do is to declare by this Act that it shall be in the power of the House of Commons at any time to pass a Resolution which should have the force of law, and should repeal the scheme in force under this Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN: I never heard such a novel suggestion. If the House of Commons wishes to do that, it already possesses the power without embracing it in an Act of Parliament. It should refuse to concur in a proposal it could immediately set aside.

MR. ROBERTSON: I do not wish to prolong the matter. The objection that this proposal is a novel one, is one I at once admit; but, if that puts me out of order, that is a totally different thing.

*THE CHAIRMAN: It is so novel that it appears to be irregular. As far as I know, Parliament has never passed an Act making a law which may be immediately repealed by one House.

MR. ROBERTSON: I should like to know what meaning the Lord Advocate places upon this provision of the clause? No part of this Bill, no part of any Bill can survive one single instant beyond the time that Parliament should otherwise determine. Why are these words inserted here? If he will tell me that they do mean something, and that they have what I contend is the only rational meaning—that they mean there is not a permanent distribution of money—then I shall be content to allow them to stand. I should like to have a definite answer to these two questions. Do they mean anything or do they not, and if they have no meaning will he consent to their excision? Will he tell us that they are intended to be a warning to the Local Bodies, that although this scheme is embodied in an Act of Parliament it is not intended to be permanent or perpetual; but that they should take this money on the distinct understanding that at any moment this distribution may be changed by Act of Parliament.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: The question is one which arose in this House two or three years ago. It was then explained that it was thought desirable to call attention to the fact that Parliament in passing the measure did not contemplate that it was necessarily a final settlement; but that is a different thing from the omission of the words and so throwing the whole subject open to annual determination. These words are intended as modified notice to the bodies who receive the money that they are not to rely too strongly on Parliament not interfering again. That, however, is a totally different thing from the Amendment of the hon. Member, who I think has not succeeded in making out a case. As I read his Amendment it applies to the whole of Clause 2, whereas his speech was devoted to the first sub-section, as if the Amendment were only to apply to secondary education.

MR. BUCHANAN: I mean it to be applied to the whole—the new money.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I think it would be as unfortunate to confine the operation of Clause 2 in all its branches to the current year, as it would have been to confine the operation of the first clause under the previous Amendment.

(8.10.) MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): The explanation of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir C. J. Pearson) really leaves this matter somewhat more bewildering than it was before. It must be perfectly evident to anyone who looks back upon all that has passed with regard to this money, and who recollects all that has been said about this money on the part of the Government, and to the intentions that have been expressed in Scotland, that there is no fixed or certain scheme to which the allocation of this money can be permanently made. The right hon. and learned Gentleman's explanation contained one satisfactory element, and that was his acknowledgment, in reply to the hon. Member for Dundee (Mr. Robertson), that the words "until Parliament otherwise determines" were inserted in the Bill to give a hint to the recipients of the money not to count upon it as a permanent grant. But I cannot help thinking, notwithstanding what the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, that the words in such clause are somewhat unusual. It is not uncommon to insert in a Bill some words with reference to the determination of Parliament, as in Clause 1, where in line twenty it says, "or of such other amount as Parliament may determine, having regard to the amount of the fee grant," thus leaving some elasticity as to the amount of the sum, and leaving it to be settled according to the determination of Parliament. What we object to, Mr. Courtney, with regard to a proposal of this kind is, that if it is not unconstitutional, it tends in an unconstitutional direction. There is every sort of argument in favour of making this a temporary Bill. There is the argument of a moribund Parliament, the argument founded on the fact that the opinion of Parliament is not fully made up on the subject, and the argument founded on the obvious fact that this, in its inception, is a makeshift arrangement of the Government. Our principal objection is strengthened by the fact that the same policy the Government are pursuing with regard to this Bill, they have pursued with regard to others during late years. We have had a Naval Bill, an Army Bill, and other Bills, every one of which appeared to be designed to take away from the House of Commons the control over the expenditure of public money, and to bring the House of Lords directly into partnership in the control of that money, thus depriving the House of Commons of a free hand to dispose of money raised by taxation, which according to the Constitution this House possesses. That is why we dwell upon this point to an extent that may seem unreasonable. The right hon. Gentleman seems to think it is important that the House of Lords should possess the key of the Constitution. That is the very reason we dislike the Bill, and see an objectionable tendency in the whole idea which underlies it. Well, Mr. Courtney, my hon. Friend has moved an Amendment for striking out certain words. I agree that these words, having the sense now attributed to them, had better be left in if we do not substitute anything else for them. But my hon. Friend moves to leave them out in order to substitute "in the financial year ending 31st March, after the passing of this Act." My hon. Friend wishes to confine the effect of this Bill to one year, and in that I shall strongly support him, not only on the ground of the merits of this particular case, but also because it is, I think, our duty to oppose every action which has any tendency to deprive the House of Commons of that perfect control over the finances of the country which the House of Commons should have.

(8.17.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can assure the right hon. Gentleman there is no dark design of the kind which he seems to suspect on the part of the Machiavellis on the Front Bench. Of course the words which the hon. Member proposes to leave out are not worth making a long fight for—they are according to a recent precedent—but if it will soothe the feelings of hon. Members opposite I shall be willing to accede to the suggestion to leave them out. I think, however, that I cannot agree to the words proposed to be substituted. The right hon. Gentleman proposes, I think, that for this year the scheme shall be left in a fluid and indeterminate condition, so that next year, under other and perhaps happier auspices, he may perhaps bring in a Bill embodying the proposals he desires to see adopted. It seems to me that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman is a better one than that of the hon. Member for Dundee, who thinks that this scheme should be fluid for all time, and thus leave the Local Bodies in Scotland in doubt every year as to whether some Vote in Supply might not entirely alter these funds, on the reception of which they may have framed all their schemes for the year and the general mode of conducting their business. I really cannot see how it can be supposed that this permanent uncertainty would find favour with the popularly-elected bodies in Scotland, which, after all, we have to consider.

(8.20.) DR. CLARK: I hope my hon. Friend will withdraw the Amendment and move to have the words inserted in the next line, where they could be easily inserted. I recollect both the precedents which have been alluded to by hon. Gentlemen, and I think we should give a warning to the Local Bodies not to regard these grants as permanent. In my opinion it is very desirable that the words "until Parliament otherwise determines" should be left in the Bill, because they indicate that the Government is giving this money provisionally until they can look up and consider the whole question, and bring in a measure of a permanent character. I therefore trust that my hon. Friend will withdraw the Amendment as suggested, and then in the next line he can move for the words limiting the grant to the financial year ending 31st March to be inserted. That would prevent me from being compelled to vote against my hon. Friend, and probably also prevent my vote from being misunderstood.

(8.22.) MR. ROBERTSON: The First Lord of the Treasury has protested against any dark design being imputed to the Machiavellis on the Front Bench. It seems to me that the design is not dark at all. It is as clear as noon-day, and there is no mystery about it. The design has been pursued from the beginning, and these words which are now being challenged have no meaning at all, unless they mean that the Government want to bring in the veto of the House of Lords. The right hon. Gentleman talked about our wanting to have a fluid scheme. In what respect is a scheme depending upon the will of this House more fluid than an Act of Parliament? What is the difference? Simply that the House of Lords have a veto. Well, the Lord Advocate, I am bound to say, explained the meaning of these words with great candour. He has almost disarmed my opposition and that of the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), and I am not sure that he has not nearly made a convert of the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). The right hon. and learned Gentleman said most distinctly that these words are a warning to the Local Bodies, and he accepted my own words that this is not a permanent scheme.

SIR C. J. PEARSON: I said not necessarily.

MR. ROBERTSON: Here is a new complication and ambiguity. The words in the Bill have no meaning in law at all, as the Lord Advocate knows very well. All they signify is a warning from this House that this scheme is not a permanent one. Now he says "not necessarily" a permanent one. That reduces the words again to no meaning at all, because no scheme is necessarily a permanent one. Therefore, he is taking away a little from his candid explanation. If the right hon. Gentleman will let these words stand with the unqualified explanation that this scheme is not a permanent one, I shall be inclined to take the view of my hon. Friend and vote for the retention of the words "until Parliament shall otherwise determine."

(8.25.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I do not think the First Lord of the Treasury realises exactly what the effect of the Amendment, if passed, would be. It means that for this one year the money is to be granted as proposed, and that next year it shall be open to the House to decide whether it shall be granted by another Act or by vote of this House alone. I hope my hon. Friend will press his Amendment for leaving out the words "until Parliament otherwise determines," and try to get his own inserted, because I think that this House should have the opportunity of deciding next year whether it will dispose of this money in a different way from that now proposed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Lord Advocate has said that the most elastic part of the whole clause is that dealing with the £60,000, because it depends upon a Memorandum issued by the Scotch Education Department. But this Education Memorandum is one of the points we take the greatest exception to. We say this Memorandum is, so far as we can understand it—and I do not think any hon. Member will find it easy to understand—does not put forward a satisfactory scheme, and one to which we can give our consent. And then we object to each proposal of this clause as it now stands, and therefore we propose that the effect of it should be limited to a single year.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The First Lord of the Treasury has introduced, not for the first time, Machiavellianism. I am not sure that his is quite an accurate view of Machiavelli's history and character, but, still, if there is a very designing person here who is up to what, in vulgar language, I should call "tricks," is not there a danger, I will ask my hon. Friends behind me, of getting rid of these words which, in themselves, are of some value and, after all, not being allowed to put in the words we wish? My right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board has been in a somewhat lively condition for the last five minutes, and I have begun to think that perhaps he may be Machiavelli in person. With a view to the contingency I have just referred to, I am inclined to advise my hon. Friend to let these words remain lest we should get rid of them and not get others in.

*(8.29.) MR. BUCHANAN: Since I moved this Amendment we have had an interpretation of the highest importance put upon the words that I propose to be left out by two right hon. Gentlemen. And in consideration of the fact that we have already had a Division on the subject of making the whole of the Bill applicable for one year; and considering as well the statements made by the First Lord of the Treasury and by the Lord Advocate, that the words to be omitted are intended as a warning to the Local Authorities and other persons entrusted with the distribution of this money that the distribution is not necessarily permanent, I shall be willing to withdraw the Amendment.

Mr. Robertson

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

* (9.6.) MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): The object of my Amendment requires very few words of explanation, as the facts of the case have been long before the House. It is the very opposite to the Amendment about to be moved by the right hon. Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks). The right hon. Gentleman proposes to rob the ratepayers of £50,000 in order to add it to the £60,000, and so increase the grant for secondary education to £110,000. I propose to transfer the £60,000, which under the Government Bill is to go to secondary education, to the Town and County Councils. I would say in passing that, in the event of my proposal being accepted, I am perfectly willing to give the Town and County Councils freer hands than they have under the Bill. My Amendment will be seconded by the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), who has also promised to act as Teller with me in the Division. I may mention that I was perfectly willing to accept the compromise in the Bill, because I think the compromise of £60,000 proposed by the Government is, on the whole, a fair one between the claims of the ratepayers and of higher education. Compromise is, however, a matter of give and take; and yet, so far as I can make out, those who are fanatically in favour of secondary education and fanatically opposed to the claims of the ratepayers are determined that their share shall be all take and no give. It is as a protest against this idea of theirs that I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 8, to leave out Sub-section 1.—(Mr. Hozier.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'In transferring to the Scotch Education Department' stand part of the Clause."

(9.8.) DR. CLARK: I would give the hon. Member my support if I thought the money would be expended in the way suggested by the Government, and if I thought it could not be amended; otherwise I should vote that it be not spent on secondary education at all. There is a large amount of money for secondary education at present, which was intended for the education of the poor, and now the Government are going to use this £60,000 for intermediate and technical education. I am not sure that the hon. Gentleman is not right. I should be glad to hear something from the Lord Advocate as to the course the Government are going to take in regard to the £60,000. Are you going to limit it to middle-class schools, or do you want to take in what may be termed intermediate and technical education? Do you want to limit this money solely and entirely to the burghs and the large towns, or are you going to give it in such a form that it will benefit the agricultural population, and so that we shall have agriculture taught and other subjects interesting to the country population as well as in the towns? I think we should have some statement from the Lord Advocate as to what he is going to do with this money.

(9.11.) DR. CAMERON: I have great pleasure in supporting this Amendment, but not for the Platonic reasons put forward by the hon. Member who proposed it. I support the Amendment, because I consider, so far as I can make out from the expression of the opinion of those who are best able to judge regarding such questions, that the money proposed to be devoted to secondary education under this Bill and scheme of the Government will be absolutely wasted. My hon. Friend asked for information as to how the Government proposed to distribute this sum of £60,000, but he will find that information given in the 1st clause contained in the Memorandum presented to the House by the Department. According to that, I understand they are going to give £45,000 by results; £1,500 to the higher departments in primary schools; and the remainder is to go to the expenses of testing the education by examinations. I am concerned in this grant chiefly and naturally on behalf of my own constituents; and I confess I fail to see how, under the provisions of this Bill, they are to be benefited. As I said before in connection with another matter, of the £60,000 the distribution of which we are now discussing Glasgow contributes by taxation £10,000, and anything less than that £10,000 which she receives is so much taken from the ratepayers of Glasgow for distribution in other places. I do not conceive that we would get back anything like the money taken from us by taxation, under this Bill. The Memorandum of the Department appears to me to be absolutely fallacious and unreliable. The figures in it are imaginary in the highest degree. Everything is an assumption. It states that the 50,000 children between the ages of 13 and 16 at present in the Board schools of Scotland will, by the operation of this proposal of the Government, be increased to 112,000. The number of children between the ages of 13 and 16 in all the public schools in Glasgow is only some 7,000. The Memorandum is not easy to understand, and I think, before we distribute this money, we should have some distinct explanation of it. In the first place, I may say the scheme proposed by the Government has been condemned in every quarter in which it has been criticised. There are a number of gentlemen who are strong advocates of secondary education on this side of the House, and there is not one of these gentlemen but denounced the scheme of the Government in the very strongest terms. [Mr. ESSLEMONT dissented.] My hon. Friend is very fond of speaking for other people. I do not say he has done so; but a very large number of Members on this side of the House have spoken in the very strongest terms against the proposal of the Government. To show that the case of Glasgow is not a singular case, take the case of Dumfries, as set forth in a Memorandum sent up by the School Board of that town. The School Board of Dumfries points out that the rates would have to be very largely increased under the proposal of the Government, supposing the attendance did not increase at all. The total increase would amount to £933. This increased burden would be imposed not for the burgh population in whom the ratepayers are interested, but for the purpose of educating the children of non-residents to the extent of half the attendance. And they go on to ask whether it is contemplated that any additional rating power should be given to carry out the provisions of this Bill. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman can answer that question propounded by the School Board of Dumfries. There is one high school in Glasgow which for a very long period has occupied a high place among the educational establishments of the country, and it is a question whether it can be affected at all by the proposal of the Government. If the arrangements set forth in the Memorandum to be applied in the case of certain higher schools were carried out in this case, it would represent a loss on the average of £10, in the hope of getting £3 from the Government; and I do not know that that is a transaction that is likely to be entered upon. There are, however, a great number of endowed schools in Glasgow that will benefit, though not to any very considerable extent, by this proposal; but the majority of such institutions as will benefit by it are already richly provided for by endowments for the purposes of secondary education. Coming to the case of the higher departments in schools, as I understand the Memorandum pupils who are raised into the higher departments of these schools will cease to be entitled to a grant from the ordinary Education Fund. I think it is perfectly evident that Glasgow will not benefit with respect to her schools to the extent of anything like the £10,000 which she has to contribute to this scheme. Again, I protest against, and very strongly object to, the proposal of the Government, founded on the fact that we are asked to give this large sum of money under conditions to be subsequently determined by Minutes of the Education Department. The Education Department has been highly praised by various speakers who have taken part in the Debates on this Bill for its excellent management of Scottish educational affairs. I take the liberty to doubt—I will not say the ability of those at the head of the Department—but I doubt in the strongest manner the fact of their inclinations and their policy being at all in consonance with the views of the majority of the Representatives of Scotland. I can quote examples which will show the absolutely reactionary inclination of the Board and of the Department, and that the Department, however conscientiously conducted—and I do not mean for one moment to insinuate that the officials do not wish in the most conscientious manner to discharge their duties in accordance with their views—but I say that the instances which I shall quote will be sufficient to convince the House that the Department is not at all conducted by gentlemen in consonance with the educational policy entertained by the majority of the Scottish Members. What has been the attitude of the Department on free education for many years? Why, it was hostile in the strongest possible degree. Some of the Highland School Boards, who wished to discontinue fees in their schools as being detrimental to their usefulness, proposed a nominal fee of a halfpenny a week. The Department held that that was clearly an evasion of the law. Then, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella), who either was, or had recently been, a Vice President of the Education Department, ventured to make a speech in favour of free education, he was answered by an official of the Department. A permanent official of the Department stepped out of his place, according to the rules laid down by this Department, and either spoke or wrote publicly and in his own name against the views entertained by this gentleman who had been so long an official. To take a more recent case as illustrating the arbitrary manner in which the Department acts, and its total disregard of the views of the populace, take the case of the Port Glasgow School Board election. An insufficient number of candidates went to the poll, that insufficient number was declared elected, and the members elected then nominated the remaining members of the Board. That decision was followed in a number of cases. The legality of the election of such School Board was consequently tested before the Court of Session, and the Court pronounced that the election was invalid. The result was that 68 School Board elections, which had been carried out in the same manner, have been declared invalid. In certain cases the constituencies had been grossly dissatisfied with the School Boards which had been imposed upon them. That they had been so dissatisfied was proved by the fact that they had, in one case, gone before the Court of Session and got the appointment of the School Board annulled. The strongest representations were made to the right hon. Gentleman upon that point, and it was urged that he might remove the injustice by allowing a new election. But instead of that he re-nominated the Board that had been declared illegal and allowed the grievances of the ratepayers to remain. To show the autocratic disposition of the Department, I may mention that I put down on the Paper a Motion asking what School Boards could be rendered illegal through the decision of the Court of Session, and the right hon. Gentleman informed me that I might see the Return if I would wait upon him. When I went to ask the right hon. Gentleman for the names, he told me he did not consider he was bound by a promise so given across the floor of the House. This is the autocratic Department which appears to render, even the chiefs who are temporarily connected with it, absolutely careless not only of public opinion, but also of the courtesies and usages of this House. This is the Department into whose hands we are asked to hand over the absolute disposal of this money. The Memorandum is not intelligible, and I venture to say that no Member of the House who has attempted to study it and to see what its results would be in the constituency in which he is interested will be able to predict what would follow if the Memorandum were passed into law. For these reasons I heartily, and on much more than Platonic grounds, second the Motion. It appears to me that the money will certainly not be distributed by the Department in accordance with the advanced views of the present time; I believe the money proposed to be voted will be absolutely wasted under the proposal of the Government. I should like the proposal to be explained and drafted in some such way that we can understand it. To show how little the people of Scotland understand the force of this Memorandum, one of my hon. Friends showed me a long telegram which he received from the School Board of his constituency, in which it appeared to be assumed that this Memorandum was part of the Bill, and the Board requested him to move certain Amendments to some of the clauses. If we are going to spend £60,000, we might as well know how we are going to spend it. It appears to me we cannot do better than allow it to go in some direction where we shall know what becomes of it rather than into the hands of this despotic, arbitrary, and reactionary Department to do precisely what it likes with it.

(9.36.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I do say with some degree of earnestness, that, as the Mover of this Amendment has said that he is not serious in it—

MR. HOZIER: I beg my hon. Friend's pardon; I am very serious indeed.

MR. ESSLEMONT: My hon. Friend really approved of the Bill as it stood; and had not Amendments followed asking for a little more for education than is proposed by the Government, he would not, as I understood his statement, have moved this Amendment. I submit it is not worth our while to consider it any further; and that, in order to promote the progress of business, we might really go on to the earnest and well-meant, if mistaken, Amendments that follow, so that we may discuss what we are to do with education. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate will put an end to this discussion, which I cannot regard as being serious at all, and declare what the Government intend to do with regard to it.

*(9.39.) MR. MARK J. STEWART (Kirkcudbright): I think the remarks of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow with regard to the Scotch Department require some answer from this side of the House. I regret the spirit in which the hon. Member entered upon the subject. He has carefully thought out old grievances and old wrongs, and has raked up past times and bygones. I consider his accusations are most unfair, and I should like to put it to Scotch Members whether the facts are as the hon. Member has stated? No doubt the Department has exercised great caution. When free education was first mooted, long before Dr. Hunter appeared on the scene, I had some correspondence with the Department. I found the tone they took was not hostile to free education, but at the same time they pointed out the difficulties that stood in the way. I can conceive no better Department with which to entrust the disposal of this £60,000. What would the hon. Member propose to do with the money? Supposing it were handed over to Local Authorities would he frame a stereotyped Act of Parliament for their guidance? That is absolutely impossible; therefore, not to trust the Department is unfair and discourteous. We know it is very difficult to make the existing Code applicable to all parts of the country. Almost every district differs. The hon. Member mentioned the case of Dumfries. A considerable amount of correspondence has been going on between the Dumfries Academy and the Education Department, and if I am not wrongly informed the differences are practically solved. This Bill will enable poor men to forward their sons and daughters in secondary education. I should have preferred that a larger sum than £60,000 was to be given to secondary education, but I am convinced that the voice of the country is against it. In my own constituency there is a very strong feeling in favour of giving a large sum towards the relief of rates. But, at the same time, my constituents recognise that education must not be left out in the cold, and are willing to go so far. There is a stronger feeling still that this Bill of the Government is the fairest and most just Bill of any that has been brought in during this Parliament. I am speaking for Liberal as well as Conservative opinion. I do urge Gentlemen who are opposing this Bill to hold their hands. We have a General Election before us, and if they want to come back again they had better support the Bill to-night.

(9.45.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I am sorry the hon. Member who has just sat down closed his speech by a sort of recantation of opinions which he held at an earlier period in the discussion. He has told us his first impression was that a larger sum should be devoted to secondary education, but now he is confident that £60,000 is quite sufficient. My hon. Friend's statement that a larger sum should be given in relief of rates might have been accepted if provision had been made for giving the Town and County Councils a free hand in dealing with the money; but if they are obliged to apply the money in relief of rates, then we are bound to take care that in that part of the Bill which proposes to give money for education, the sum should be considerably larger than that proposed. Now, we are placed in a somewhat peculiar position by the Amendment, because its terms are such that I imagine it will receive support very largely from all sections of Scotch Members. My hon. Friend proposes to leave out the words transferring the money to the Scotch Education Department. He makes that proposition in order that the money that is proposed to be given to the Scotch Education Department might be applied in relief of rates. What does that mean? It means that we are to relieve the ratepayer out of the pocket of the taxpayer; and while the rich and the poor taxpayers pay approximately in equal proportions, this is not the case with the ratepayers, as may be seen from a calculation made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) with regard to Scotland, showing that three-fourths of the people live in houses under £10 yearly rental, and pay about one tenth of the rates, whereas the people who live in houses over £10 pay nine-tenths of the rates. It seems to me that the sum of money to be given to education in Scotland has been kept down to £60,000, because it is thought that the Scotch Education Department could hardly dispose of more than that amount. I think the feeling of all sections of Scottish Members is in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite, though for varying and opposite reasons.

MR. HOZIER: If the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks) is not aware of the Gladstonian feeling in Scotland with reference to this question, I will read him an extract from the North British Daily Mail, with which I believe he is acquainted. It is the leading Gladstonian organ in Scotland.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I do not think we need dispute the excellence of the North British Daily Mail; at the same time we are not obliged on all occasions to accept the arguments and conclusions put forward in that paper.

(7.44.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I had intended to support the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite to leave out this sub-section, but not with the object which has actuated him in moving it—namely, of getting rid altogether of the very moderate grant which the Government propose to make for the benefit of education in Scotland. It seems to me that the object we ought to have in view in rejecting this sub-section is to prevent the scheme, which is an extremely crude one, and entirely inadequate for the purpose, from being enacted in this House for the benefit of secondary education. I think the House will feel, when it looks into the Memorandum, that the data provided in it is altogether insufficient to enable us to now come to a conclusion as to the best manner of dealing with the question of secondary education. Therefore, after the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite has been dealt with, I propose to move the insertion of such words as will have the effect of referring the matter to a Commission for consideration. I hope that the Government will entertain that proposal, for by so doing I believe they will greatly facilitate the progress of the Bill. I do not know whether the Committee are aware that no Commission has investigated the question of Scotch secondary education, the extent of its endowments, and so on. We ought to have such information, for that which has been given us in such small fragments, and so slowly, is not sufficient for our purpose. Indeed, the more I look at this Memorandum the less I understand it. We should like to know whether the Government propose to include endowed schools, whether they are going to adhere to their proposal about fees, and how they are going to deal with schools in small burghs? These are only a few of the many questions upon which we desire to have some light. We want an inquiry not only for the purpose of informing ourselves, but also to elicit the views and sentiments which we believe exist in Scotland in a latent state, but which we have not yet seen fully developed. I can assure the Government that no attempt is being made to convert this question into a Party question. If there is any credit to be gained from the passing of the Act, the Government will get more credit by passing it after a full examination of the facts. I think, therefore, that our request for such an inquiry is a reasonable one. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North-East Lanarkshire (Mr. Crawford) has an Amendment on the Paper by which the money would be distributed according to schemes prepared by the Education Committees of counties. It would, perhaps, be better that there should be some general inquiry by a Committee; but whatever conclusion may be come to, I do not think this is a matter which should be left entirely in the hands of the Education Department. The Government propose that many important questions should be settled by subsequent Minutes; but, for my part, I think they should be settled now. In discussing the Amendment of my my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee (Mr. Robertson) the Lord Advocate said "if the scheme succeeds Parliament will not interfere." The case I want to submit is that this may not succeed in giving Scotch secondary education either the extension or approval it requires, and that under it there may grow up vested interests on the part of School Boards and School Board teachers which will make it difficult for any succeeding Secretary of State, or even the present Secretary of State, to alter the scheme. I submit, therefore, that in this experiment we are running some risk, because if we allow a number of vested interests to grow up, and are subsequently convinced that the scheme is not the best scheme, but a most imperfect and unsatisfactory one, we shall be met by local opposition when we try to alter that scheme. What is wanted is a full 'preliminary inquiry, and by granting such an investigation the Government would lose nothing.

Mr. Bryce

MR. CRAWFORD: My hon. Friend (Mr. Bryce) has made some reference to the Resolution I have lower down on the Paper, and I think he assumed the possibility of conflict between his proposal and mine. I do not think there would be any such conflict, because I may point out that my object, and I have held it for some years, in reference to secondary education in Scotland is that there should be Local and County Authorities, having the administration and charge of secondary education within their limit, in the same way that elementary education is managed by the School Boards. The proposal of my hon. Friend is that it is necessary and desirable to lay down by Commission, and at the starting point, some general principles. Of course in my scheme the corresponding duty would have rested with the Education Department, who, according to my Amendment, would have had the supervision of the County Council Scheme and the right of veto. Some concession upon this and other points would tend to modify opposition. We think, with regard to the matter of education, that sufficient information is not before the House. In illustration of this I may say that not a single Member around me has a copy of the Memorandum, and I do not believe that within the precincts of this building there is one to be got. That Memorandum was supplemented by the absolutely necessary information as to what the schools were to which this money was to be given, but that information was given in manuscript, which, I think, the right hon. Gentleman will admit was not the most convenient form. As far as I can understand the plan proposed by the Government, it is a most disappointing one; indeed, on the part of the schools or others interested, I have not heard one word in its favour. It appears to be based, so far as I can gather, on the cardinal assumption that the average fee in the schools is £6, whereas it is £8. That entirely upsets the calculation. I am surprised at this lapse, seeing that we have eminent gentlemen connected with the Scotch Education Department. There are some of the Edinburgh professors who, of course, cannot be expected to attend its meetings, but we have the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury and my noble Friend Lord Sandford. I suppose we must assume that these Gentlemen took some share in the framing of this initial scheme to give Government grants in aid of education. If so, I am astounded at their production; and, if it was not as I assume, then we have reason to complain and good ground for asking that the country should have further opportunity of discussing and considering this matter. It is true that there is a precedent for tying down money in this way. We have the Imperial and Naval Defence Acts, and the Barracks Acts, but even these are coming to an end after a time. If the concessions which have been suggested were granted, and if a Committee, say of five, were appointed—not the Committee that would triplicate the influence of a subordinate official in the Scotch Office, but a really honestly composed Committee which would form an independent judgment on the matter—with instructions to report upon the Welsh system, I believe then that the opposition would be relieved. There is, however, a further concession. We consider the amount too small, and on independent grounds entirely object to the absolute limitation of the money given to the Town and County Councils to the relief of rates. It would be advantageous, I think, if that tying down of the money for the relief of rates were struck out, because then the Councils would have the right to dispose of the money as they pleased, and, having confidence in the desire for secondary and technical education, we believe that an additional source for drawing in aid of these subjects would thus be afforded. I admit that at present the number of people who take an interest in secondary education is comparatively limited. Interest in that subject has yet to be aroused, and proper information in regard to it procured by visiting the localities and by inquiry.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Hozier) has moved an Amendment which seeks to prevent the devotion of £60,000 per year to secondary education. I need hardly say Her Majesty's Government cannot follow him in that proposal. On the proposal itself, however, there has been grafted a debate, connected, but still only remotely connected, with the object my hon. Friend has in view, and in which issues of the gravest import for the progress of this measure are involved. In that Debate there have been speeches, and notably one from the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow (Dr. Cameron) and from the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Crawford) attacking the permanent officials who have charge of Scotch education. I desire before going further to divorce myself absolutely from that attack. As Secretary for Scotland some years ago, and having never been wholly separated from Scotch affairs since then, being a Member of the Committee on Scotch Education, I have had means of acquainting myself with the earnestness, the ability, and the industry of the gentlemen who have charge of Scotch education. And I venture to say that in my experience of public servants—and my experience of them is not inconsiderable—no more deserving public servants exist. I do not hesitate to say that those who are called upon from time to time to manage the affairs of any Department never had a more discreet, faithful, and able servant than the Education Office possesses in the gentleman who is at the head of the permanent officials of that Department.

MR. CRAWFORD: I have made no personal attack on the official in question, and I may say that when I spoke on the Second Reading I paid a high tribute to his merits.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If I mistook the meaning of the hon. Member I am delighted to acknowledge my error. Well, Sir, a good deal of criticism has taken place on this clause of the Bill, because it is said that this binds us to a scheme embodied in a Memorandum which is in the hands of Members, and which has been made a subject of considerable animadversion. Sir, this clause binds the House to nothing whatever but the allocation of some £60,000 to the cause of secondary education in Scotland. The particular scheme advocated by the Scotch Education Department finds no place in the Bill, is not rendered necessary by the Bill, and could be altered without changing a single word of the Bill; and, therefore, it appears to me that we need not spend the whole evening in discussing a scheme which, in the nature of the case, need not be a permanent scheme. "But," says the hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen, "If you start with this scheme you will practically create vested interests and your successors whatever their views may be on Scotch secondary education, will find themselves bound hand and foot by the precedents set in a hasty and ill-considered measure." That is his argument. "Cannot you," he says, appealing to us, "take steps for more maturely considering the effect before you embark on it?" Now, Sir, if my opinion is asked on the matter, I do not consider that any such course is necessary or advisable. If my own private opinion be of any value, I think the scheme put forward, framed in the first instance, as I have said before, by gentlemen more intimately acquainted with the needs and circumstances of Scotch primary and secondary education than any other gentlemen in the country, is a scheme well worthy of adoption by this House. That is the agreement; and if the Committee take my advice they will pass the clause as it at present stands, on the understanding that the scheme embodied in the Memorandum is to be the one we shall embark upon, subject to such modifications as future experience might show to be necessary. But, Sir, if this controversy with regard to the particular form of secondary education in Scotland would be terminated by an arrangement under which a Departmental Committee, not a Commission, should be appointed to consider the shape in which the first Minute of Council is to be framed; if the formation of such a Committee would really allay this prolonged discussion, I confess, though with great reluctance, and not believing it is the best course to pursue, I might, in the interest of Public Business, be induced to accept it as a compromise, but it must be understood that it is a compromise. If it be regarded as a compromise, and if it be understood that the Committee I have sketched out is not to be in any sense of the word a roving Commission, then, Sir, for my own part, I should be reluctantly prepared to meet the proposal of the hon. Gentleman opposite half-way. There is one other suggestion he made not relevant to this Amendment at all, but arising upon a later portion of the Bill, which he seems to regard as very important. He desires to see greater liberty given to County and Town Councils in the employment of the money referred to in the 5th sub-section of Clause 2. Now, Sir, if I may be permitted to travel away from the matter immediately before us, the 5th sub-section provides that the money shall be used solely for the relief of the rates. An alternative scheme on the subject has been suggested by which it has been proposed that the money should be used for every kind of purpose other than, and outside of, this purpose. I admit it will be impossible for the Government to give the extreme latitude which some critics of this Bill desire in the employment of this £100,000 for local purposes. I do not think that could be assented to. But if it would meet the wishes of the Committee and meet in any way the intentions expressed on the other side, I should have no objection as a compromise to seeing added to the words "to be applied to the relief of local rates," some such words as would allow Town Councils and County Councils, under statutory powers, to apply the money either for the relief of the rates, as originally proposed, or for the promotion of such objects as they may have already the charge of.

MR. ESSLEMONT: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to specify what objects he thinks would be under the authority, for instance, of the County Council towards which the money could be applied?

Mr. A. J. Balfour

MR. SINCLAIR: And I should like to inquire if education, especially, would be included?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Only technical education. At present a County Council or Town Council have no educational powers except as far as technical education is concerned. But if words such as I have suggested were added it would be in the power of the County Council to carry out most of the objects which the hon. Member opposite—who is an old hand in connection with Local Authorities—desires, as well as the purposes of technical education which has been handed over to the Local Authorities by recent legislation. I hope the suggestion I have made will be accepted in the spirit in which it is put forward—the spirit of compromise—and that it will be the means of avoiding lengthy discussions on the Bill. If that end is obtained, and the concessions made are received in the way I have mentioned, I shall feel that while I have given up what I consider to be the best course to pursue, yet at the same time I have not, perhaps, given it up without receiving something of equal worth.

*(10.33.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I so fully recognise the value of the compromise offered by the right hon. Gentleman that I should be very sorry if any remark I made tended to neutralise the full admission on my part of the admirable spirit of his remarks. But, at the same time, he will understand that there are some of the conditions he has laid down with reference to this concession on his part—or the proposals he has shadowed forth—which I think call for some observation from us on this side. I really am delighted that the right hon. Gentleman has approached the subject in this spirit, because all of us who are Scotch Members must have at heart a patriotic desire to see the best use made of this money, whether it be for educational or any other purposes. First of all, let me dissociate myself from any imputation that has been made upon us that we in any degree attack my Friend who is at the head of the Scotch Education Department. We fully recognise his great merits and his great knowledge of the whole question, and the ability with which he conducts all the business entrusted to him. At the same time, I am bound to say that the Memorandum which has been put forward within the last few days is not, to say the least of it, a very luminous document. It is a document which makes this question very much more difficult to understand, and, in fact, from beginning to end it is a sort of puzzle. I have read it several times, and I have not yet arrived at a knowledge of its real meaning. Another fact I would point out is that this Memorandum having necessarily been put together under pressure, many of the facts upon which its proposals rest are found on further investigation not to be perfectly accurate. We have had within the last two or three days information from educational sources in Scotland which has enabled us to point to one or two grave errors in the Memorandum which really affect the whole of the calculations upon which the scheme is based. But after what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Balfour) has said, I do not propose to occupy any further time of the House in discussing the particular scheme put forward in the Memorandum, because the right hon. Gentleman has consented practically to the appointment of a Committee to inquire into the matter, with a view to the framing of a scheme. The right hon. Gentleman based his consent, I think, upon a somewhat unworthy ground. He said it was merely to prevent discussion. I think it ought not to be put entirely on that ground, because if there were a prospect of a somewhat prolonged discussion on this matter it would not be an unjustifiable discussion, for it is a subject so complicated, and one which so lends itself to diversity of opinion on all hands, that it would have been strange indeed if there had not been considerable debate. But I quite see that the right hon. Gentleman may save time, from the point of view of the Government, by a concession of this kind. But I should like to point out to him that a great deal depends—in fact, almost everything depends—upon two things. First of all, what are the instructions to be given to this Committee; and, secondly, what is even more important, who are to be the Members of it. My hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire (Mr. Crawford) spoke of a Committee honestly composed, by which, of course, he meant that it was a Committee in respect to which an endeavour should be made to fully represent all the different shades of opinion on this question, and a Committee which would not run on in the ordinary departmental groove. I would mention this apart from any criticism which may have been passed on the Memorandum of the Education Department, and merely as a point which seems a strong one in favour of inquiry by a Committee or Commission—that questions in Scotland vary so much in the various localities, in the different towns, and in the different counties, that it is vain to expect that a centralised Department could produce a homogeneous scheme which will apply with equal efficiency in all parts of the country; and I should like the Commission or Committee to take a broader view of this matter than would, perhaps, be possible in a Government Department. The right hon. Gentleman said—but perhaps this is going back on the Memorandum—that we are not committed to the Memorandum if we pass this Bill. I venture, with great respect, to differ from that statement, because we are told in the Bill that the new system of secondary education is to be based on Minutes issued by the Education Department; and when, with a view to the discussion of this Bill, a Memorandum has been issued setting forth the view of the Department, and the House of Commons passes this Bill with that Memorandum before it, it would certainly be said that the House of Commons had this particular scheme in view at the time it passed the Bill, and therefore we should, practically, be giving our authority and consent to these proposals if we passed the Bill. However, the right hon. Gentleman has appealed to us to accept what he calls a compromise; and, speaking for myself, I think it would be a very wise step to appoint a Committee or Commission, provided, as I have said, it is a competent Committee or Commission in the sense to which I have referred. As to the shortening of the Debate, I feel that it would only remove all necessity to discuss the particular scheme for the application of this secondary education money. I do not, however, think that we shall escape the necessity of arguing in favour of a larger total amount to be devoted to this purpose and I cannot promise that that time would be saved. I cannot promise that it would have any influence at all on the remarks that would be made on the grant to the Universities or the grant to Parochial Boards; but otherwise with regard to the secondary education sub-section, there is no doubt it would have a beneficial effect. Then the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to refer to a further concession—namely, that certain words should be put in at the end of sub-section 5 in order to give a larger discretion to Town Councils and County Councils. I have repeatedly during these Debates urged upon the Government the adoption of this course. I am willing to make this admission—that while in the case of the Town Councils, as I understand the state of the law, you could give perfect freedom of hand with the knowledge that they have ample power to devote the money to several useful purposes which could be mentioned, in the case of County Councils, there would be no such power without fresh statutory authority. I admit the difficulty which arises on the ground that the County Councils are, as I think, unfortunately so limited in the scope of their powers, and that they cannot at present employ the money for any other purposes except the relief of rates and technical education. In that sense I should be disposed not very much to object to what the right hon. Gentleman suggested, that the words should be put in, and that statutory powers should be given in future, because, as the necessity arises, it would be possible to extend the powers of County Councils in order that they might make the best of this money. With respect to the Town Councils, this money might be given to them absolutely without restriction, but, in any case, both Town and County Councils at present have the power to devote this money if they please to technical education, and, as I said, if fresh statutory powers are required it would be in our option to give them. If that is the sense in which the right hon. Gentleman made the proposal, for my part, I do not see any great danger in the insertion of those words to which he has referred. If his proposal as to a Committee is fulfilled, and if wider powers are given to the Town Councils and County Councils in the application of their money—if these two objects are carried out effectively, I think the right hon. Gentleman will have done much to ease the passing of this Bill, and to make the measure useful and beneficial to Scotland. I should like to ask one question with regard to this Committee. My hon. Friend the Member for Lanarkshire (Mr. Crawford) mentioned one special Instruction which might be given to this Committee—namely, that they should have power to inquire into the advisableness of setting up County Committees for secondary education after the Welsh pattern. I think most of us are agreed on this side of the House that that would be an excellent example to follow. Although the two cases are not actually similar, they are at least analogous, and my hon. Friend mentioned that the success of the Welsh system and its theoretical perfectness recommended it as an example which might be followed, and it would in any case be a useful thing if it were admitted to be part of the duty of the Committee to be appointed to inquire whether such a system could be beneficially applied to Scotland.

Mr. Campbell-Bannerman

(10.48.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My right hon. Friend has asked me a question which I hasten to answer. He is probably aware that the conditions in Scotland and Wales are different, and that the existence of compulsory School Boards in Scotland differentiates the two cases in a very important sense. He is also probably aware that there might be a great deal of friction, and a great deal of difficulty in establishing a County Education Authority whose administrative powers would cross the administrative powers of the School Boards on certain important particulars. This might involve very serious friction between two popularly elected Bodies who represented different areas and different systems. But I agree with the right hon. Gentleman that the case of Wales is one which cannot be ignored; it is the only case, so far as I know, in which secondary education has been handed over to any Bodies at all of the kind suggested. Therefore, we have gained in Wales a kind of experience which the Committee would no doubt think it their duty to examine, and I certainly think they should be permitted or instructed to make that inquiry.

(10.49.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): Does the First Lord of the Treasury contemplate extending the powers of the County Councils to enable them to spend money for all purposes for which the Town Councils can spend money?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: All statutory powers, certainly.

MR. PARKER SMITH: At the present time both the County Councils and Town Councils can spend money for technical education. Would the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to consent to statutory powers so that they might, if they pleased, spend the money for the purposes of secondary education?

MR. HUNTER: There is one point which I should like the First Lord of the Treasury to explain. I think it would meet the views of Members on both sides of the House, and you would still retain the power of applying the money to the relief of the rates, if you were to give this money to the Common Good. That would enable us to do all that we can desire, which the statutory limits would not do.

(10.51.) MR. DUFF (Banffshire): In reference to what fell from the hon. Member for Aberdeen, there is one point which has not been specially referred to before. My hon. Friend has an Amendment on the Paper which, if adopted, would give the County Councils complete power to apply this money for any purpose. In many cases, especially on the east coast, there is a desire on the part of County Councils to expend the money on harbours. At present, while the larger harbours have power to levy rates the smaller ones have not that power. Several of us tried to get them that power when the Local Government Bill was passing through the House; but we did not succeed. The result of the right hon. Gentleman's proposal would be that the larger harbours could be assisted by the County Councils, while the smaller ones could not. The First Lord of the Treasury must be well aware of the condition of many of the harbours on the east coast of Scotland, and I am quite certain that the fishermen have his sympathy, and there would be great disappointment amongst them if the County Councils are not able to help the smaller harbours. As the County Councils are the creation of the present Government I think the right hon. Gentleman should have faith in them, and my hon. Friend reminds me that the money might be spent with the sanction of the Secretary for Scotland. The compromise proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would exclude assistance to those who are most in need of it.

*MR. MUNRO-FERGUSON: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will be able to give the names of the Departmental Committee, and the instructions that will be given to them, before the Report stage? If he can do that I do not see any objection to allowing the Bill to pass.

*(10.55.) MR. C. S. PARKER: I am decidedly in favour of this compromise, not only as a means of tiding over the position, but on its own merits, and I am sorry my right hon. Friend does not see the merits so well as we on this side see them. I associate myself with all that he has said in praise of the head of the Scotch Education Department, but after all he is only one man, and I am sure a better result would be obtained if there were others in consultation with him. This Memorandum, which embodies the scheme of the Government, and the copious criticism which has come, and is still coming, from School Boards and from the masters of secondary schools, should be carefully considered together. There are several points in the Memorandum on which the Department has modified its opinion: for instance, the minimum fee is fixed too low. Then in regard to the Local Authority, the question is whether the Welsh example of education committees might not be followed, instead of the Department's idea of grouping the School Boards. The Memorandum and the information from those best acquainted with the matter afford ample material for the consideration of the Department, and I presume the result of the Departmental Committee's deliberations will be submitted to the Committee of the Privy Council. I think the plan is a very good one.

(11.0.) MR. ASHER (Elgin, &c.): I fully recognise in the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman a desire to conciliate Scotch Members on this side. The point to which I wish to direct attention is the bearing of the Commission on the interests of the burghs. I understood that the right hon. Gentleman proposed an extension of power in the Bill to enable Local Bodies to apply this money not only to the relief of the rates, but for any other service for which they have statutory power. That is quite intelligible, so far as County Councils are concerned; but as regards the Royal Burghs that is a concession nominal rather than real, as it is evident that in addition to rates, and technical and secondary education, there are few additional purposes to which the Town Councils would be able to apply the money if the proposed alterations were made. I would point out that the Town Councils have different powers in the disposal of the Common Good in which they are not restrained by Statute, but can dispose of it according to their discretion. I would suggest that with regard to this money the Town Councils have freer hands, to the extent that they might frame schemes for the application of the money, which should require the sanction of the Secretary of Scotland before becoming effective. This money has to be disposed of largely in accordance with local requirements. Many burghs and counties will most gladly dispose of it in aid of harbours rather than in relief of the rates; and I would suggest that the Bill be so extended as to give power to expend the money in accordance with schemes framed by the Local Authority and sanctioned by the Secretary for Scotland.

DR. CLARK: Will the right hon. Gentleman permit the Commission to consider the question of intermediate and secondary education, or rather to take a wider view of secondary education than that in the Bill?

(11.2.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I would venture respectfully to warn the Committee against trying to do too much in the matter, or to press too far in the direction in which we have arrived at a certain point. The hon. Gentleman suggests that the Departmental Committee should consider the requirements of technical education as well as secondary education. After all, what we require is that there should be a Minute framed for dealing with this £60,000 a year; therefore, I do not think it would be advisable or convenient that the whole question of education of every sort, other than University and primary education, should, as it were, be thrown into the melting pot and poured out into some new mould by this Departmental Committee. I think by increasing their functions unduly you diminish their utility. As regards what fell from the hon. Member for the Elgin Burghs (Mr. Asher), the hon. Member for Banff (Mr. Duff), and one other speaker, who have all pleaded that the extension which I offered to give should be yet further extended with regard to allowing burghs to spend their money, I may say I do not think we should make this grant part of the Common Good; that gives absolute licence to local authorities to spend it as they like, even on turtle soup and champagne, though I do not think Scotch Local Authorities are at all likely to deal with this money in that way. Still, I do not think it is our business to use the taxpayers' money for such possible purposes. If it is understood that no demands are to be made for the extension of County Council powers beyond those which they have at present, and beyond those which we may expressly from time to time confer on them, I do not know that there is any special objection, with proper safeguards, to the money being spent on harbours and other schemes sanctioned by the Secretary for Scotland. But I hope I shall not, if I make that concession, be met by further demands and asked for a further extension. I hope I have shown an ample share of the spirit of conciliation, and that we shall now be allowed to get through the Bill.

MR. PARKER SMITH: Will the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Committee could apply this money to the purposes of secondary education?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not consider that secondary education would fall within the limits of this part of the Bill, and I do not think it would do to allow the Committee to deal with this money for secondary education.

(11.6.) MR. ARTHUR H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that I hope he will not exclude altogether the consideration of the other subject from the investigation of the Committee, because our experience in Wales, to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded, has been that the two subjects are so closely allied together that they can hardly be disconnected. The whole of the money allowed for the use of education is being applied for secondary education, with the view ultimately of weaving technical education into it; and in England our experience is just in the opposite direction. I think the circumstances show that it is not desirable to exclude altogether technical education from the purview of this Bill.

(11.7.) MR. ESSLEMONT: I should like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman contemplates that this Departmental Committee should have under its purview the question of evening schools, especially in rural districts, where no secondary education at present exists.

(11.8.) MR. BARCLAY: As I have had some Amendments on the Paper proposing to amend the administration of the grant, perhaps I may be allowed to say that I think there would be much greater difficulty in dealing with secondary education in the counties than in the burghs; and I hope the attention of the Committee will be specially directed so as to make secondary education available for rural parishes, where at present a difficulty in obtaining secondary education now exists.

(11.9.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I think the right hon. Gentleman has shown every disposition to meet us, with regard to the questions which have been too much talked of, by a modification of the words in the latter part of this clause; and I feel satisfied from what he has said that he does desire to give in the most convenient and safe way the largest powers that can be reasonably given to County Councils and Town Councils, with whatever restrictions it may be necessary to impose for protection owing to their statutory powers. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that I think it would save time if he gave his assent to a Motion to report Progress, in order that the necessary words might be put down upon the Paper by the Government; and then I think I shall have authority to say, on the part of my hon. Friends, that there will be little difficulty in the safe passage of the Bill through Committee. Although there may be considerable discussion on some other points, there is no reason to doubt that the Committee stage of the Bill will go through the House to-morrow.

(11.10.) MR. DUFF: I think the First Lord of the Treasury has met us in a very conciliatory spirit. There is one point to which I should like to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention, and it is simply this: the Amendment to Clause 5 to be proposed by the hon. Member for Aberdeen would, to a certain extent, meet my case; but, as the words of the clause stand at present, they would not meet my case. I want to bring under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman one case; it is the case of my own county, Banffshire. The Harbour Authorities have no legal power to levy rates, but they levy voluntary rates. As the Bill stands at present, it would be quite out of the power of the County Council to give anything towards those harbours which have a voluntary rate. On the other hand, if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Aberdeen were carried, it would meet my case, because it would have the effect of placing harbours, that have legal powers for levying rates and harbours that levy voluntary rates in the same position. I hope that point will not escape the attention of the right hon. Gentleman.

(11.11.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought I had already explained to the hon. Gentleman that provision for such a public work as a harbour is already made in the Bill. I take note of what fell from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs, that if the Committee should now adjourn, speaking on behalf of his friends, he has every reason to believe that the Committee stage of the Bill might be finished to-morrow. I propose, therefore, to assent to the Motion for Adjournment on that understanding. But, before I do so, it might, perhaps, be convenient that we should divide upon the present Amendment, because my hon. Friend behind me assures me that he must take a Division upon it, and, although I shall go into a different Lobby from that which he will go into himself, I think we ought to gratify him to-night before we break off.

(11.13.) DR. CAMERON: I think the House should not take a Division, because, so far as I am concerned, I consider the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman as extremely satisfactory. I explained my views with regard to the provisions of this Bill. I desire to see as much as possible of this money go to the relief of local burdens, because I wish to have an end put to this eternal seesaw which gives rise to fresh equivalents and fresh claims. The right hon. Gentleman now proposes to take a step which I think will lead to this £60,000 being well expended. I regard it as part of the compromise that so much of this money should be devoted to secondary education, so much to the Universities, so much to the Parochial Boards, and so much to the County Councils. It seems to me that we should have a very one-sided compromise, if we were going to have all the compromising in one direction.

*(11.14.) MR. HOZIER: Do I understand that the hon. Members who propose to increase the grant for secondary education are not going to move their Amendments? ("No!") If that be so, I shall withdraw my Amendment. Does the hon. Member for Aberdeen intend to withdraw his Amendment for increasing the grant for secondary education or not? ("No.") Certainly not? Then I beg to press my Amendment to a decision.

Question put, and agreed to.

(11.17.) MR. BRYCE: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will put down the Amendments which he proposes, so that when we meet at two o'clock to-morrow we may see them and have some little time to consider them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall do my best to carry out the very reasonable wish of the hon. Gentleman.

(11.18.) DR. TANNER: About this reporting Progress. During the course of the evening we have been told by many of our Scotch Friends that the whole time of the House would be taken up discussing the provisions of this Bill till twelve o'clock to-night; and there are certain other contentious measures awaiting discussion which are bound to meet with substantial opposition. I would therefore recommend our Scottish Friends, who happen to be here in such force this evening, to go on with their business instead of postponing the discussion of this Bill and taking up the nice bait offered to them by the First Lord of the Treasury. I do hope that, instead of postponing the discussion (cries of "Divide!") and pursuing a policy of procrastination, the Members from Scotland will attend to their business and carry on this Debate until the hour of twelve o'clock, when no other Public Business can be proceeded with. I do hope a sensible view will be taken by hon. Members sitting above the Gangway on this side, and by hon. Members on that side of the House. I take this opportunity of opposing the Motion that you report Progress.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

SUPERANNUATION ACTS AMENDMENT (No. 2.) BILL.—(No. 275.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(11.25.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill I shall have to explain to the House that it is not a General Superannuation Bill. It is a proposal to do away with two distinct difficulties which have arisen in the administration of the Acts. There are many branches of the Public Service which are regulated by special, distinct Acts. They provide for pensions on retirement through sickness or long service to officers of those Departments, but no provision is made in the case of a transfer from one branch of the Public Service to another, and it thus happens that in the transfer from one branch to another the individual may lose the whole right to the pension which has accrued in consequence of his earlier service. Therefore, when he comes to retire, in consequence of sickness or age, the Treasury is unable to include, in estimating the amount of his pension, the earlier service which has been performed by him in another branch of the Service. That is one matter which is dealt with in this Bill. The other is an extension of the 6th section of the Act of 1887. That section provides that rules should be made as to the conditions under which military and naval officers drawing non-effective pay may be employed in the Civil branch of the Public Service. This Bill enables similar rules to be made as to the officers drawing Indian non-effective pay—that is non-effective pay from Indian, and not from Imperial, funds. Those are the only two points in the Bill, and I hope the House will read it a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir J. Gorst.)

*(11.38.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will allow the Second Reading of this Bill to be postponed, because it was not at all expected that it would come on to-night. I understand from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton that the Bill is altogether opposed to the recommendations of the Royal Commission that sat on this matter, and that, therefore, it is objectionable. Unless the right hon. Gentleman consents to postpone the Bill in order to give the Member for Wolverhampton an opportunity of discussing it, I shall have to go into its merits now. So far as I am personally concerned, I object to this Bill, because I object to pensions altogether. There is no doubt at all that the time is coming when this question of pensions will have to be considered not only by Parliament, but by all other authorities in the country, because, if you are going to pension one class of men, you will have presently to pension all your servants, whether they are working men or not. Therefore, before we go on increasing the pensions of a particular class, the country ought to have an opportunity of considering the whole question. I believe our system of pensions, as well as doing harm to the taxpayers, does great harm to the officials and servants, as it teaches them to be improvident and prevents them saving when they have the opportunity. The right hon. Gentleman who moved the Second Reading of this Bill has given us very little explanation, if any at all. He has not told us, so far as I can understand, why this Bill is to be passed, or why it has not been passed before if it is necessary. Probably it is that there are some favourites of the Government for whom arrangements are being made by this Bill. That it is not an unusual thing. I have known within my own recollection Acts of Parliament passed almost purposely to give pensions to particular individuals, and this appears to be a Bill for the purpose of increasing the pensions of certain individuals. No one thought the Bill would come on to-night, and I know it is the wish of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) that it should be postponed; but the Secretary to the Treasury seems determined to push the Bill through. I understand from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton that those who are interested in this matter desire to follow the recommendations of the Royal Commission as a whole, and not to deal with the question piecemeal in this way. I think I am justified in opposing the Bill until the House has the whole question before it. What on earth is the good of appointing a Royal Commission and going to the trouble and expense of an inquiry if we do not make use of the work of the Commission? As I understand, the recommendations of the Commission are utterly ignored, and I must say I think we want some better evidence than we have had to-night before we rashly pass the Second Reading of this Bill. I know, unfortunately, that at times Bills of this nature, unexplained and not understood by the bulk of Members, have been allowed to pass at a late hour; and subsequently, when attention has been called to them, our constituents have complained of our allowing such Bills to be rushed through without discussion. I do not wish to waste time. I suggest that we should at once postpone the Bill, and proceed with other business to which the same objection does not arise; but that proposition is refused. I will not myself take up more time, but I trust that other Members will take this opportunity of letting the right hon. Gentleman know their opinions respecting the Bill itself, and respecting this unfortunate attempt to push it through at a late hour, when there can be no discussion, and when it was not anticipated that the Bill would be taken. I have to confess that I do not properly understand this Bill; and, though that confession may raise a laugh, let me observe that the right hon. Gentleman has not given us an explanation, and the only fact I gather from the Bill itself is that it is a proposal to take more money from the taxpayers. I think it would be only right that some deference should be paid to the wish of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton—who was a Member of the Royal Commission that reported in 1888—that the Bill should be postponed.

SIR J. GORST: I may be allowed to remark, upon these references of the hon. Member, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton has been in the House this evening, and that neither to-night nor at any time has the right hon. Gentleman expressed any desire that the Bill should be postponed. Had he expressed such a desire I should have been quite willing to accede to it.

*MR. MORTON: I can at once settle that point. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton requested me to ask the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill to agree to postpone it, so I may take the right hon. Gentleman's own words and expect it will be postponed. I say distinctly the right hon. Gentleman desired me, if the Bill came on at a late hour, to ask that it should be postponed, so that we may have a proper opportunity of hearing all about it. Therefore I claim, on the Secretary of the Treasury's own words, that the Bill shall be now deferred.

Mr. Morton

*(11.45.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I do not at all wonder that many Members on this side of the House are inclined to view with some suspicion the bringing forward of a Bill like this at such an hour. I may instance a case that occurred only a few nights ago, when the Government brought forward another mysterious Bill called the Accumulations Bill, and it turned out upon examination that the Bill was introduced for no other purpose than that of relieving the finances of certain individuals belonging to this and the other House. Under the circumstances, and as the Bill deals with pensions, I feel impelled myself to attach some sort of suspicion to the proceeding when the Government move the Second Reading at this hour of the night. The right hon. Gentleman in charge has certainly discussed one or two provisions of the Bill to which no objection can be taken, For instance, he has told us that under certain Acts of Parliament public servants, if they change their offices, lose the pension which would attach to the offices they formerly filled, and I do not suppose that any Member on either side of the House will raise any objection to such a just provision of the Bill, which merely provides for the pension being calculated on the continuous service. The right hon. Gentleman said, or so I understood him, that there will be a certain amount of relief to the taxpayers of the country, inasmuch as services of certain officers drawing non-effective pay will be utilised in employment for the State. I have not had time to read the Acts referred to, but, anyhow, I do not object to that provision. Then I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say, or imply, that in his speech he had exhausted the provisions of the Bill. But, so far as I could gather, he did not even touch in a sentence that part of the Bill which appears to me—I speak under all correction, not having thoroughly examined the subject—to be a matter of major importance. I mean Sub-section 2 of the first clause, wherein it is provided that there shall be rules—

“For reckoning services according to the rules under the Superannuation Acts, 1834 to 1837, and for granting the same superannuation allowance or gratuity to any person as might have been granted to him if his whole service had been in the public office from which he ultimately retires.”

Now, this Bill is especially framed to extend to India, and we all know that offices are held there by public servants, some of whose salaries for the time are enormous. I am not going to say whether these salaries are, in my judgment, too high or not, but there is no question about it that some appointments of enormous profit are held under the Government of India. Now, the right hon. Gentleman, so far as I could gather, did not give the least hint as to how this Sub-section 2 would apply with regard to the higher offices held for short periods by Members of the Government of India Service. For example—

SIR J. GORST: It does not apply at all.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: The right hon. Gentleman says it does not apply at all, and, of course, if he says that, I must accept his statement. But I read the heading of the Bill, and find that the Bill is described as to which, I fancy, may be otherwise called pensions—

“Amend the Acts relating to Superannuation Allowances and Gratuities to persons in the Public Service”—

“so far as respects the computation of successive service in different offices where not all subject to the Superannuation Acts.”

And then it goes on to say—

“And as respects the application of Section 6 of the Superannuation Act, 1837, to employments of profit under the Government of India.”

I have not recently read the Superannuation Act, 1837, and it is possible that it does not embrace these high offices. If I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that, I will accept his statement, and say no more on that subject. I desire to condense what I have to say, and I ask him specifically—will he kindly say whether or no, or to what extent, if any, this Sub-section 2 will affect, for example, pensions, gratuities and allowances which will be received on retirement by Indian officers of high standing, say, by Lord Roberts, now Commander-in-Chief in India?

SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Member desires an answer, I may say at once the Bill does not in any way affect any pensions payable from the Revenues of India. It will only affect such pensions as are payable out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom.

*MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: Then I may ask in what respect the financial part of the Bill applies to India? In the Definition Clause (3) the Revenues of India are distinctly mentioned, and reference is made to the grant of a superannuation allowance or gratuity, the remuneration of which may be paid out of—

“(a) the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom: or (b) moneys provided by Parliament, or dealt with as appropriations in aid, or (c) the Revenue of India”— and so forth.

MR. MORTON: May I also ask what is meant by the words at the end of Clause 1, “Provided that in cases affecting the Revenue of India, the Secretary of State in Council of India shall determine the amount to be paid therefrom”?

*SIR J. GORST: Those questions are reserved for the Secretary of State in Council only, on points affecting the Revenues of India. As I have said, the Bill does not apply to officers whose entire service has been under the Indian Government, but only to those whose service has been divided between the Indian and Imperial Governments, and who are pensionable from the Revenues of the United Kingdom. The rules under Section 6 of the Superannuation Act of 1887 relate to officers retired from the Army and Navy who are employed in the Civil Service of the United Kingdom, and the object is to enable the Treasury to make rules respecting the retirement of those officers.

MR. MORTON: But how about sub-section 3 of Clause 1?

(11.55.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I object on principle, and as an Irishman, to this Bill. How comes it to pass that this responsible Government is trying in this shame-faced way to buy the services of men who have behaved so shamefully in the Public Service in my native land? The Government are evidently trying on a fin de siècle boom; if the House will pardon a popular allusion, the Government are trying by this Bill to pay the men who have done dirty work for them in Ireland. The Bill is to buy off men of the Colonel Caddell type, and so I challenge the Bill, and I sincerely trust that every Irish Member in the House will join me in condemning this attempt. This is not merely a question of pensions, it is a question of rewarding unworthy men for actions unworthy of the Public Service, and awarding still further pensions to the richer pensioned classes. The Government adhere to the old Tory principle of rewarding the rich. They had a premonition yesterday in Hyde Park of the verdict they will receive at the General Election near at hand. The Bill, I say, is for paying the instruments of injustice in our native land. As a matter of fact, every sensible man in the House is against the system of pensions. Let the State pay its servants according to the value of services rendered, a sufficiency to enable them to make provision for themselves and families for old age and failing powers. This Bill is to enable the Government to select chosen individuals whose actions may have pleased the Government of the day, men such as Colonel Caddell and others, who fill the office of Removable Magistrates in Ireland, men brought from the Army and Navy, men who as my hon. Friend says have received large salaries in India.

It being midnight, MR. SPEAKER proceeded to interrupt the Business.

Whereupon Sir J. GORST rose in his place, and claimed to move “That the Question be now put.”

MR. SPEAKER: The Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill has only been discussed for half an hour, but having regard to the manner in which the opposition has been conducted, I feel justified in putting the Question.

Question put, “That the Question be now put.”

(12.0.) The House divided:—Ayes 142: Noes 65.—(Div. List, No. 98.)

Question put accordingly, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

(12.15.) The House divided:—Ayes 149: Noes 51.—(Div. List, No. 99.)

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow at Two of the clock.

WITNESSES (ROYAL COMMISSIONS AND PARLIAMENT) PROTECTION
BILL.—(No. 287.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.25.) MR. YERBURGH (Chester): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill I may mention that an understanding has been arrived at with the hon. and learned Member for Hackney (Sir Charles Russell) by which with the assent of the Government if the House will give a Second Reading to this Bill and to the Bill introduced by the hon. and learned Member, the two Bills shall be referred to a Select Committee. I do not think it is necessary for me to trouble the House with any detailed reference to the provisions of the Bill. As the House knows it arises out of recent proceedings upon a breach of privilege, and the firm conviction in the minds of myself and my friends that distrust has been aroused among the working classes as to the power of Parliament to protect those who give evidence in a Parliamentary inquiry.

Motion made, and Question proposed
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Yerburgh.)

(12.26.) DR. TANNER: This Bill,
I understand, is the issue of the proceedings arising out of the wrongful dismissal of the man Hood, who gave evidence before a Committee, and was, for so doing, dismissed from his employment by an hon.
Gentleman, a member of the Conservative Party, and other Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company, and for which the hon. Gentleman and his co-Directors incurred most severe censure from the Chair.

(12.27.) MR. MORTON: I do not rise to make any objection; but I think it should be clearly understood that the Bill of the hon. Member for Hackney (Sir C. Russell) dealing with the same subject should also receive a Second Reading, otherwise we may find ourselves jockeyed after passing this Bill.

(12.28.) MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): Before the Bill proceeds further, and not now objecting to the Second Reading, I think it is only right to say that very careful consideration must be given to Sub-section 1 of Clause 1 and the language therein used. The words are, any person who "dissuades, hinders, or intimidates," &c. These words are, I think, altogether too broad, because they would include people who legitimately object, or probably would object, to the inquiry by a Commission. I remember, in 1874, when the Conservative Party were in power, they proposed and constituted a Commission for the purpose of inquiring into questions which we, the organised Trade Unions considered had been inquired into and debated quite sufficiently, and we objected on reasonable and quite sufficient grounds to giving evidence or taking any part in the proceedings of the Commission. With the Bill in force leaders of Trade Unions, if they so acted now, would be liable to the penalties under the Bill. I do hope, if the Second Reading is now agreed to, care will be taken at a future stage to carefully consider the language of Clause 1, so that the Bill may not really do more injury than it will do good.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMEND-MENT BILL.—(No. 229.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.30.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I hope the House will now allow this Bill to be read a second time. The promoters of the Bill have come to an arrangement with the shipowners' representatives by which we have agreed to leave out all reference to the examination of papers, and to amend the second clause in reference to the inspection of provisions. If the House will permit, I propose to insert the Amendments in Committee pro forma, and then, when the Bill has been reported, to move its re-committal.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Howell.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I understand it is to be committed pro forma?

MR. HOWELL: Yes, this day at two.

SALMON AND FRESHWATER FISHERIES BILL—(No. 258.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I hope the House will agree to give this Bill a Second Reading. The object is to supplement the existing Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Acts by providing a means of identifying packages containing salmon, trout, or char which may be transmitted from place to place during the period in which the sale or possession of such fish is already, with certain exceptions, illegal. The Bill has the support of the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire (Mr. Marjoribanks), and others interested in fishery questions.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir E. Birkbeck.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

COMMISSIONERS CLAUSES ACT (1847) AMENDMENT BILL—(No. 216.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DILLWYN (Swansea, Town): I hope the House will allow this Bill to be read a second time now. Its object is simply to allow the elections for Commissioners, Trustees, and cognate bodies to be conducted by the ballot instead of by open voting. I do not know that there is any objection to the principle.

Objection taken.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday.

ACCESS TO MOUNTAINS (SCOTLAND) BILL—(No. 213.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Seeing that the House unanimously passed the Resolution upon which this Bill is founded, may I suggest that the Second Reading should be taken and the Bill referred to a Select Committee in the same fashion as was adopted just now with the Parliamentary Witnesses Bill?

Objection taken.

Second Reading deferred till Wednesday.

NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).—RETURN.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to move the Motion for the Return standing in my name.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): I am afraid I cannot consent to this without some further consideration. The preparation of the Return will be very expensive. Perhaps the hon. Member will give me a day or two to look into the matter?

MR. SEXTON: This is a somewhat strange proceeding. The Return is in relation to the National Education of Ireland; it concerns the Department of the Chief Secretary, and he, the Minister responsible, has stated that he has no objection to the Return. I am extremely surprised at the right hon. Gentleman's interposition now.

SIR J. GORST: I did not understand that my right hon. Friend had no objection to the Return. At any rate, I cannot let the Motion pass without some further converse with him.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman distinctly stated that he would raise no objection, but he observed that the Return would take a long time to prepare, and probably would not be ready in time for the discussion of the Education Bill. But he certainly said he had no objection to giving the Return. I certainly think the organisation on the Treasury Bench must be defective when the Secretary refuses what a Minister has accepted. I will renew my Motion to-day.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES LAW CONSOLIDATION BILL.

Select Committee on Public Libraries Law Consolidation Bill nominated of—Sir John Lubbock, Mr. Bartley, Mr. Crilly, Mr. Loder, Mr. Lyell, Mr. Noble, Mr. Paulton, Sir William Plowden, Mr. Powell, Mr. Summers and Mr. Wootton Isaacson.

Ordered, That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records.

Ordered, That Five be the quorum.—(Mr. Akers-Douglas.)

SHORT TITLES BILL [Lords].

As amended, considered; to be read the third time To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

MOTIONS.

CIVIL BILL COURTS (IRELAND) BILL.

On Motion of The Attorney General for Ireland, Bill to amend the Laws relating to Civil Courts in Ireland, ordered to be brought in by The Attorney General for Ireland and Mr. Jackson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 313.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Cambridge): I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call your attention to a small matter affecting myself, partly in the nature of a personal explanation, having relation to Division List 91 in the proceedings of Thursday last. A question was put that the Clergy Discipline Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law, and Mr. Courtney, acting as Deputy Speaker in your unavoidable absence, directed that the Members who challenged a Division should stand up in their places. The record stands in the Votes thus:—

"The House proceeded to a Division, and Mr. Deputy Speaker stated he thought the Ayes had it, and on his decision being challenged, it appeared to him that the Division was frivolously claimed; and he directed the Noes to stand up in their places, and Fourteen Members having stood up, Mr. Deputy Speaker declared that the Ayes had it."

To my great astonishment, when I looked at the Division List, I found my name at the head of the list of Members voting "No." Mr. Speaker, I was sitting in my place the whole time, and took no part in the Division, and I desire that my name may be struck out of the List. I should not have called attention to the mistake in this manner—it is a mistake for which I do not blame anyone—but for the fact that it may render me liable to the charge of obstructing a measure I have been asked to support by my constituents, and which, in their interest, I promised to support. May I also, Sir, venture to offer a humble suggestion that when Members are asked to stand up in their places it might be as well that the names should be read over before the List is passed in order that mistakes may not occur?

MR. SPEAKER: I will take care that the remarks of the hon. Member have attention. I understand that the hon. Member desires that his name should be struck out. The correction shall be made.

MR. CONYBEARE: Yes, Sir, I supported the Bill in two other Divisions.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, who just now interfered to prevent the granting of a Return in which his Department is not concerned, whether and when he intends to fulfil the promise he gave in reference to a matter in which his Department is concerned—namely, to lay before the House Papers in explanation of the Treasury fiasco in reference to the Irish Teachers' Pension Fund?

SIR J. GORST: I recognise the courtesy of the hon. Member's reference to myself. The Papers will be presented as soon as the Committee have furnished their Report. As to the Return, I may explain to the hon. Member that I do not wish at all to stop it if it is desired by the Government of Ireland, but the hon. Gentleman should be aware that the preparation of this Return involves considerable expenditure which it is necessary the Treasury should sanction before it is incurred.

MR. SEXTON: It is, I believe, in accordance with the usual custom to assume that a Return will be granted when not opposed by the head of the Department concerned.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): In reference to the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Camborne just now, I hope it will receive favourable consideration, because this is not the first time a mistake of the kind has occurred.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Will the right hon. Gentleman, who takes such an unusual interest in matters of Irish administration, give us some explanation of, and say if anything has been done to remove, the deadlock between the Post Office and the Treasury, which prevents the citizens of Cork from having that improvement in their postal service they have every right to claim? A small sum of £3,000 is required for the purpose of giving us an accelerated service on the Great Southern and Western Railway. The Postmaster General admits the justice of the claim, but the Treasury blocks the way. Can the right hon. Gentleman say if anything is being done to remove this deadlock?

Mr. Sexton

SIR J. GORST: The hon. Member will be glad to learn that there is no deadlock between the Post Office and the Treasury. Nothing has been done, and nothing is likely to be done. The Departments are in a perfect state of harmony.

DR. TANNER: I will refer to the subject in Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

[INDEX.]

INDEX

TO

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

AUTHORISED EDITION.

VOLUME III. FOURTH SERIES

BEING THE
THIRD VOLUME OF SESSION 1892.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

Bills, Read 1^a, 1^o, 2^a, 2^o, 3^a, 3^o, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.
1R., 2R., 3R. Speech delivered on First, Second, or Third Reading.
Adj. Adjourned.
A. Answers.
Cols. Colonies.
c. Commons.
Com. Committee.
com. Committed.

Dept. Department.
Intro. Introduced.
L. Lords.
Obs. Observations.
Pres. Presented.
Q. Questions.
Re-com. Re-committed.
Rep. Reported.
R.P. Report Progress.
Reso. Resolution.

The subjects of Debate, as far as possible, are classified under General Headings:—e.g.,
ARMY—BOARD OF AGRICULTURE—BOARD OF TRADE—COLONIES—EDUCATION—FOREIGN AFFAIRS—INDIA—IRELAND—NAVY—PARLIAMENT—POST OFFICE—SCOTLAND, &c.

ABERDEEN, EARL OF (Viscount Gordon)
Labourers (Ireland) Allotments Bill, 530

Abolition of School Fees, 825

Access to Mountains (Scotland) Bill
[c. No. 213]
2R. deferred, 1222
Again deferred, 1530
Again deferred, 1864

Access to State Papers, 554

Accidents and Railway Brakes, 870
VOL. III. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Accumulations Bill [c. No. 277].
Intro. Sir R. Webster; Read 1^o, 1227
Debated 1737; Read 2^o, 1743

Achill Viaduct, County Mayo
Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Sir H. Maxwell, 679

ACLAND, Mr. Arthur H. Dyke, York,
W.R., Rotherham
Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 400, 1850
Maltby Telegraph Office, 982
Secondary Education (England) Bill, 1084
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 725

Administration of Small Estates in Chancery, 1225

ADMIRALTY (see NAVY)

First Lord—Lord George Hamilton
Civil Lord—Mr. E. Ashmead-Bartlett
Secretary—Mr. A. B. Forwood

Adulteration of Butter, 1569, 1772

ADVOCATE, Lord (see PEARSON, Sir C. J.)

AFRICA

Bechuanaland Border Police, 1651
Benin, Postage from, 1561
Gambia, Fighting at Toniatoba, 1779
Gold Coast, 1109, 1764
Lagos, 24, 838
Loanda, 18
Major Festing's Mission, 1235
Mombasa Railway, 1768
Niger, French Protectorate, 1109
Oil Rivers Territory, 1750
Sahmadoo and Sierra Leone, 1108
Tambi, Repulse at, 696
Tolcar and Red Sea Littoral, 857
Uganda, 1570, 1768
Usibepu and Zululand, 1559, 1560

Agents, Parliamentary, 369

Agricultural Banks in India
Q. Mr. S. Smith, A. Mr. Curzon, 1766

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT (see BOARD of AGRICULTURE)

Agricultural Holdings (see Small Agricultural Holdings)

AINSLIE, Mr. W. G., Lancashire, N. Lonsdale
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 727

AKERS-DOUGLAS, Right Hon. A. (see DOUGLAS)

Alkali, &c. Works Bill [c. No. 264]
Intro. Mr. Ritchie; Read 1^o, 965

Allotments Act, 1887
Q. Mr. Cobb, A. Mr. Ritchie, 35; Q. Mr. Channing, A. Mr. Ritchie, 368

Allotments in Scotland
Q. Mr. Esselmont, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1125

Allotments Provisional Order Bill [c. No. 808]
Intro. Mr. Long; Read 1^o, 1746

Allotments, Sale of, 148

Alnamy Sammory (see Sahmadoo), 1108

AMBROSE, Mr. W., Middlesex, Harrow
Septennial Act, 1055

AMERICA, UNITED STATES OF

Arbitration Treaties, 688
Behring Sea Difficulty, 1, 155, 1901
Chicago Exhibition, 42, 696, 880, 1125

American Mails

Q. Mr. Leng, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 335
(See also 685)

Anarchists

Continental Expulsion, 681
Newspaper Attacks, 1251
Sentences on, 1108, 1251

Annual Trade Returns, 864

Annuity System of Loan Repayments,
44, 592

Arbitration Treaties

Q. Mr. Labouchere, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 688

Arklow Open-Air Preaching, 362

Armagh District Asylum Architect
Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Madden, 574

Armenians and Kurdish Cavalry, 28

ARMY (see WAR OFFICE)

Army Guns Return, 1228
Army (Officers Service) Return, 189
Army Pay Department, 842
Army Science Examinations, 824
Ballincollig Powder Mills, 84, 85, 1656
Black, Thomas, Services of, 870
Clothing Factory, 168
Commands, Extension of, 873
Cordite Powder, 1234, 1388
Crimean, &c., Veterans' Pensions, 151
Depôt Officers' Pay, &c., 21, 163
Dornoch Volunteer Company, 360
Dublin Barracks Bill, 1384
Enfield Factory—Discharges, 154, 1100;
Superannuations, 154; Wages, 1100, 1239;
Sword Contracts, 1646
Enniskillen Headquarters, 579, 867
Essex Regiment (Pompadoours), 1251
Fever, St. John's Wood Barracks, 339
Flinn, Thomas, V.C., 466
Gibraltar Tunnelling, 1579
Glenbeigh Artillery Range, 1119
Gratuities to Workmen, 872

[cont.]

ARMY—cont.

- Henry Barrel Co. Carbines*, 1101
- Highland Regiments Clothing*, 13
- Infantry Drill Book*, 352
- Lewis Militiamen*, 1575
- London Small Arms Company—Lee-Metford Rifles*, 1102; Sub-Contracts, 1102
- Malta Militia Regiment*, 3
- Medical Officers of Volunteers*, 567
- Mess and Band Funds*, 1088
- Military Cadets Character Certificates*, 20, 471
- Military Lands Consolidation Bill*, 182, 183, 186, 163
- Militia Subalterns' Examinations*, 865
- Naval Artillery Volunteers*, 330
- Regimental Stores Supply*, 12
- Rifle Brigade Drafts*, 1770
- Rifle Ranges—New Forest*, 1772; Salisbury Plain, 1237
- Scattery Island, Shannon Defence*, 486, 867
- Shamrock Wearing*, 14, 15, 153, 367, 553, 832
- Soldiers at Political Meetings*, 974
- Target Practice Seawards*, 164, 555, 556
- Tidal Waters, Bye-Laws*, 857
- Volunteers—Jury Service*, 1646; Regimental Debts, 12
- Wantage Committee Proposals*, 1573
- Waste Work Stoppages*, 1101
- Wearing Emblems*, 553
- Yellow Fever on "Atlas"*, 482

Army and Navy Expenditure

Returns ordered for 1891-2, 1892-3, 1082

ASHER, Mr. A., Elgin, &c.

Education and Taxation Relief Bill, 1848

ASQUITH, Mr. H. H., Fife, E.

Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 1506

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 737

Asylum Inmates, Confirmation of

Q. Mr. Cobb, A. Mr. Matthews, 1120

ATHERLEY-JONES, Mr. L., Durham, N.W.

Control of Domestic Affairs (England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales), 1703

Mining Easements Bill, Intro. 752

"Atlas" Transport

Q. Mr. Stanley Leighton, A. Mr. Brodrick, 482

ATTORNEY GENERAL (see Sir R. WEBSTER)"Aurora," H.M.S., Defects in

Q. Mr. Tatton Egerton, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 584

Australian Mails

Q. Sir J. Swinburne, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 835

Australian Telegraph Charges, 1085BALFOUR, RIGHT HON. A. J. (First Lord of the Treasury), Manchester, E.

Access to Mountains Bill, 1530

Allotments in Scotland, 1125

Anarchist Press Attacks, 1251

British Museum Hours, 211

Budget, 372

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1261, 1266, 1269, 1270, 1275, 1650, 1726, 1734

Business of the House, 49, 51, 304, 372, 486, 487, 599, 601, 983, 985, 1252, 1254, 1294, 1384, 1390, 1582, 1583, 1584, 1658, 1663, 1675, 1683, 1780, 1782

Clergy Discipline Bill, 51, 369, 1585, 1634, 1638

Closure, 137, 213

Coast Communications, 158, 159

Colonial Commercial Leagues, 156

Counts Out, Tuesdays, &c., 879

Criminal Law Amendment Bill, 1255

Customs, Annual Leave in, 876

Dissolution, 506, 594, 595

Easter Holidays, 594, 1040, 1064, 1277, 1295

Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 164, 451, 1800, 1802, 1804, 1806, 1821, 1838, 1841, 1845, 1846, 1847, 1848, 1850, 1851, 1853

Evidence in Criminal Cases Bill, 372

Financial Relations Committee, 455, 456

Gresham University, 370, 593, 1127, 1298, 1299, 1573

High Grade Schools, Scotland, 1657

Home Industries, Government Contracts, 474

Hood, Mr. John, Compensation, 1124

"House" Fees, Private Bills, 368

Immigration of Destitute Aliens, 475

Incidence of Taxation, 1132

Indian Councils Bill, 477, 1251, 1342, 1392

Irish Education, 1292, 1293

Irish Local Government Bill, 51

Irish Parliament House, 1648

Labour Commission, 1773

Lewiss Roads and Telegraphs, 1580

Local Taxation and Debt, 583

Mail Services Return, 876

Mining Royalties Commission, 881

Ordnance Factories Bill, 51

Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 1524

Parliamentary Registration, 1389

Parliamentary Reporting, 1389

Parliaments, Election and Dissolution, 698

Peers and Elections, 1123, 1284

Persian Tobacco Concession, 1776

Places of Worship (Sites) Bill, 1426, 1431

Portuguese Harbour of Refuge, 1300, 1581

Private Bill Procedure Bill, 883

Private Members' Bills, 698

Privilege, Breach of—Railway Servants Hours Com., 922, 958, 960, 961

Rating of Schools Bill, 1292

Scottish Sea Fisheries, 1183

Salaries of Land Commissioners, 157

BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J.—cont.

Schools for Public Meetings, 1777
 Septennial Act, 1075
 Short Titles Bill, 1277
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 51, 702,
 1212, 1215
 Solicitors as Parliamentary Agents, 369
 Supply—Civil Service, 489, 506
 Sweating, 474, 475
 Tithe Rent-charge Redemption, 476
 Treaties, Belgium and Germany, 476
 Western Highlands Act, 1300, 1580
 Witnesses, Parliamentary Committees, 1778

BALFOUR, Mr. Gerald W., Leeds, Central

Building Societies, Return, 812
 Labour Commission, 985
 Rating of Machinery Bill, 2R., 753, 775, 777, 778, 792

BALFOUR, Right Hon. John B., Clack-mannan, &c.

Education and Local Taxation Relief
 (Scotland) Bill, 1790

BALLANTINE, Mr. W. H. W., Coventry
 St. Michael's Coventry (Vicar's Rate) Bill,
 Intro. 965

Ballincollig Powder Mills

Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Brodrick, 34, 1655

Ballycastle Mail Cart Driver

Q. Mr. Johnston, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 836

Ballyscally School Teacher

Q. Mr. T. W. Russell, A. Mr. Jackson, 13

Band and Mess Funds, 1088

Bandon Postal Arrangements

Q. Mr. Morrogh, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1246

Bandon Union, Labourers Cottages, 40

Unsanitary Houses, Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr.
 Jackson, 1653

BANES, Major G. E., West Ham, S.

Target Firing Seawards, 556

Bank Holidays and Post Offices

Q. Sir J. Lubbock, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 827

BARCLAY, Mr. J. W., Forfarshire

Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1267, 1275
 Education and Taxation Relief Bill, 1794,
 1805, 1811, 1816, 1817, 1850
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 731, 741, 1190, 1195, 1197, 1204

Barkisland Endowed School

Q. Mr. Stansfeld, A. Sir W. H. Dyke, 824

Barnmeen Postal Arrangements

Q. Mr. McCartan, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 477

Barracks, Typhoid Fever in, 33

BARRAN, Mr. John, York, W.R., Otley
 Sunderland's Charity Bill, Intro. 1449

BARTLEY, Mr. G. C. T., Islington, N.

Budget, 1173, 1584
 Eastbourne Improvement Act Amendment
 Bill, 324
 Electric Lighting Licences, 1561
 Gresham University, 370, 593, 1127, 1298
 Rifle Brigade Drafts, 1769
 Russian Jewish Emigrants, 146
 San Quintin Harbour, 1190
 School Attendances, Fees Abolition, 825

BARTON, Mr. D. P., Armagh, Mid

Control of Domestic Affairs (England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales), 1709
 Land Purchase Amendment Act, 264, 276,
 283
 Rural Posts near Portadown, 1106
 South Kensington Museum, 1246

BARTELOT, Right Hon. Sir Walter B.,
Sussex, North West

Budget Statement, 1255
 Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 1484
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 721, 1202:

BASING, Lord

Local Authorities (Acquisition of Land) Bill,
 460, 673

BAUMANN, Mr. A. A., Camberwell, Peckham

Cordite Powder, 1234, 1388
 London County Council (General Powers).
 Bill, 1538
 West African Protectorate, 1234

BEACH, RIGHT HON. SIR M. E. HICKS
 (President of the Board of Trade),
Bristol, W.

Annual Trade Returns, 864, 1105
 Colour Vision Committee, 878
 Electric Lighting Licences, 1562
 Electric Lighting Provisional Order Bills,
 Intro. 1226
 Emigrants by the "Pavonia," 1655
 Emigration and Immigration Return, 671
 Fishery Harbour, Grants to, 210
 Gas Provisional Orders Confirmation Bill
 Intro. 1449
 "Holmrook," Wreck of, 676
 Holyhead Harbour, 563
 Infectious Diseases, 344
 Kinsale Town and Harbour, 1248
 Line-throwing Guns, 336
 Mawddwy Railway Company, 877
 Mercantile Marine Officers' Hours, 1230
 Merchant Ships, Food, &c., 879, 1387
 Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill,
 1222
 Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 1).
 Bill, Intro. 871; (No. 2) Intro. 1640
 Private Bill Legislation Expenses, 1224

BEACH, Right Hon. Sir M. E. Hicks—cont.

Privilege—Railway Servants Hours Select Committee, 595, 596, 672; Motion, 699, 885

Railway Brakes and Accidents, 870

Railway Servants Hours of Labour Return, 1891

Railway Station Approaches, 1579

Railway Tunnel Refuges, 876

Weights and Measures (Purchase) Bill, Intro. 671, 1221, 1717, 1718

Women in Railway Carriages, 1244

Bechuanaland Border Police

Q. Colonel Howard Vincent, A. Baron H. de Worms, 1651

Behring Sea Fisheries

Q. Lord Herschell, A. Marquess of Salisbury, 1; Q. Mr. Gourley, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 155; Q. Mr. Bryce, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 1801

Belfast and Londonderry Mails

Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 852

Belfast Constabulary Barracks

Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Jackson, 350

Belfast, Queen's College Students and Athletics, 869

Belfast Union Dispensaries

Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Jackson, 1096

Belfast, Valuation of

A. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Jackson, 478

Belgium, Treaty with, 476

Bell Hotel, Hampton, Fire, 359

Bengal Municipal Act

Q. Mr. Schwann, A. Mr. Curzon, 694

Benin, Postage from, 1561

BENTINCK, Mr. W. G. Cavendish, Penryn and Falmouth

Importation of Live Cattle, 149

BETHELL, Commander G. R., York, E.R., Holderness

Major Festing's Mission, 1235

Naval Officers and Christ's Hospital, 580

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 663, 1182, 1197, 1203

BIGWOOD, Mr. J., Middlesex, Brentford

Budget, 1715

Bills for Incorporated Railway Companies, 327, 526

Bills of Sale Bill

l. Obs. 532; Read 2^a, 535

Rep. and Re-com. 813

BIRKBECK, Sir Edward, Norfolk, E.

Coast Communications, 158; Reso. 1892, 1414

Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 163

Rating of Machinery Bill, Amendt. 767

Salmon and Fresh Water Fisheries Bill, Intro. 671; 2^a., 1863

Target Firing at Sea, 555

Birkenhead School Accommodation

Q. Mr. Pictou, A. Sir W. H. Dyke, 859

Birmingham Corporation Water Bill

Select Com. Additional Members, 464; Discussion thereon, 596; Division, 552

BIRRELL, Mr. A., Fife, W.

Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill, 1619

Black, Inspector—Daly and Egan

Q. Mr. J. E. Redmond, A. Mr. Matthews, 22, 23; Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Matthews, 345; Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Mr. Matthews, 593

Black, Thomas, Services of

Q. Mr. Jordan, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 869

BLANE, Mr. A., Armagh, S.

Dissolution, 512, 518

Inspector Martin's Murder, 1235

Mercantile Marine Officers' Hours, 1290

Parliamentary Registration, 1233

Post Office Counter Duties, 1231

BOARD OF AGRICULTURE

President—Right Hon. H. Chaplin

Cattle Importation, 149

Field Mice Plague, Scotland, 850, 1107, 1896

Foot-and-Mouth Disease, 21, 149; in Kent, 153, 681, 1775; North Essex, 680, 1652; Glasgow, &c. 1774

Irish Cattle Trade, 153, 582

Ordnance Survey—Scarborough, 578; Scotland, 1107

Pleuro-Pneumonia, 21, 688; Dublin, 1564

Purchase of Small Holdings, 360

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, Com. 628-669, 701-750, 1005-1038, 1178-1220

Swine Fever, 683

Wilson, Sir Jacob, Illness of, 1652

BOARD OF TRADE

President—Right Hon. Sir M. E. Hicks Beach

Secretary—Lord Balfour of Burleigh

Annual Returns, 864, 1105

Colour Vision Committee, 878

Electric Lighting Bills, 1226

Electric Lighting Licences, 1562

Emigrants' Accommodation, 1655

[cont.]

BOARD OF TRADE—cont.

Emigration and Immigration Return, 671
Gas Provisional Orders Bill, 1449
"Holmrook" Wreck, 676
Holyhead Harbour, 568
Infectious Diseases, Ships, 344
Kinsale Harbour, 1247
Line-throwing Guns, 336
Mawddwy Railway, Suspension of Traffic, 877
Mercantile Marine—Food, 879, 1387; Office Hours, 1230
Merchant Shipping Bill, 1222
Pier and Harbour Bills, 871, 1640
Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, Return, 1228; New Bill, 1236 Railway Bills, Standing Orders, 827
Railway Servants Hours, 888, 1391
Railways—Accidents and Brakes, 870;
Compartments for Women, 1244; Station Approaches, 1579; Tunnel Refuges, 876
Weights and Measures Bill, 671

Board of Trade Returns

Q. Mr. O. V. Morgan, A. Sir M. Hicks Beach, 1105

Board School Accommodation

Q. Mr. Summers, A. Sir W. Hart Dyke, 1093

Board School Masters' Appointments

Q. Mr. E. Robertson, A. Mr. Long, Sir W. Hart Dyke, 1091; Q. Mr. H. J. Wilson, A. Sir W. Hart Dyke, 1092

BOLTON, Mr. J. C., Stirling

Private Bill Procedure Bill, 883, 1781

BOLTON, Mr. T. H., St. Pancras, N.

Metropolitan Police Courts, 591
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 726

Bombay Opium Sellers, 849

BONSOR, Mr. H. C. O., Surrey, Wimbledon

County Council Polling Places, 1388
Taxes (Regulation of Remuneration) Bill, 452

Borrowing Powers of Local Authorities

Q. Mr. Cobb, A. Mr. Ritchie, 343

Bradshaw, Mr. R. B., and Non-Registration

Q. Mr. Jordan, A. Mr. Jackson, 848

BRAND, Hon. A. G., Cambridge, Wisbech

Downham Telegraph Office, 13
Election Expenses, 43

BRIDGEMAN, Colonel Hon. F. C., Bolton

Army Pay Department, 842
British Museum Closing Time, 45, 211

British Art, Gallery of

Q. Mr. Whitmore, Mr. Lawson, A. Mr. Goschen, 829

British Columbia Emigration Loan, 33

British East Africa Company, 1571, 1768

British Museum Closing Time

Q. Colonel Bridgeman, A. Sir J. Gorst, 45, 211

BROADHURST, Mr. H., Nottingham, W.

Business of the House, 984
Character Note System, 352
Discharge of Workman, Chatham, 856
Imbecile, Support of, 347
Witnesses Protection Bill, 1861

BRODRICK, Hon. W. St. John
(Financial Secretary to the War Office, Surrey, Guildford)

Ballincollig Powder Mills, 34, 35, 1656
Clothing Factory, 163
Cordite Powder, 1234, 1388
Crimean, &c. Veterans Pensions, 151
Depôt Officers Pay, &c. 21, 163
Dublin Barracks Bill, 1384
Enfield Factory, Discharges, 154, 1100;
Superannuations, 154; Wages, 1100, 1239;
Sword Contracts, 1646
Flinn, Thomas, V.C., 466
Gibraltar Tunnelling, 1579
Henry Barrel Company, Carbines, 1100
Highland Regiments Clothing Cost, 13;
Lewis Militiamen, 1575
London Small Arms Company—Lee-Metford
Rifles, 1102; Sub-Contracts, 1102
Mess and Band Funds, 1088
Military Cadets Character Certificates, 20, 471
Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 132, 133, 136, 163
Regimental Stores Supply, 12
Rifle Ranges, Salisbury Plain, 1237;
Shamrock Wearing, 14, 15, 153
Shannon, Forts for Defence, 486
Soldiers at Political Meetings, 974
Target Practice Seawards, 164
Volunteer Regiments Debts, 12
Volunteers and Jury Service, 1646
Wantage Committee Proposals, 1573;
Waste Work Stoppages, 1101
Yellow Fever on "Atlas", 482

BROOKFIELD, Mr. A. M., Sussex, Rye
Labour Commission; Counties, 1777BROWNLOW, EARL (Under Secretary of State for War)
Malta Militia Regiment, 4

BRUCE, Lord Henry, Wilts, Chippenham
Coast Communications, 1418

BRUNNER, Mr. J. T., Cheshire, North-wich
Budget, New Patents, 1175

BRYCE, Mr. J., Aberdeen, S.
Access to Mountains (Scotland) Bill, 1580
Behring Sea Fisheries, 1801
Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 881, 1884, 1885
Grants for Secondary Schools, 846
Indian Councils Bill, 1816, 1818, 1841, 1847, 1892
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 1498
Persian Tobacco Monopoly, 1891
Rights of Way Procedure (Scotland) Bill, Intro. 812
Scotch Local Taxation Bill, 1583
Technical Instruction (Scotland) Bill, Intro. 812
Tokar District of Red Sea, 857

Buchanan, and Killinkere Murder, 1775

BUCHANAN, Mr. T. R., Edinburgh, W.
Business of the House, 968
Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 415, 1782, 1817, 1819, 1824
Higher Education in Scotland, 1774
Sasine Office, Edinburgh, 568
Scotch Equivalent Bill, 1588

Budget, The
Q. Sir W. Harcourt, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 372; Q. Sir W. Barttelot, A. Mr. Goschen, 1255; see Ways and Means

Building Lands Rating and Purchase Bill [c. No. 244]
Intro. Mr. C. Corbett; Read 1^o, 248

Building Societies, Return, 812

Bulwunt Rao of Gwalior
Correspondence moved for (Mr. S. Keay), 7

BURDETT-COUTTS, Mr. W. L. A. B., Westminster
Insanitary Conditions, Westminster, 884

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill [c. No. 280]
2R. Deferred, 452
Read 2^o, 1225
Com. 1260, R.P. 1277
Com. 1720, R.P. 1797

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill
Q. Mr. Shaw-Stewart, Dr. Clark, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1650

BURT, Mr. T., Morpeth
Inspection of Mines, 164

Business of the House (see PARLIAMENT)

Butcher, Captain, and Manipur
Q. Mr. King, A. Mr. Curzon, 1107

Butter, Adulteration of, 1569, 1772
Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 1569; Q. Mr. MacNeill, A. Mr. Long, 1772

BUXTON, Mr. S. C., Tower Hamlets, Poplar
Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 547
Budget, 1175
Morning Sittings, 1665
Royal Palaces Vote, 517, 519
Sub-Contracts on Government Buildings, 564
Telegraph Factory, 564

Cabs and Drivers in London, 1088

CALDWELL, Mr. J., Glasgow, St. Rollox
Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1263, 1264, 1266
Eastbourne Improvement Act Amendment Bill, 319
Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 620, 1788, 1797, 1802, 1814, 1817
Payment of Public Officials, 208
Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Extracts Bill, 2R. 670

CAMERON, Dr. C. C., Glasgow, College
Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 552
Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1261, 1263, 1268, 1269, 1270, 1273, 1274, 1275, 1720, 1727, 1731, 1732, 1733, 1734, 1735, 1736, 1737
Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 428, 616, 1806, 1812, 1816, 1826, 1852
Jamaica, Telegraph to, 1240
Scottish Board Schools, 328
Solomon Islands, 33
Telegraphs, 166, 180, 187

CAMERON, Mr. J. McDonald, Wick, &c.
Dornoch Volunteers, 360

CAMPBELL, Mr. H., Fermanagh, S.
Female Prisoners, 469
Mrs. Osborne, 348

CAMPBELL, Mr. J. A., Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities
Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 431

CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Right Hon. H., Stirling, &c.
Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 452
Compulsory Sale of Land (Ireland), 243
Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 379, 494, 1820, 1824, 1844, 1850
Morning Sittings, 1668
Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill, 1383

GAMPERDOWN, Earl of County Councils and Bills, 142

Canadian Trade

Q. Colonel Howard Vincent, A. Baron H. de Worms, 973

Canteen, Supplies for, 337

Carbine Contracts, Henry Barrel Company

Q. Mr. Cuninghame Graham, A. Mr. Brodrick, 1101

Carey, John, Pension of

Q. Mr. Harrison, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 566

Cassell's National Library

Q. Mr. H. Gardner, A. Sir W. Hart Dyke, 25

Cathedral Churches and Charities

Q. Mr. Morton, A. Sir S. Northcote, 847

Catholic Clergy and Poor Law Elections

Q. Mr. T. W. Russell, A. Mr. Jackson, 875

Cattle Disease (see BOARD OF AGRICULTURE)

Cattle Diseases Fund (Ireland), 366

Cattle Trade

Foreign, Q. Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Mr. H. T. Knatchbull - Huggessen, A. Mr. Chaplin, 149;—Irish, Q. Mr. Pinkerton, A. Mr. Chaplin, 152; Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Chaplin, 582

CAUSTON, Mr. R. K., Southwark, W.

Cabs and Cab Drivers, London, 1088

Irish Teachers' Pension Fund, 1867

Gibraltar Sanitary Commission, 35, 357, 576, 844, 845

Cavan and Roscommon Railway, 45

Cavan Justices of the Peace

Q. Mr. Knox, A. Mr. Jackson, 844

Cavan Land Cases, Delays

Q. Mr. Knox, A. Mr. Jackson, 1769

Cavan Union Costs

Q. Mr. Knox, A. Sir J. Gorst, 879

Census Office Clerks

Q. Mr. H. Gardner, A. Sir H. Maxwell, 565

Census of India, Officials, 9

Certificates of Character, Woolwich and Sandhurst

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Brodrick, 20, 471

Certificates of Death, Irregular, 161

CHAMBERLAIN, Right Hon. J., Birmingham, W.

Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 464, 536, 538, 541, 542, 552

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 736, 1009, 1019, 1025, 1215

Stolen Postal Orders, 1385

CHANNING, Mr. F. A., Northampton, E.

Allotments Act, 368

Mice Plague in Scotland, 1386

Privilege, Breach of, 595, 598, 918

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) Return, 1391

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, Amendt. 729, 730, 1166, 1195, 1204, 1208

Vaccination Commission, 1385

CHAPLIN, RIGHT HON. H. (President of the Board of Agriculture), Lincolnshire, Sleaford

Cattle Importation Prohibition, 149

Field Mice Plague, Scotland, 850, 1107, 1386

Foot-and-Mouth Disease, 21; in Kent, 153, 681, 1775; North Essex, 680, 1652; Glasgow, &c., 1774

Irish Cattle Trade Restrictions, 153, 583

Ordnance Survey, Scarborough, 578; Scotland, 1107

Pleuro-Pneumonia, 21, 683

Purchase of Small Holdings, 360

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 647, 653,

667, 669, 704, 716, 730, 732, 735, 737, 738,

744, 1025, 1037, 1179, 1180, 1181, 1187,

1191, 1194, 1196, 1198, 1199, 1200, 1204,

1213

Swine Fever Prevention, 683

Wilson, Sir Jacob, Illness of, 1652

Character Certificates, Military Cadets,
20, 471

Character-Note System

Q. Mr. Broadhurst, A. Lord G. Hamilton,
352

Charge-Taker, Dublin Post Office, 10

Charities and Cathedral Churches, 347

Charity Inquiries Bill [c. No. 278]

Intro. Mr. Goschen; Read 1^o, 1227

Chartered Accountants Bill [c. No. 255]

Intro. Sir Horace Davey; Read 1^o, 454

Chelsea Meetings and Prosecution, 856

• Chicago Exhibition

Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, Sir T. Esmonde, A. Sir R. Webster, 42; Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, Sir J. Puleston, A. Sir R. Webster, 696; Q. Sir T. Esmonde, A. Sir R. Webster, 880, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1125

• Chief Secretary's Papers

Q. Mr. W. O'Brien, A. Mr. Madden, 569

• Children, Custody of, 572

• Chimney Sweepers, Registration of

Q. Sir J. Colomb, A. Mr. Matthews, 558

• Christ's Hospital and Naval Officers

Q. Commander Bethell, A. Sir S. Northcote, 580

• Christian Brothers' Schools, 1292

• Cider, Sale of

Q. Sir F. FitzWygram, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1765

• Circulars by Post, 1754

• Civil Bill Courts (Ireland) Bill [c. No. 313]

Intro. Mr. Madden; Read 1^o, 1865

• Civil Courts and Crofters Act, 675

• Civil Service

Copyists, Q. Mr. Kelly, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1644; Examinations, Q. Mr. Kelly, A. Sir J. Gorst, 886; Petitions, Q. Mr. Craig, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1562; Retirements, Q. Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. T. W. Russell, A. Mr. Madden, 573; Q. Dr. Clark, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1647; Sick Leave, Q. Mr. Esslemont, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1755; Tenure of Office beyond 65, Return, 1224; Volunteers at Easter, Q. Colonel H. Vincent, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 675

• Clanricarde, Lord, and his Tenants

Q. Mr. Condon, A. Mr. Madden, 581

• Claremorris and Collooney Railway

Q. Mr. Jordan, A. Mr. Jackson, 486

• Clare Island Evictions

Q. Mr. W. O'Brien, Mr. Sexton, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. M. J. Kenny, Mr. Sheehy, A. Mr. Jackson, 840, 975, 978
Debate on Motion for Adjournment, 986, Division, 1004

• Clare Slob Lands

Q. Mr. Cox, A. Sir J. Gorst, 333, 1297

CLARK, Dr. G. B., Caitness

Access to Mountains Bill, 1864

Breach of Privilege Case, 960, 961; after Division, 967

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1260, 1264, 1265, 1266, 1267, 1268, 1270, 1272, 1273, 1724, 1727, 1730, 1731, 1735, 1736, 1737

Business of the House, 165

Colonial Probates Bill, 453

Compulsory Retirement, Civil Service, 1647

Control of Domestic Affairs (England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales), 1684

Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 392, 625, 1786, 1799, 1800, 1801, 1804, 1805, 1806, 1817, 1822, 1826, 1848

Financial Relations (England, Ireland, and Scotland) Committee, 454

Grants to Fishery Harbours, 208

Hares Bill, 524

Indian Councils Act, 1869

Inland Revenue Solicitor, 331

Morning Sittings, 1683

Payment of Public Officials, 200

Prison Surgeons' Salaries, 1647

Procurators Fiscal, Duties of, 1558

Royal Palaces Vote, 493, 496, 517, 519

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 1206

Unconvicted Prisoners Working, 1557

Ways and Means Reso. 1255

Clarke, Convict, Insanity of

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Matthews, 149

Cleary, Mr., Dublin

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 561

Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill

Q. Mr. F. S. Powell, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 51;

Q. Mr. Lloyd-George, Mr. Picton, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 369

Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill [c. No. 239]

Debated, 1585, Divisions; Read 2^o, 1638

Clergymen, Convictions of, 48

Clergy (West Indies) Return, 1228

Clock Tower Light

Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Plunket, 692

Clogher Head Pier, 865

Clothing Factory

Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Brodrick, 162

Coast Communications

Q. Sir E. Birkbeck, Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 158; Reso. Sir E. Birkbeck, 1392-1419; Q. Mr. Morton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1577

Coastguard Officers' Widows, Pensions

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 981

COBB, Mr. H. P., Warwick, S.E.,

Rugby

Allotments Act, 1887, 35
Borrowing Powers of Local Authorities, 343
Business of the House, 488
Confirmations, Lunatic Asylums, 1120
Election Expenses, 43
Fanny Gane's Sentence, 1089
Foot-and-Mouth Disease, 21
Jurors at Criminal Trials, 1130
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 627, 637,
641, 651
Vaccination, 1751

COGHILL, Mr. D. H., Newcastle-under-Lyme

Septennial Act, 1060

Coll, William, Imprisonment of, 1236

Collection of Letters

Q. Lord Lanington, A. Viscount Cross, 141

College Green Parliament Buildings, 1648

COLLERY, Mr. B., Sligo, N.

Congested Districts Board, 566
Innismurray Island Pier, 568
Land Courts, Delay in, 567

COLLINGS, Mr. Jesse, Birmingham, Bordesley

Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 549
Business of the House, 304, 372, 600
Charity Trustees, 359
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 654, 724;
Amend. 790, 1193, 1197, 1209, 1218

COLOMB, Sir John C.R., Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.

Chimney Sweeps, Registration of, 558

Colonial Commercial Leagues

Q. Colonel H. Vincent, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 156

Colonial Probates Bill [c. No. 231]

In Com. 453; Read 3^d, and passed

COLONIES

Secretary of State—Lord Knutsford

Under Secretary—Baron H. de Worms

Australian Telegraph Rates, 1085; Mails, 835

Bechuanaland Police, 1651

British Columbia Emigration, 38

Canadian Legislature and Trade Extension, 973

Colonial Probates Bill, 453

Commercial Leagues, 156

Festing, Major, Mission of, 1235

French Protectorate, West Africa, 1108, 1109

Gambia, 1779

COLONIES—cont.

Gibraltar, 35, 356, 357, 576, 585, 843, 845, 1110

Gold Coast Prisoners, 1764

Jamaica Telegraphs, 1099, 1240

Lagos Treaties, 24, 358, 834

Mining Royalties, 859

Pahang Rebellion, 1126

Queensland Frozen Meat, 482

Spirits to Native Tribes, 41

Tambi, Repulse at, 696

Toniataba, Fighting at, 1779

West African Matters, 696, 1108, 1284, 1764, 1779

West Indian Sugar, 11

Zululand—Boundary, 830; Prisoners, 1559; Usibepu, 1561

Colour Vision Committee

Q. Sir H. Roscoe, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 878

Commissioners Clauses Act (1847) Amendment Bill [c. No. 216]

2R. deferred, 1868

COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION

Lord President—Viscount Cranbrook

Vice President—Right Hon. Sir W. H. Dyke

(see EDUCATION Department)

Compulsory Retirement, Civil Servants, 573, 1647

Compulsory Sale of Land (Ireland)

Motion, Mr. Kilbride, 214, 227; Amendt. Mr. T. W. Russell, 237; Division, 248

CONDON, Mr. T. J., Tipperary, E.
Lord Clanricarde's Agent, 581

Confirmations in Asylums, 1120

Congested Districts Board

Fishing Boats, Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 365; Sligo, Q. Mr. Collery, A. Mr. Madden, 566; Gartan and Letterkenny, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor, A. Mr. Madden, 575; West Clare, Q. Mr. Jordan, A. Mr. Jackson, 866; Ruskey, Q. Mr. O'Kelly, A. Mr. Jackson, 1097

Constabulary Barracks, Belfast, 350

Constabulary Strength in Ireland, 354

Continental Anarchists

Q. Colonel Howard Vincent, A. Mr. Matthews, 681

Control of the Police

Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. C. Graham, A. Mr. Matthews, 370, 468

Convents, Deaths of Nuns, 329

Conveyancing and Law of Property Act (1881) Amendment Bill

l. Rep. with Amendts. 144

Order for receiving Rep. discharged, 674

Convictions of Clergymen

Q. Mr. S. T. Evans, A. Mr. Matthews, 48

Convicts

See Clarke, Daly, Edgell, Egan, Finnigan, Gallagher, Hehir, Muldooney, O'Leary, Richardson

Convicts in Mountjoy Prison

Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. W. O'Brien, Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 1764

CONYBEARE, Mr. C. A. V., Cornwall, Camborne

Breach of Privilege Case (Railway Servants), 885, 938

Devonport Dockyard and Factory Act, 882

Error in Division List, 1865

Fanny Gane and Mrs. Montagu, 863

Indian Councils Amendment Bill, 1330,

1346, 1348, 1356

Treasury and Irish Mails, 967

Coogan, Francis, and Police, 971, 1117

COOKE, Mr. C. W. Radcliffe, Newington, W.

Privilege Committee, 598

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), Motion, 700, 928

Coonana and Croom-Crown Harbours, 865

CORBETT, Mr. A. C., Glasgow, Tradeston
Building Lands Rating and Purchase Bill, Intro. 248

Cordite Powder

Q. Mr. Baumann, A. Mr. Brodrick, 1234, 1388

Cork, and County

Board of Guardians, Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 1656;—Court House, Q. Mr. Maurice Healy, A. Mr. Jackson, 1123;—District Lunatic Asylum, Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 861, 1567;—Fair Rent Applications, 578;—Mail Service, 851, 854;—Parcels Post, 1112;—Poor Law Elections, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Jackson, 1757

CORNWALLIS, Mr. F. S. W., Maidstone
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 1187

Coroners in Boroughs Bill [c. No. 245]

Intro. Sir A. Rolit; Read 1^o, 804

Council of Judges

Q. Mr. Robertson, A. Mr. Matthews, 864

Counter Duties—Post Offices

Q. Mr. Bland, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1231

"Counts Out"

Q. Mr. McLaren, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 873

County Cess, Ireland

Q. Mr. Stack, A. Mr. Madden, 481

County Councils

Elections—Death of Candidate, Q. Mr. Jeffreys, A. Mr. Ritchie, 482;—Polling Places, Q. Mr. Bonsor, A. Sir R. Webster, 1388;—Reigate, Q. Sir W. Foster, A. Mr. Ritchie, 147;—Sub-Postmasters ineligible, Q. Mr. S. T. Evans, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 467;—Ties, Q. Sir W. Lawson, Sir T. Lawrence, A. Mr. Ritchie, 1645
Legislation, Q. Earl Camperdown, A. Marquess of Lothian, 142
Loans, Annuity System, Q. Mr. J. Stuart, A. Mr. Goschen, 44, 592

COURTNEY, Right Hon. L. H. (Chairman of Committees of Ways and Means and Deputy Speaker), Cornwall Bodmin (see also for Rulings, & under SPEAKER, The)

Bills for Incorporated Railway Companies, 327

Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 543, 549

Eastbourne Improvement Act Amendment Bill, 322

Local Authorities and Tramways, 325

Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 1513

COUTTS, Mr. W. L. A. B. Burdett- (see BURDETT-COUTTS)

COX, Mr. J. R., Clare, E.

Business of the House, 985

Clare Slob Lands, 332, 1297, 1298

Ennis Post Office, 393

Inland Revenue Officers, 978

Irish Drainage Bill, 150

Killaloe Weighing Machine, 1118

Scariff Docks, 981, 1118, 1752

Stopped Money Orders, 557

CRAIG, Mr. J., Newcastle-upon-Tyne

Civil Servants' Petitions, 1562

Seniority in the Customs, 1248

Ways and Means Reso. 1256

CRAWFORD, Mr. D., Lanark, N.E.

Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1267, 1269

Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland)

Bill, 449, 1785, 1811, 1836, 1838

Education (Scotland) Law Amendment Bill, Intro. 812

High Grade Schools in Scotland, 1656

Railway Servants Hours Com.—Breach of Privilege, 954

Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill, 1259

- CREMER, Mr. W. R., *Shoreditch, Haggerston
 Breach of Privilege—Railway Servants Hours Com. 885, 915
 Business of the House (Morning Sittings), 1664
 Morning Sittings, 1294, 1676, 1688
 Royal Palaces Vote, 502, 513, 515
 Truck Acts, 697, 878
- CRILLY, Mr. D., *Mayo, N.
 Assistant County Surveyors Bill, 1746
 Galway County Infirmary, 350
 Innisboffin Rate Collector, 29
 Innisboffin, Distress in, 392
 Irish Parliament House, 1648
- Crimean, &c., Veterans, Pensions
 Q. Mr. Leng, A. Mr. Brodrick, 151
- Criminal Law Amendment Bill
 Q. Mr. T. M. Healy, A. Mr. Balfour, 1255
- Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887
 Q. Mr. Macartney, Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. Sexton, Mr. W. O'Brien, A. Mr. Madden, 558
- Crofters Act in Outer Hebrides
 Q. Mr. Fraser Mackintosh, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 147
- Crofter Commission, Civil Courts
 Q. Mr. Fraser Mackintosh, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 675
- Cronin, Jeremiah, 156
- Cronin, Michael
 Q. Mr. Flynn, A. Mr. Madden, 47
- Crops in India, Statistics, 349
- CROSS, Hon. W. H., *Liverpool, West Derby
 Oil Rivers Territory, 1750
- CROSS, VISCOUNT (Secretary of State for India)
 Post Cards, Unofficial, 141
 Smoke Nuisance Metropolis Bill, 310
 Stamping Time of Collection on Letters, 142
- CURZON, Viscount, *Bucks, Wycombe
 Incidence of Taxation, 1132
- CURZON, Hon. G. N. (Under Secretary of State for India), *Lancashire, Southport
 Agricultural Banks in India, 1766
 Bengal Municipal Act, 694
 Butcher, Captain, and Manipur, 1107
 Crops of India, Statistics, 349
 Emoluments, Indian Officials, 470
- CURZON, Hon. G. N.—*cont.
 Famine, Precautions against, 1104
 Indian Councils Act (1861) Amendment Bill, 2R. 52, 91, 120, 128, 1810, 1817, 1830, 1835, 1841, 1846, 1847, 1860, 1866, 1874, 1882, 1883
 Medical Attendance, Indian Officers, 826
 Officials on Indian Census, 10
 Opium Sellers in Bombay, 849
 Regimental Mess and Band Funds, 1087
 Revenue from Intoxicants, India, 1066
- Custody of Children, 572
- Customs Department, Annual Leave
 Q. Mr. Kelly, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 876
- Customs Seniority Memorial, 1248
- Customs Statistical Department
 Q. Mr. Norris, A. Sir H. Maxwell, 684
- Cyclists in Hyde Park
 Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Plunket, 846
- Daly, John
 Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Mr. Matthews, 341
- Daly and Egan—Inspector Black, 22
- DALZIEL, Mr. J. H., *Kirkcaldy, &c.
 Lagos Treaties, 24
 Private Members Bills, 697
- DARLING, Mr. C. J., *Deptford
 Anarchist Press Attacks, 1251
- DAVEY, Sir Horace, *Stockton
 Chartered Accountants Bill, Intro. 454
 Colonial Probates Bill, 453
 Imprisonment of Debtors, 838
 Rating of Machinery Bill, 807
- DAWNAY, Colonel Hon. L. P., *York, N.R., Thirsk
 Hares Bill, 524
- Death Certificate
 Q. Mr. Maden, A. Mr. Matthews, 161
- Death Rate in Gibraltar, 357, 585
- Deaths in Convents
 Q. Mr. Johnston, Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Matthews, 329
- Debtors, Committal of
 Q. Mr. A. E. Pease, A. Mr. Matthews, 837;
 Q. Sir H. Davey, A. Sir R. Webster, 838
- Deeming, Trial of
 Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Sir R. Webster, 873
- Deficient School Accommodation, 859

DE LA WARR, Earl

Fires in Ships, 525

Malta Militia Regiment, 3, 6

Delays in Land Courts, 567

Delivery of Parcels

Q. Mr. Flavin, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1111

DENMAN, Lord

Duration of Speeches in the House of Lords

Bill, 457, 460

Hares Bill, 463

Depôt Centres—Officers' Pay, &c.

Q. Colonel Nolan, A. Mr. Brodrick, 20; Q.

Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Brodrick, 163

Destitute Foreigners Immigration, 145, 475

Destitute Irish Poor

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. McCartan, A. Mr. Jackson, 1242

Devonport Dockyard Circular

Q. Mr. Conybeare, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 882

Dewsbury and Batley, Small-pox, 1654

DE WORMS, RIGHT HON. BARON H.
(Under Secretary of State for the Colonies), Liverpool, East Toxteth

Bechuanaland Border Police, 1651

Canadian Trade, 973

Colonial Probates Bill, 453

English and French Protectorates, West Africa, 1108, 1109

Festing, Major, and Sierra Leone, 1235

Frozen Meat from Queensland, 482

Gibraltar Sanitary Commissioners, 35; Tunnel, 356; Death-rate, 357, 585; Representatives, 576, 844, 845, 1110; Public Meeting, 843

Gold Coast, Political Prisoners, 1764

Jamaica, Telegraph to, 1099

Lagos Treaties, 24, 358, 834

Mining Royalties in Colonies, 859

Pahang, Rising in, 1126

Roorkee Military Chaplain, 971

Sale of Spirits to Natives, 41

Toniataba, Fighting at, 1779

Usibepu and Zululand, 1561

West Africa, Repulse at Tambi, 696

West Indian Sugar, 11

Zululand Boundary, 830

Zulu Prisoners, 1559

DICKSON, Mr. T. A., Dublin, St. Stephen's Green

Compulsory Sale of Land, Ireland, 237

Dietary, Irish Model Schools

Q. Mr. T. W. Russell, A. Mr. Jackson, 1760

Digby, William, Tynan Postman

Q. Mr. W. O'Brien, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 160

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea, Town

Commissioners Clauses Act (1847) Amendment Bill, 1863

Discharge of Workman, Chatham, 856

Dismissal Gratuities, 872

Dispensary Districts, Belfast Union, 1097

Dissolution, Question of

Q. Mr. Picton, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 594

Distress at Innisboffin, 29

Distribution of Scotch Local Taxation Grant, 684

District Courts Bill [c. No. 290]

Intro. Mr. Pitt-Lewis; Read 1^o, 1296

District Messenger Service

Q. Mr. Labouchere, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1122

Divorce Bill [c. No. 123]

Debate, 1437, Division, 2R. put off six months, 1449

DIXON-HARTLAND, Mr. F. D., Middlesex, Uxbridge

Fires and Loss of Life, 582

Local Government Act, 1888 (Compensation Appeals), Return ordered, 139

Dolgelly, Treasure Trove at, 1761

Domestic Affairs, Control of, (England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales)

Resolution, Dr. Clark, 1684-1714

Donegal, Catholic Magistrates in

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 1114

Dornoch Volunteer Company

Q. Mr. Macdonald Cameron, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 360

DOUGLAS, RIGHT HON. A. AKERS
(Patronage Secretary to the Treasury), Kent, St. Augustine's

Statute Law Revision, Select Com. 672

Downham Telegraph Office

Q. Mr. Brand, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 13

Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill [c. No. 292]

Intro. Mr. Jackson; Read 1^o, 1296

Drainage (Ireland) Bill, 150

2^d 1

Drift Fishing in the Suir

Q. Mr. Maurice Healy, A. Mr. Jackson, 1116

Drill Book, "Provisional," 352

Drinagh Post

Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 364

Drumond Police Hut

Q. Mr. M. Healy, A. Mr. Jackson, 677

Dublin

Cattle Disease, Q. Dr. Fitzgerald, A. Mr. Jackson, 1564; Metropolitan Police, Q. Mr. Johnston, A. Mr. Jackson, 80; Post Office, Charge-taker, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 10; Sorting Clerk, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 11; Pay, &c., Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1111, 1569

Dublin Barracks Bill

Select Com. Members, 1364

DUFF, Mr. R. W., Banffshire

Education and Local Taxation Relief Bill, 1846, 1851

DUNCAN, Mr. J. A., Barrow-in-Furness

Mr. Justice Rogers's Illness, 1181

Railway Tunnel Refuges, 876

Small Estates in Chancery Return, 1225

Dundalk Burial Board

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Madden, 160

Dundrum Asylum

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Jackson, 969

Duration of Speeches in House of Lords Bill

1. 2R. put off six months, 459

Durham Extra Police

Q. Mr. J. Wilson, A. Mr. Matthews, 855

DYKE, RIGHT HON. Sir W. HART

(Vice President of the Council for Education), Kent, Dartford

Barkisland Endowed School, 823

Birkenhead School Accommodation, 860

Board School Accommodation, 1098

Cassell's "National Library" Offer, 26

Elementary School Inspectors, 1649

Evening Schools and New Code, 27; Annual Grants, 842

Handsworth, School Board for, 1190

School Attendances, Fee Abolition, 825

School Teachers Certificates, 868

School Teachers as Magistrates, &c.; as Organist, 1092, 1093

South Kensington Museum, 1246, 1650

Emolumen School Accommodation, 1290

aries, 177ⁿ

Dynamitards Sentences, 1103

East African Slave Trade, 586

Eastbourne Improvement Act, 1855, Amendment Bill

Select Com. nominated (Mr. A. Douglas), 7

Instruction proposed (Admiral Field), 819

Easter Holidays

Q. Mr. T. E. Ellis, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 594

East India (Behar) Correspondence

Return pres. 140

East India Officers Bill [c. No. 246]

From 1.; Read 1^o, 458

East India (Uncovenanted Services)

Return of Correspondence, 752

Edgell, Convict, 1643

Edinburgh and Dundee Mails

Q. Mr. Shiress Will, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1230

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT

Lord President of the Council—Viscount Cranbrook

Vice President—Right Hon. Sir W. Hart Dyke

Barkisland Endowed School, 823

Birkenhead Schools, 860

Board Schools, Area per Child, 1093

Cassell's "National Library," 26

Elementary School Inspectors, 1649

Evening Schools, Code, 27; Grants, 842

Fees, Abolition of, 825

Handsworth, School Board for, 1190

School Attendances, 825

School Teachers—Certificates, 368; Directors and Magistrates, 843; Organists, &c. 1092, 1093

Science Teaching, South Kensington Museum, 1246, 1650

Tottenham School Accommodation, 1250

Village Libraries, 1772

Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill [c. No. 206]

2R. Debate, 378; Adj. 451

Debated, 601, Division; Read 2^o, 627

Com. 1782, R.P. 1853

Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill

Q. Mr. Wallace, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 164;

Distribution of Grant, Q. Mr. Hunter, A.

Sir C. J. Pearson, 684

Education (Scotland) Law Amendment Bill [c. No. 261]Intro. Mr. Crawford; Read 1^o, 812Effective Ships of Royal Navy

Q. Mr. Picton, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 570

Egan, Convict

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Matthews, 1108, 1238

Egan, Mr. Martin, Gun Licence, 581EGERTON, Hon. A. de Tatton, Cheshire, Knutsford

H.M.S. "Aurora," 584

Egress from Theatres

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Matthews, 1566

Eight Hours (No. 2) Bill [c. No. 908]Intro. Mr. Randell; Read 1^o, 1532Election Expenses

Q. Mr. Brand, Mr. Cobb, A. Sir R. Webster, 48

Electric and Cable Railways (Metropolis)

Select Com. nominated, 814

Electric Lighting Licences

Q. Mr. Bartley, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 1561

Electric Lighting Provisional Orders

(No. 1) Bill [c. No. 271]

(No. 2) Bill [c. No. 272]

(No. 3) Bill [c. No. 273]

Intro. Sir M. H. Beach; Read 1^o, 1226Elementary School Inspectors

Q. Mr. H. J. Wilson, A. Sir W. H. Dyke, 1649

ELLIOT, Hon. A. R. D., Roxburgh

Business of the House, 1663

Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 403

ELLIS, Mr. James, Leicestershire, Bosworth

Breach of Privilege—Railway Servants Hours Com. 988

ELLIS, Mr. John E., Nottingham, Rushcliffe

Indian Councils Act Amendment Bill, 1834, 1836, 1844, 1859

Land Purchase Returns, 1297

Morning Sittings, 1665

Places of Worship (Sites) Bill, 2R. 1419, 1422, 1426, 1429

Postal Telegraph Accounts, 1757

Railway Brakes and Accidents, 870

Railway Station Approaches, 1578

ELLIS, Mr. Thomas E., Merionethshire

Business of the House, 488, 983, 1228

Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill, 1614

Control of Domestic Affairs (England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales), 1710

Easter Holidays, 594

Grants to Fishery Harbours, 210

Mawddwy Railway Company, 877

Private Bill Legislation (Expenses) Return, 1224

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 1035, 1181, 1195, 1202

Tithe Rent Charge, 477

Eltham Woods

Q. Mr. Pickersgill, Mr. J. Rowlands, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1114

ELTON, Mr. C. I., Somerset, Wellington

Rating of Machinery Bill, 774

Emblems, Wearing of, 553Emigration and Immigration

Statistical Tables pres. 671

Scotland, Q. Mr. Sutherland, A. Mr. Goschen, 32; Ireland, Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 1655

Enclosed Lands, Sale of

Q. Sir W. Foster, A. Mr. Ritchie, 148

Enfield Small Arms Factory

Q. Mr. Cuninghame Graham, A. Mr. Brodric, 154, 1100, 1238, 1646

Engine Defects, H.M.S. Aurora, 584Engine Room Artificers

Q. Sir J. Puleston, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 1129

Engine Room Complements

Q. Mr. Penn, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 1242

Enniskillen Military Headquarters

Q. Mr. Jordan, A. Mr. Stanhope, 579, 867

Enniskillen Post Office

Q. Mr. Jordan, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 484, 866

Ennis Post Office

Q. Mr. Cox, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 333

Equivalent Grant, Scotland

(See Education and Local Taxation Relief)

Distribution, Q. Mr. Hunter, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 684

Return ordered, 811; pres. 1228

Erasmus Smith Endowment

Q. Mr. M. Healy, A. Mr. Jackson, 1755

Erne, Lough, Drainage Scheme ^{JR1}

Q. Mr. Knox, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1770

ESMONDE, Sir T. G., Dublin Co., S.

Chicago Exhibition, 42, 880, 1125
 Excise Officers Petition, 1110, 1239
 Fenit, Telegraph Station for, 1125
 Gibraltar Sanitary Board, 1110
 Irish National Gallery, 82
 Powis Commission, Cost of, 1126
 Succession under Land Purchase Acts, 871
 Wearing the Shamrock, 14, 153

Essex Regiment, 2nd Battalion

Q. Mr. Theobald, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 1250

Essex, Cattle Disease in, 680, 1651ESSLEMONT, Mr. P., *Aberdeen, E.

Allotments in Scotland, 1125
 Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1260, 1265,
 1266, 1268, 1271, 1274, 1275, 1722, 1732,
 1733, 1734, 1735
 Business of the House, 304, 1254
 Civil Service Sick Leave, 1755
 Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 421, 614, 1790, 1831, 1840, 1850
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 1183, 1196, 1204
 • Telegraphists' Holidays, 26
 • Telephones, 182

Europeans in India, 106EVANS, Mr. Samuel T., *Glamorgan, Mid

Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 465
 • Budget Resolution, 1584
 Clergy Discipline Bill, 1625, 1639
 Convictions of Clergymen, 48
 County Council Candidates, 467 Financial Relations (England, Ireland, and Scotland) Committee, 456
 Medical Inspectors, 48
 Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 194
 Short Titles Bill, 1719, 1720

Evening Schools and Education Code

Q. Mr. S. Smith, A. Sir W. Hart Dyke, 27;
Annual Grants, Q. Mr. Mundella, A. Sir
 W. H. Dyke, 842

Evicted Tenants, Re-instatement of

Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 1575

Evictions

Gweedore, 51; Falcarragh, 574; Clare Island,
 975, 986

Evidence of Prisoners at Inquests, 338, 571*Evidence in Criminal Cases Bill [c

No. 228.]
 c. Read 2^o, 131
 Com. R.P. 669

Evidence in Criminal Cases Bill

Q. H.K. M. Healy, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 872

Excise Officers' Petition

Q. Sir T. Eamonde, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1110, 1239

Explosives (Poisonous) in Mines, 1653Express Letter Services

Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 340

Extensions of Command in Army

Q. Mr. A. O'Connor. A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 872

Eyre and Spottiswoode's Contract, 985EYRE, Colonel H., *Lincolnshire, Gains-borough

Volunteer Medical Officers, 567

Factory Act, Devonport Dockyard, 882*Fair Rent Appeals

Q. Mr. Seymour Keay, A. Mr. Jackson, 39

Famine in India, Precautions against

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Curzon, 1104

Fanny Gane's Sentence, 1089Farm Servants Wages

Q. Mr. Shireess Will, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 1229

FARQUHARSON, Mr. H. R., Dorset, W.

Teachers' Certificates, 368

FARQUHARSON, Dr. Robert, *Aberdeenshire, W.

Access to Mountains Bill, 1221
 Gresham University, 1299, 1578
 Islington Union Medical Officer, 342
 Post Office Liability, 490
 Royal Palaces Vote, 518
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 1191
 South Kensington Museum, 1245, 1246, 1650

Female Prisoners' Confinements

Q. Mr. H. Campbell, A. Mr. Matthews, 349, 469

Fenit Telegraph Station

Q. Sir T. Eamonde, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1125

FENWICK, Mr. C., *Northumberland, Wansbeck

Breach of Privilege—Railway Servants
 Hours Com. 921

Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Acts
 Amendment Bill, Intro. 1227

FERGUSON, Mr. R. C. Munro, Leith, &c.
 Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1264

Education and Local Taxation Relief Bill, 1798, 1847

FERGUSSON, RIGHT HON. SIR JAMES (Postmaster General), Manchester, N.E.

Accident, Unloading a Hand-cart, 162
 American Mails Contract, 335, 685, 853
 Australian Mails, 835; Telegraph Rates, 1085

Ballycastle and Ballina Driver, 836
 Bank Holidays at Post Offices, 827
 Barnmeen Postal Arrangements, 477
 Carey, Mr. John, Pension of, 566
 Cavan and Roscommon Railway, 45
 Charge-Taker, Dublin Post Office, 10
 Cleary's, Mr., Family, 562
 Coast Communications, 1410, 1415, 1418, 1577

Cork Mails, Acceleration of, 685, 688
 Counter Duties, Allowances, 1231
 Digby, William (Tynan), Discharge of, 160
 Downham, Telegraph Office for, 13
 Drinagh Outgoing Post, 364
 Dublin Post Office Changes, 1111
 Edinburgh and Dundee Mails, 1230
 Enniskillen Postmaster, 484
 Ennis Post Office, 333, 866

Express Letter Services, 340
 Fenit Telegraph Station, 1125
 Foxford Rural Postman, 971
 Free Re-direction of Letters, 1773
 Inland Postcards Size, 465

Irish Mails, Belfast and Cork, 1113; Correspondence, 1113, 1223

Killmore, Telegraph Office for, 680
 Killenny Postal Service, 1112
 Letter Cards Cost, 465
 Liability for Telegraph Omission, 480
 Limerick Sub-Post Office, 861; Postmaster-ship, 1090

Longford Post Office, 690
 Louisburg, Telegraph for, 1767
 Mails in Ireland, Acceleration and Cost, 852, 853, 1290

Missing Post Parcel, 556
 Maltby Telegraph Office, 982
 Members Letters re-directed, 1110
 Money Orders, Hours of Issue, 152
 Moorgate Street Telegraph Clerks, Sickness and Meals, 473

Mullaghduin Cross, Post Office for, 485
 Overtime in Post Office, 1115
 Officials and County Councils, 467
 Parcel Post, Belfast and Dublin, 847; Cork, 1112

Perring's, Mr., Retirement, 353
 Plain Post Cards, 1574
 Postal Clerks Association Petition, 572
 Postal Surveyors, Ireland, 572
 Post Office and Telephones—Debate, 171, 183, 198

Portadown Rural Posts, 1106
 Rural District Telegraphs, Scotland, 689
 Rural Postmen's Pensions, 877; Wages, 1125

Sale of Stamps, Licences, 466
 Societies' Circulars by Post, 1754

FERGUSSON, Right Hon. Sir J.—cont.

Sorting Clerk, Conlan's Candidature, 11
 Stirling and Oban Mails, 833
 Stopped Money Orders, 557, 1385
 Sunday Duty, Dublin, 1759
 Telegraph Factory Hours of Work, 565
 Telegraph Rates, India and Australia, 1085
 Telegraphists' Holidays, 26
 Telegraphs, Annual Accounts, 1757
 Transference of Mails, 854
 Ulverston Postmastership, 20
 Vienna Postal Conference, 1232
 Wexford Mail Service, 580, 1243
 West African Postage Rates, 1561

Festing, Major, in Sierra Leone, 1109, 1235

Fever in St. John's Wood Barracks, 339

FIELD, Admiral E., Sussex, Eastbourne
 Eastbourne Improvement Act Amendment Bill, 319, 324
 Perring, Mr., Post Office Surveyor, 353
 Quartermasters of Royal Marines, 856

Field Mice Plague, Scotland, 850, 1106

Fighting at Toniataba, 1779

Fighting in Uganda, 1570

Financial Relations (England, Ireland, and Scotland) Committee

Q. Dr. Clark, Mr. Sexton, Mr. S. T. Evans, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 454, 456; Q. Mr. H. H. Fowler, Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Goschen, 1223; see also 1254

FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY
 (see GORST, Right Hon. Sir J. E.)

Finnigan, Convict, 841

Firearms

Q. Mr. Roche, A. Mr. Madden, 581

Fire Escapes, 582

Fires at Hotels

Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Matthews, 359; on Passenger Ships, 525

Firing at Targets from Forts, 555

FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS AND PUBLIC BUILDINGS (see PLUNKET, Right Hon. D. R.)

FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (see BALFOUR, Right Hon. A. J.)

First Offenders, Probation of, Act, 8

Fisheries Reports (Ireland)

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 470

Fishery Disturbances in the Shet-lands

Q. Mr. Lyell, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 1756

Fishery Harbours, Grants to, 208

Fishery Piers and Boat Slips, Ireland

Q. Mr. Kilbride, A. Mr. Jackson, 865

Fishing Boats, Irish and English, 365, 880

FITZGERALD, Dr. James G., Longford, S.

Dublin and Cattle Disease, 1564
Parcel Post, Belfast and Dublin, 847

FITZGERALD, Mr. R. U. Penrose, Cambridge

Coast Communication, 1414, 1415

FITZWYGRAM, General Sir F. W., Hants, Fareham

Oider and Excise, 1765

Flannegan, Rose and Mary

Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 572, 1090

FLAVIN, Mr. Martin, Cork

Delivery of Post Parcels, 1112

Flinn, Thomas, V.C.

Q. Mr. D. Sullivan, A. Mr. Brodrick, 466

Flintshire Coroner

Q. Mr. S. Smith, A. Mr. S. Wortley, 1759

Flintshire Magistrates

Q. Mr. S. Smith, A. Mr. Matthews, 7

Flogging in Prison

Q. Mr. Pickersgill, A. Mr. Matthews, 155

FLYNN, Mr. J. C., Cork, N.

Cronin, Michael, 47
Irish Education Bill, 1122

Kinsale Pier Loan, 47

Land Purchase Act Amendment Bill, 253, 264

Members' Letter re-directed, 1110

Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 135, 164

Rural Postmen in Ireland, 1125

Treasury and Irish Mails, 968

FOLEY, Mr. P. J., Galway, Connemara

Innisboffin, Distress at, 29

Innisboffin Rate Collector, 29

Food for Merchant Seamen

Q. Sir E. Harland, A. Sir M. Hicks Beach, 1387

Foot-and-Mouth Disease

Q. Mr. Cobb, A. Mr. Chaplin, 21; Kent, Q. Mr. H. T. Knatchbull-Hugessen, A. Mr. Chaplin, 158, 681, 1775; Saffron Walden, Q. Mr. Round, A. Mr. Chaplin, 680; Essex, Q. Mr. H. Gardner, A. Mr. Chaplin, 1651; West of Scotland, Q. Colonel Waring, A. Mr. Chaplin, 1774

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

Secretary of State—Marquess of Salisbury

Under Secretary of State—Mr. J. W. Lowther

Armenians and Kurds, 28

Behring Sea Fishery, 2, 155, 1901

Fort Johnston and Slave Trade, 585

Loanda Trade, 18

Mombasa Railway, 1768

Niger, French Protectorates on, 1110

Oil Rivers Territory, 1750

Persian Tobacco Concession, 1890

Russian Jews, 146

San Quintin Harbour, 1130

Tokar and Red Sea Littoral, 858

Uganda, 1571, 1768

Venezuelan Disturbances, 1755

Foreigners, Immigration of, 145, 475

FORTESCUE, Earl

Labourers (Ireland) Allotments Bill, 531

FORWOOD, Right Hon. A. B. (Secretary to the Admiralty), Lancashire, Ormskirk

Victualling Stores, 1129

FOSTER, Sir B. Walter, Derby, Ilkeston

Accumulations Bill, 1741

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1728

County Council Election, 147

Sale of Enclosed Lands, 148

Septennial Act, 1040, 1078, 1079

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 658, 706,

728; Amendt. 737, 739, 746, 1081, 1189, 1198, 1205, 1219, 1293

FOWLER, Right Hon. H. H., Wolverhampton, E.

Business of the House, 1532

Eastbourne Improvement Act Amendment Bill, 319, 320, 321, 325

Financial Relations Committee, 1223

Gaming Act Amendment Bill, 670

High Court of Justice (Assizes), Return asked for, 140

Railway Commissioners Sitings, Return, 140

FOWLER, Right Hon. H. H.—cont.

Septennial Act, 1068

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 703, 735, 1203, 1214

FOXFORD, Lord (see LIMERICK, Earl of)

Foxford Rural Postman, 970

France and England in Africa

Q. Mr. Parker Smith, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 1109; Q. Mr. Lawrence, A. Baron H. de Worms, 1106; Q. Mr. Baumann, Commander Bethell, A. Baron H. de Worms, 1234

French and Scotch Steam Trawlers

Q. Col. Nolan, A. Mr. Madden, 587; Q. Col. Nolan, Mr. W. O'Brien, A. Mr. Jackson, 841

Frozen Meat from Queensland

Q. Mr. Jeffreys, A. Baron H. de Worms, 482

Fry, Mr. Lewis, Bristol, N.

Justice North's Court, 41

Fry, Mr. Theodore, Darlington

Soldiers at Political Meetings, 974

Gallagher, Dr.

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. J. E. Redmond, Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, A. Mr. Matthews, 37; Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Matthews, 149, 970

Gallery of British Art, 829

Galway County Infirmary

Q. Mr. Crilly, A. Mr. Jackson, 350

Gambia, Fighting near, 1779

Gaming Act, 1845, Amendment Bill [c. No. 247]

c. from I.; Read 1^o, 454

Read 2^o, 670

Rep.; Read 3^o, and passed, 811

Gane, Fanny, Sentence on

Q. Mr. Cobb, A. Mr. Matthews, 1089

GARDNER, Mr. Herbert, Essex, Saffron Walden

Business of the House, 487, 1582, 1659

Casell's National Library, 25

Cattle Disease in Essex, 1651

Census Office, 565

Mrs. Montagu's Release, 1754

Schools for Public Meetings, 1777

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 708

Tithe Rent Charge, 476

Village Libraries, 1772

Gartan Electoral Division

Q. Mr. A. O'Connor, A. Mr. Madden, 575

Gas Provisional Orders Confirmation Bill

[c. No. 295]

Intro. Sir M. H. Beach; Read 1^o, 1449

GATHORNE-HARDY, Hon. A. E., Sussex, East Grinstead

Breach of Privilege—Railway Servants Hours Com., 893

General Cattle Diseases Fund

Q. Mr. A. O'Connor, A. Mr. Jackson, 365

General Police and Improvement (Scotland) Act (1862) Amendment Bill [c. No. 188]

c. Read 2^o, 671

Com. R.P. 965

Geodetic Bureau of Vienna

Q. Mr. Kimber, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 37

Germany, Treaties with, 476

Gibraltar Death Rate

Q. Sir E. Watkin, Mr. Summers, Mr. Causton, A. Baron H. de Worms, 355, 585

Gibraltar Sanitary Commission

Q. Mr. Causton, Mr. Summers, A. Baron H. de Worms, 35, 576; Q. Mr. Summers, Mr. M'Lagan, Mr. Causton, A. Baron H. de Worms, 844, 845; Q. Sir T. Esmonde, A. Baron H. de Worms, 1110

Gibraltar, Tunnelling through

Q. Sir H. Tyler, A. Mr. Brodrick, 1579

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E., Edinburgh, Midlothian

Breach of Privilege—Railway Servants Hours Committee, 910

Business of the House, 1584

Dissolution, 508

Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill, 1601

Financial Statement (Mr. Goschen's), 1170

Indian Councils Act, 78

Morning Sitzings, 1671

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 664, 1016, 1028, 1180, 1582

Glenbeigh Artillery Range

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. Maurice Healy, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 1119

Gold Coast Boundary, 1109

Political Prisoners, 1764

Gold Extracted in United Kingdom

Q. Mr. Pritchard Morgan, A. Mr. Goschen, 871

Gold Mine Royalties, 49, 589, 689

GOLDSWORTHY, Major-General W. T., Hammersmith
Indian Councils Act (1861) Amendment Bill, 1363

Good Conduct Pay, Postmen's, 364

Gorey, Police Duty at
Q. Mr. T. J. Healy, A. Mr. Jackson, 1244

GORST, RIGHT HON. SIR JOHN E.
(Secretary to the Treasury),
Chatham

Bandon District Mail Services, 1246
Business of the House, 1288
British Museum Hours, 46
Cavan Union Costs, 879
Cider and Excise Duties, 1766
Civil Servants Petitions, 1562; Sick Leave, 1756
Civil Servants over 65, 1224; Compulsory Retirement, 1647
Civil Service Copyists, 1644
Civil Service Examinations, 836
Clare Slob Lands, 332, 1297
Eltham Woods, 1114, 1115
Excise Officers Petition, 1110
Eyre and Spottiswoode's Contract, 985
Hughes, James, Stranraer, 1112
Inland Revenue Inspectors, 979
Irish Mail Services Return, 967
Irish Teachers Pension Fund, 1866, 1868
Jamaica Telegraph Subsidy, 1240
Kinsale Pier Loan, 47, 1247
Labour Commission Evidence, 985; Scotland, 1248
Lough Erne Drainage, 1770, 1771
Louisburg Pier, 34
Messenger Service Company's Wires, 1122
National Education (Ireland) Return, 1864
National Gallery Report, 1237
Overtime for Messengers, &c. 1776
Payment of Local Government Officials, 202
Powis Commission, Cost of, 1126
Prison Surgeons Salaries, 1647
Scariff Docks and Pier, 981, 1118, 1752
Superannuation Acts Amendment (No. 2)
Bill, Intro. 1227; 2R. 1853, 1856, 1858,
1859, 1860
Taxes (Regulation of Remuneration) Bill, 452

GOSCHEN, RIGHT HON. G. J. (Chancellor of the Exchequer), St.
George's, Hanover Square
American Mails, Increased Expenditure,
687, 688
Annuity Repayments of Loans, 45
British Columbia, Highlands Emigration Scheme, 33
Budget Speech, 1134; Statistics, 1255
Charity Inquiries Bill, Intro. 1227
County Council Finance, 592
Excise Officers Petition, 1239
Financial Relations Com. 985, 1223
Gallery of British Art, 829
Gold-Mining Royalties, 589, 590, 689

[cont.

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J.—cont.

Inland Revenue Supervisor, 484
Irish National Gallery Director, 32
Legal Costs, Income Tax Claims, 695
Morgan Mine Royalty, 50, 590
Ore Treated in British Mines, 871
Postal Telegraphs and Telephones, 193
Royalties on Mining, 50, 51, 828
Savings Banks Inspectors, 363
Seniority in Customs, 1248
Sheep Dog Licences, 363
Solicitor, Inland Revenue, Edinburgh, 331
South Kensington Museum, 1245
Tax on Incomes under £400, 827
Trade Unions and Post Office Savings Banks,
31, 355
Ways and Means—Financial Statement,
1134-1170, 1174, 1176, 1256, 1257
Weymouth Trustee Savings Bank, 334, 335

GOURLEY, Mr. E. T., Sunderland
Behring Sea Difficulty, 155
Victualling Stores, 1128

Government Buildings, Sub-Contracts on
Q. Mr. Sydney Buxton, A. Mr. Plunket, 564

Government Contracts
Eyre and Spottiswoode, 985
Home Industries, Q. Mr. J. Lowther, A. Mr.
A. J. Balfour, 473
Henry Barrel Company, 1101
Lee-Metford Rifles, 1102
London Small Arms Company, 1102
Old Ford Rifle Works, 1101
Paddington Sorting Office, 564
Thornycroft's, and Ransome's Sub-Contract, 26

Government Offices, Overtime Pay
Q. Mr. A. O'Connor, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1775

Government of Scotland Bill [c. No. 65]
2R. moved, 1450; House counted, 1452

Government Insurances and Annuities
Accounts pres. 140

GRAHAM, Mr. R. Cuninghame, Lanark,
N. W.

Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1269
Carbines and Henry Barrel Company, 1101
Control of Police, 371
Convicts Egdell and Richardson, 1648
Enfield Factory, Wages paid, 1100, 1238;
Discharges, 1100; Sword Contracts, 1646
Illegitimacy in Scotland, 31, 1119
Lambeth Street Obstructions, 1644
Lee-Metford Rifle Contract, 1102
London Small Arms Company Sub-Contracting, 1102, 1103
Railway Servants Hours Com.—Breach of
Privilege, 916
Rating of Machinery Bill, 808
Small Arms Factory, 154

[cont.

GRAHAM, Mr. R. C.—cont.

Telephones, 181
Waste Work Stoppages, 1101
World's End, Chelsea, Meetings, 856

Grants to Fishery Harbours, 208Gratuities to Government Workmen

Q. Mr. Hozier, A. Mr. Stanhope, 872

GRAY, Mr. C. W., Essex, Maldon

Land Purchase Amendment Act, 298
Local Boards and Sunday Closing, 1751
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 640

Great Seal for Ireland

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Jackson, 337

Green Park, Ornamental Gardening

Q. Mr. S. Hunt, A. Mr. Plunket, 1123

Gresham University

Q. Mr. Bartley, Sir A. Rollit, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 370, 593, 1127; Q. Sir A. Rollit, Mr. Bartley, Dr. Farquharson, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1298; Commissioners' Names, 1299; Q. Dr. Farquharson, Mr. Picton, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1578

GREY, Sir E., Northumberland, Berwick

"Holmrook," Wreck of the, 676
Pleuro-Pneumonia and Swine Fever, 683

GRIMSTON, Viscount, Herts, St. Albans

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 728, 733, 1206

Ground Game Bill [c. No. 259]

Intro. Mr. G. Lambert; Read 1^o, 671

Guillamore's Lord, Estate

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Jackson, 1758

Guardship Repairs, Queenstown, 1567Gun Licence, Ireland

Q. Mr. Macdermott, A. Mr. Jackson, 467

Gun Seized by Police, 581Gunpowder Casks for Ireland, 1655*Guns (Rifled, Iron and Steel)

Return pres. (Mr. Duff), 1228

Gweedore Evictions

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 51

Hackney Carriage Licences, 1088HALDANE, Mr. R. B., Haddington

Accumulations Bill, 1738
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 735, 748, 1217, 1218

HALSBURY, LORD (Lord Chancellor)

Bills of Sale Bill, 2R. 532, 534
Local Authorities (Acquisition of Land) Bill, 461, 673
Public Authorities Protection Bill, 2R. 535
Statute Law Revision, 813
Technical and Industrial Institutions Bill, 529

HAMILTON, Colonel C. E., Southwark, Rotherhithe

San Quintin Harbour, 1130

HAMILTON, RIGHT HON. LORD

GEORGE F. (First Lord of the Admiralty), Middlesex, Ealing

"Aurora," Breakdown of H.M.S., 584
Coastguard Officers' Widows Pensions, 981
Character-Note System, 352
Devonport Dockyard, Factory Act, 882
Discharge of Workman, Chatham, 856
East African Slave Trade, 586
Effective Ships, &c., List of, 570
Engine-Room Artificers, 1129
Engine-Room Complements, 1243
Geodetic Bureau at Vienna, 37
Haulbowline Dockyard, 688, 1118
Marine Boilers, 46
Quartermasters, Royal Marines, 856
"Royalist" at Solomon Islands, 33
Shamrock Wearing by Seamen, 16, 691
Stornoway Naval Reserve Men, 1574
"Submarine Sentry," 36
Thornycroft's, Messrs., and Ransome's Sub-Contract, 26
"Triumph" Guardship, Repairs to, 1567

HAMMOND, Mr. J., Carlou

Postmen's Pay, 364

Handley, James, Sentence on

Q. Mr. Webb, Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 469; Q. Mr. T. J. Healy, A. Mr. Jackson, 591, 1130

Handsworth, School Board for

Q. Mr. P. Stanhope, Mr. Mundella, A. Sir W. Hart Dyke, 1120

Harbour Grants, 208Harbour Lights, Orkneys, 584*Harbour of Refuge, Lewis, 1300, 1581*HARCOURT, Right Hon. Sir W. G. V., Derby

Business of the House, 371, 1582, 1661
Budget, 372
Fighting in Uganda, 1570
Mombasa Railway, 1768
National Debt, Return, 812
Places of Worship (Sites) Bill, 1435
Privilege, Questions of, 597
Public Expenditure and Revenue Account, 1083

HARCOURT, Right Hon. Sir W. G. V.—cont.

Railway Servants Hours Com.—Breach of Privilege, 923
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 738, 1199, 1200, 1205, 1206, 1207, 1212, 1217

HARDY, Hon. A. E. Gathorne—(see GATHORNE-HARDY)

Hares Bill

l. Rep. without Amendt. and Re-Com. 6
Rep. with Amendt. 144
Amendt. Rep. 319
Read 3^a, 463
c. Amendt. from l. agreed to 524
l. Returned from c. 532

HARLAND, Sir Edward J., Belfast, N.
Mercantile Marine, Food Supply, 1387
Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill, 1222, 1295

HARRISON, Mr. H., Tipperary, Mid
Carey, John, Pension of, 566
Walsall Anarchists Sentences, 1103

HART DYKE, Sir W. (see DYKE)

HARTLAND, Mr. F. D. Dixon—(see DIXON-HARTLAND)

Haulbowline Dockyard Employees
Q. Dr. Tanner, Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 688, 1118

HAYDEN, Mr. L. P., Leitrim, S.
Constabulary, Royal Irish, 353, 876

HAYNE, Mr. Charles Seale-, Devon, Ashburton
Income Tax Claims, Legal Costs, 695
Industrial and Provident Societies (Leasehold Enfranchisement) Bill, 1743
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 706, 734, 1182, 1194, 1219

HEALY, Mr. Maurice, Cork
Cork Court House, 1123
Cork Mail Service, 686, 687, 688, 851
Drift Fishing in the Suir, 1116
Drumond, Police Hut, &c. 677
Erasmus Smith Endowments, 1755
Evidence in Criminal Cases Bill, 372
Fair Rent Applications, Cork, 1098
Glenbeigh Artillery Range, 1119
Irish County Court Acts, 485
Irish Mail Service, 1288
Kilkenny County Posts, 1112
Land Commissioners, Assistant, 1098
Land Courts, County Cork, 573
Land Courts, Delay in, 568
Longford Post Office, 690
Mail Services, Cork, Belfast, and American, 851, 853, 854, 967, 1113
Parliamentary Registration, 1233
Tidal Waters and Bye-Laws, 857
Waterford Police Promotion List, 690

HEALY, Mr. Thomas J., Wexford, N.
Handley, the Prisoner, 1130
Irish Mail Service, 579
Police Protection, Gorey, 1244
Road Contract Prices, Ireland, 1131
Wexford Mails, 1243

HEALY, Mr. Timothy M., Longford, N.
Breach of Privilege, 961, 964, 968
Burg Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1270, 1271, 1272
Business of the House, 984, 1252
Civil Servants, Tenure of Office, 1224
Clare Island Evictions, 977, 995, 1003
Criminal Law Amendment Bill, 1255
Dissolution, 1084
Jurors, Mrs. Montagu's Trial, 862
Labour Commission, 986
Land Commissioners Salaries, 158; Agricultural Department, 1095, 1096
Mail Service (Ireland), 1223
Peers and Elections, 1128, 1278
Private Bill Legislation Expenses, 1224
Piers and Harbours (Ireland) Expenditure, &c. Return, 752
Rating of Machinery Bill, 1039
Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill, 1220
Scottish Sea Fisheries Bill, 1133
Short Titles Bill, 1275, 1276, 1277
Weights and Measures (Purchase) Bill, 1221

HEATON, Mr. J. Henniker, Canterbury
Express Letter Services, 340
Inland Post Cards, 465
Letter Cards, 465
Postal and Money Orders, 152
Telegraph Rates, Australia, &c. 1085
Telephones, 174
Vienna Postal Conference, 1231

Hebrides and Crofters Act, 147

Hehir, Convict Lunatic
Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Mr. Jackson, 975, 1562

H.M.S. "Aurora"
Q. Mr. Tatton Egerton, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 584

HENEAGE, Right Hon. Edward, Great Grimsby
Breach of Privilege—Railway Servants Com. 903
Business of the House, 983

HENNIKER, Lord
Local Authorities (Acquisition of Land) Bill, 462

Henry Barrel Company's Contract, 1101

HERSCHELL, Lord
Behring Sea Fishery, 1, 2
Local Authorities (Acquisition of Land) Bill, 460, 462
Smoke Nuisance (Metropolis) Bill, 309

HERVEY, Lord Francis, Bury St. Edmunds
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 1210

High Court of Justice (Assizes) Return, 140

High Court of Justiciary (Scotland) Bill
[c. No. 294]
Intro. Sir C. J. Pearson; Read 1^o, 1384

Higher Class School Inspectors
Q. Mr. Robertson, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 1643

Higher Education, Scotland, Schools
Q. Mr. Crawford, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1656;
Q. Mr. Crawford, Mr. Buchanan, A. Sir
C. J. Pearson, 1773

Highland Regiments, Cost of Uniforms
Q. Colonel Nolan, A. Mr. Brodrick, 13

Highlands and British Columbia, 33

HILL, Colonel E. S., Bristol, S.
Coast Communications, 1416
Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill,
670, 878

HOARE, Mr. S., Norwich
Indian Councils Act, 129

HOBHOUSE, Mr. H., Somerset, E.
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 1204

HOLDEN, Mr. E. T., Walsall
Annual Trade Returns, 864
Plain Postcards, 1574
Royal Palaces Vote, 502

"Holmrook," Wreck of, 676

Holyhead Harbour
Q. Mr. Lewis, A. Sir M. Hicks Beach, 563

Home Industries and Government Contracts, 474

HOME OFFICE

Secretary of State—Right Hon. H. Matthews, Under Secretary of State—Mr. C. B. Stuart
Wortley

Anarchists from Continent, 681; Press
Attacks, 1251; Sentences, 1103

Black, Inspector, Birmingham, 22, 345, 593
Cabs Licensed in London, 1088

Chimney Sweepers, 559

Convicts—Clarke's Insanity, 150; Daly's
Treatment, 342; Egan's Sentence, 1298,
1294; Gallagher's Sanity, 37, 150, 970;
Egdell and Richardson, 1643

Death Certificates, 162

Deaths in Convents, 329

HOME OFFICE—cont.

Debtors, Commitment of, 837

Durham Extra Police, 855

Female Prisoners, 469

Fanny Gane's Sentence, 1089

Fires in Hotels, &c. 359, 582

Flintshire, Coroner, 1759; Magistrates, 7

Flogging in Prison, 155

Hughes's, James, Fine, 1573

Licences, Shoreditch, 27

London University Senate, 1122

Magistrates, Borough and Counties, 829

Metropolitan Police Bill, 1227

Mines Inspection, 165; Poisonous Explosives, 1653

Osborne, Mrs., Case of, 348

Police Courts, London, 592

Prerogative of Mercy, 469

Prevention of Crimes Act, 156

Probation of First Offenders Act, 8

Provincial Police, Control of, 369, 469

Puzzle Competitions, 25

"Regina v Hurlbert", 1089

Roburite in Mines, 1653

Sentences, Dynamitards, 1108

Sunday Closing Petitions, 1751

Theatre Stages, Fire-Escape, 1666

Vaccination, 1752

World's End Meeting, Bail, 857

Home Rule and Colonel Saunderson, 1127

Home Rule Motion

Q. Mr. Macartney, A. Mr. Deputy Speaker, 1658

Hood, John, Compensation for

Q. Mr. Morton, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1124

HOULDSWORTH, Sir William H., Manchester, N.W.

Rating of Machinery Bill, 796

"House Fees" for Private Bills

Q. Mr. Lea, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 369

House of Commons Signal Light

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Plunket, 1749

Housing of the Working Classes (Scotland) Bill [c. No. 293]

Intro. Sir C. J. Pearson; Read 1^o, 1384

HOWELL, Mr. G., Bethnal Green, N.E.

Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill,
670, 1222, 1295, 1862

Mining Royalties, 828

Post Office Savings Bank, 31

Railway Servants' Hours Com.—Breach of
Privilege, 926

Savings Bank Inspectors, 362

HOWELL, Mr. G.—cont.

Trade Societies and the Post Office Savings Bank, 354
Weymouth Trustee Savings Bank, 333

HOZIER, Mr. J. H. C., Lanarkshire, S.
Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 389, 1825, 1831, 1834, 1852
Field Mice Plague, 849
Gratuities to Government Workmen, 872
Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill, 1258

HUGESSEN, Mr. Knatchbull— (see KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN)

Hugginstown and Harristown Posts, 1113

HUGHES, Colonel E., Woolwich
London County Council (General Powers) Bill, 1556, 1557, 1643

Hughes, James, a Customs Boatman
Q. Mr. Mark Stewart, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1112

Hughes, James, Assault by
Q. Mr. B. Roberts, A. Mr. Matthews, 1572

HUNT, Mr. F. Seager, Marylebone, W.
Green Park Flower Beds, 1123

HUNTER, Mr. W. A., Aberdeen, N.
Breach of Privilege by Railway Directors, 959
Distribution of Taxation Grant, 684
Divorce Bill, 2R. 1437
Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 394, 411, 1792, 1803, 1805, 1816, 1846
Equivalent Grant Distribution, Return, 811
Government of Scotland Bill, 2R. 1450
Payment of Public Officials, 207

Hurlbert, Mr., Action against, 1089

Hyde Park Cycling, 846

Illegitimacy in Scotland
Q. Mr. C. Graham, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 31, 1119

Imbecile, Support of
Q. Mr. Broadhurst, A. Mr. Ritchie, 347

Immigration of Destitute Foreigners, 145, 475

Importation of Live Cattle, 149

Imprisonment with Flogging
Q. Mr. Pickersgill, A. Mr. Matthews, 155

Incidence of Taxation
Q. Viscount Curzon, Mr. Lawson, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1132

Incomes of £400 and under
Q. Mr. King, A. Mr. Goschen, 826

Income Tax Claims, Costs on
Q. Mr. Seale-Hayne, A. Mr. Goschen,

INDIA

Secretary of State—Viscount Cross
Under Secretary of State—Hon. G. N. Curzon

Agricultural Banks, 1766
Bengal Municipal Act, 694
Butcher, Captain (Manipur)—Court Martial Refused, 1107 Census Officials, 10
Crops, Statistics of, 349
Emoluments of Officials, 470
Famine Precautions, 1104
Indian Councils Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 52, 1225, 1301
Medical Attendance, Free, for Indian Officers, 826
Opium Sold in Bombay, 849
Regimental Mess and Band Funds, 1087
Revenue from Intoxicants, 1086

Indian Councils Act (1861) Amendment Bill

c. 2R. Debated, 52; Read 2^o, 131
Com. R.P. 1225
Com. 1301, Amendments, Division, R.P. 1383

Indian Councils Bill

Q. Mr. Schwann, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 477;
Q. Mr. Seymour Keay, Mr. Bryce, A. Mr. Balfour, 1251, 1392

Indoor and Outdoor Prison Work, 1563

Industrial and Provident Societies (Leasehold Enfranchisement) Bill

[c. No. 114]
2R. Debate, Adj. 1743

Infantry Drill Book

Q. Mr. Tomlinson, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 352;
Q. Viscount Newark, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 860

Infectious Diseases from Ships
Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Sir M. Hicks Beach, 344

Influenza and School Attendance, 1287

Inhabited House Duty
Q. Sir J. McKenna, A. Sir R. Webster, 874

Inland Postcards
Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 465

Inland Revenue

Inspectors, Q. Mr. Cox, A. Sir J. Gorst, 978
Solicitor, Edinburgh, Q. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh, Dr. Clark, A. Mr. Goschen, 330
Supervisor, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor, A. Mr. Goschen, 484

Innisboffin, Distress at

Q. Mr. Foley, Mr. Crilly, A. Mr. Jackson, 29, 332

Innisboffin Rate Collector

Q. Mr. Foley, Mr. Crilly, A. Mr. Jackson, 29

Innismurray Island Pier

Q. Mr. Coltery, A. Mr. Madden, 568

Insanity of Convict Clarke, 149Inspection of Mines 165*Inspectors

Higher Class Schools, 1643
Qualifications, Elementary Schools, 1649
Salmon Fisheries, 1573
Savings Banks, 362

Insurrection in Venezuela, 1755Intoxicants, Indian Revenue from

Q. Mr. S. Smith, A. Mr. Curzon, 1086

International Geodetic Bureau, 37IRELAND

Lord Lieutenant—Earl of Zetland

Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant—Right Hon. W. L. Jackson

Attorney General—Right Hon. D. H. Madden

Education

Ballyscully Teacher's Dismissal, 14
Erasmus Smith Endowment, 1755
Influenza in Schools, 1287
Irish Education Bill, 1122, 1780
Irish Model Schools Dietary, 1760
Queen's College Holidays, 868
School Grants, Allocation of, 868, 979
Teachers' Pension Fund, 1866
Unclassed Teachers, 9

Fisheries

Destruction of Fish on Coast, 1294
Drift Fishing in Suir, 1116
Fishery Piers and Boat Slips, 865
Fishing Boats Built Locally, 865, 881
French and Scotch Trawlers, 587, 841
Irish Fisheries Report, 470
Kenmare Fishery, Gravel Removed, 587
Limerick Fishery Board, 692

[cont.]

IRELAND—cont.Landlord and Tenant

Clanricarde, Lord, Seizure of Turf, 581
Clare Island Evictions, 840, 975, 986
Evicted Tenants, Re-instating, 1576
Guillamore's, Lord, Estate, 1758
Gweedore Evictions, 52
Letterilly Evictions, 472
Olphert Estate, Bailiff on, 575
Payne's, Mr., Estate, Purchases, 557

Law and Police

Belfast Constabulary Barracks, 350
Catholic Magistrates, Donegal, 1114
Constabulary Force, 353, 876; Promotion, 970
Convicts' Work, Mountjoy Prison, 1763
Coogan and the Police, 1117
Criminal Law and Procedure Act, 560
Cronin, Michael, Case of, 47
Drumond Police Hut, 677, 678
Gorey Fair, Police Protection, 1244
Gun Seized by Police, 581
Handley, James, Sentence, 591, 1130
Hehir, Insanity of Convict, 1562
Jurors, Inconvenience to, 1760
Killinkere, Suspected Murderer, 1775
Martin, Inspector, Murder of, 1236
M'Hugh, Assault on Girl, 982
Muldooney and Finnigan, 841
Murphy, James, Release of, 571
Nally's Inquest, Witnesses, 338, 571, 839
O'Leary in Mountjoy Prison, 682, 1563, 1763
Police Violence at Belfast, 971
Portadown Disturbances, 351
Prison Warders' Creeds, 181
Prison Work, Indoor or Out, 1563
Searching People in Streets, 871
Sweeney, John, Case of, 578
Waterford County Police Promotion, 691
Westmeath Constabulary, 339

Legislation—Labourers, Land, and Purchase Acts, &c.

Applications, 1891 Purchase Act, 249, 250
Cavan Land Cases, Delay, 1769
Civil Bill Courts Bill, 1865
Compulsory Sale of Land, Motion, 213
Cork Fair Rent Applications, 1098
Cork Sub-Commission, 573
Fair Rent Appeals, 40
Irish County Court Acts, 485
Kerry Sub-Commission, 1098
Land Commissioners—Assistant, 1099; Registrar, 1094; Office Staff, 560; Delay in Courts, 568; Salaries, 157
Land Purchase Act, Returns, 1297; Succession under, 871
Lisburn, Sub-Commission for, 875
Purchase of Land (1891) Act Amendment Bill, 250, 303

[cont.]

IRELAND—cont.

Local Government and Poor Law

- Armagh Asylum Architect*, 574
Bandon Unsanitary Houses, 1653
Belfast Dispensary Doctors, 1097
Belfast Valuation, 478
Catholic Clergy, Poor Law Elections, 875
Cavan Justices as Guardians, 844
Cork Board of Guardians, 1656; Mr. Fitzgerald, 1757; Contracts, 1567, 1568; Court House, 1123
County Lunatic Asylum Expenses, 1569
Dundrum Asylum, 969
Galway Infirmary Commission, 350
Innisboffin Rate Collector, 29
Kilworth Water Supply, 1652
Labourers' Cottages—Bandon, 40; Mal-low, 479; Mountmellick, 483, 569; Roscrea, 17; Sligo, 1577; Complaints of Boards, 864
Letterkenny Lunatic Asylum, 1117
Manorhamilton Poor Law Election, 1241
Medical Officer, Tallow District, 679
Mohill Poor Law Elections, 1096
Poor Law Schools Bill, 1227
Road Contracts, 1182

Miscellaneous

- Access to State Papers*, 554, 569
Arklow Open-air Preaching, 362
Bradshaw, Mr., Prosecution of, 849
Butter Adulteration, 1570
Cattle Disease, Dublin, 1564—Trade, 582
Cattle Diseases Fund, 366
Cork Lunatic Asylum and Medical Students, 361
Dundalk Burial Board Loan, 161
Great Seal for Ireland, 337
Gun Licence Refusal, 467
Irish Parliament House, 1648
Kilworth Water Supply, 1652
Landed Proprietors, Return of, 878
Margarine sold as Butter, 1569
Mrs. Montagu's Children, 861, 1753; Prison Dress, 1576, 1657, 1748
National Gallery Director, 32
Papers in Chief Secretary's Office, 569
Parliamentary Registration, 1233
Portal Veterinary Inspectors, 587
Prerogative of Mercy, 469
Ramelton Magistrates' Creeds, 19
Royal Irish Academy, 563
Saunderson, Colonel, Speech of, 1127
Seed Rate, Payment of, 479
Stock and Produce Statistics, 349, 874

Public Works—Distress, Drainage, &c.

- Achill Viaduct*, 679
Clare Island Evictions, 975, 986
Claremorris and Collooney Railway, 486

[cont.]

IRELAND—Public Works—cont.

- Congested Districts Boards—Gartan*, 576; Sligo, 567; Ruskey, 1097; West Clare, 866
Drainage and Improvement of Land Bill, 1236
Innisboffin Distress, 29, 332
Innismurrey Island Pier, 568
Kinsale Pier Loan, 47, 1247
Lough Erne Drainage Scheme, 1770
Louisburg Pier, 34
Scariff Docks, 981, 1118, 1752
Seed Rate Payments, 479

Irish Academy Grant, 563

Irish Cattle Trade, 582

Irish Constabulary, Strength

- Q. Mr. Hayden, A. Mr. Jackson*, 354, 875; Promotion, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Jackson, 970

Irish County Courts Acts

- Q. Mr. Maurice Healy, A. Mr. Madden*, 485

Irish Education Bill

- Q. Mr. Flynn, A. Mr. Jackson*, 1121; Q. Sir J. McKenna, A. Mr. Jackson, 1780

Irish Grand Juries

- Q. Mr. T. W. Russell, A. Mr. Madden*, 1760

Irish National Gallery Director

- Q. Sir T. Esmonde, A. Mr. Jackson*, 32

Irish Parliament House

- Q. Mr. Crilly, Mr. T. W. Russell, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour*, 1648

Irish Teachers' Pension Fund

- Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Sir J. Gorst*, 1866

ISAACS, Mr. Lewis H., Newington, Walworth

- Debts of Volunteer Regiments*, 12

Islington Vestry, Medical Officer

- Q. Dr. Farquharson, A. Mr. Ritchie*, 342

JACKSON, RIGHT HON. W. L. (Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland), Leeds, N.

- Access to State Papers*, 554
Applications under Land Purchase Act of 1891, 249, 250
Arklow Open-air Preaching, 362
Ballyscully School Teacher's Dismissal, 14
Bandon, Unsanitary Houses, 1653
Belfast Constabulary Barracks, 350
Belfast Dispensary Doctors, 1097
Belfast Valuation, 478
Bradshaw, Mr., Prosecution of, 849
Butter Adulteration, 1570
Catholic Magistrates, &c., Donegal, 1114

[cont.]

JACKSON, Right Hon. W. L.—cont.

Catholic Clergy at Poor Law Elections, 875
 Cattle Diseases Fund, 366
 Cavan Justices as ex-officio Guardians, 344
 Cavan, Land Cases, Delay, 1769
 Clare Island Evictions, 840, 975, 978, 989, 992, 999
 Claremorris and Collooney Railway, 486
 Congested Districts, West Clare, 866; Ruskey, 1097
 Constabulary Force in Ireland, 353, 876
 Convicts' Work, Mountjoy Prison, 1763
 Coogan and Police Assault, 1117
 Cork Board of Guardians, 1656; Mr. Fitzgerald, 1757
 Cork Court House, 1123
 Cork Fair Rent Applications, 1098
 Cork Lunatic Asylum and Medical Students, 361; Contracts, 1567, 1568
 County Lunatic Asylum Expenses, 1569
 Criminal Law and Procedure Act, 1887, 560
 Drainage and Improvement of Land (Ireland) Bill, Intro. 1296
 Drift Fishing in Suir, 1116
 Drumond Police Hut, &c. 677, 678
 Dublin, Cattle Disease in, 1564
 Dublin Metropolitan Police, 30
 Dundrum Asylum, 969
 Erasmus Smith Endowment, 1755
 Evicted Tenants, Re-instating, 1576
 Fair Rent Appeals, 40
 Fish Destruction, Irish Coast, 1294
 Fishery Piers and Boat Slips, 865, 866
 Fishing Boats built in Ireland, 365, 881
 Galway Infirmary Commission, 350
 Gorey Fair, Police Protection, 1244
 Great Seal for Ireland, 337
 Guillamore's, Lord, Estate, 1758
 Gun Licence Refusal, 467
 Gweedore Evictions, 52
 Handley, James, Sentence on, 1130
 Hehir, Convict, Insanity of, 1562
 Indoor and Outdoor Prison Work, 1568
 Influenza in Irish Schools, 1287
 Innisboffin, Distress at, 29, 332; Rate Collector at, 29
 Irish Constabulary Promotion, 970
 Irish Education Bill, 1122, 1780
 Irish Fisheries Report, 470
 Irish Model Schools Dietary, 1760
 Irish National Gallery Director, 32
 Kerry Sub-Commission, 1098
 Kilworth Water Supply, 1652
 Labourers' Cottages—Bandon Union, 40; Mallow, 479; Roscrea Union, 17; Mountmellick, 483; Complaints, 864; Sligo, 1577
 Land Commission Office Staff, 560
 Land Commission Registrars, &c. 1094
 Land Commissioners, Assistant, 1099
 Landed Proprietors, Return of, 878
 Letterilly Estate, Evictions on, 472
 Letterkenny Lunatic Asylum, 1117
 Limerick Fishery Board, 692
 Lisburn, Sub-Commission for, 875
 Manorhamilton Poor Law Elections, 1241
 Margarine Sold as Butter, 1569
 Martin, Inspector, Murder of, 1236
 Medical Officer, Tallow District, 679
 Mohill Poor Law Elections, 1096
 Mrs. Montagu's Prison Dress, 1576, 1657, 1748
 Muldooney and Finnigan, 841

JACKSON, Right Hon. W. L.—cont.

Nally's Inquest, Witnesses, 338, 339, 839, 840
 O'Leary in Mountjoy Prison, 682, 1563, 1763
 Parliamentary Registration, Ireland, 1233
 Police Violence at Belfast, 971
 Poor Law Schools (Ireland) Bill, Intro. 1227
 Portadown Disturbances, 351
 Prison Warders, Creed of, 181
 Prerogative of Mercy, Ireland, 469
 Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act (1891) Amendment Bill, 254, 272, 285, 286, 298
 Queen's College, Students' Holidays, 868
 Ramelton Magistrates' Creeds, 19
 Ruskey as a Congested District, 1098
 School Grants, Allocation of, 868, 979
 Scottish Law of Settlement, 1242
 Searching People in Streets, 871
 Seed Rate, Payment of, 479
 Stock and Produce Statistics, 349, 874
 Trawlers, Foreign, Irish Waters, 841, 842
 Unclassed Teachers, Irish Schools, 9
 Waterford County Police Promotion, 691
 Westmeath Constabulary, 339

Jamaica, Telegraphic Communication

Q. Mr. Labouchere, A. Baron H. de Worms, 1099; Q. Mr. Labouchere, Dr. Cameron, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1240

JAMES, Right Hon. Sir Henry, Bury, Lancashire

Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 1517
 Rating of Machinery Bill, 802
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 732

JAMES, Hon. W. H., Gateshead

Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 551
 National Gallery Report, 1237

Jebus, Treaty with, 24, 358, 834

JEFFREYS, Mr. A. F., Hants, Basingstoke

County Council Elections, 481
 Frozen Meat from Queensland, 482
 Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 135
 Rifle Range, Salisbury Plain, 1237
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 742
 Wantage's, Lord, Committee, 1573

Johnston, Commissioner, and Slave Trade

Q. Mr. A. E. Pease, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 585

JOHNSTON, Mr. W., Belfast, S.

Assistant County Surveyors (Ireland) Bill, 1746
 Ballycastle Mail Driver, 836
 Deaths in Convents, 329
 Dublin Metropolitan Police, 30
 Mrs. Montagu's Piety, 863
 Open-air Preaching, 362

JOICEY, Mr. J., Durham, Chester-le-Street
Rating of Machinery Bill, 770

JORDAN, Mr. Jeremiah, Clare, W.
Black, Thomas, Service of, 870
Claremorris and Collooney Railway, 486
Congested Districts, West Clare, 866
Enniskillen Postmaster, 484
Headquarters, 579, 867
Post Office Buildings, 866
Mullaghduin Cross Post, 485
Non-Registration of Birth by Mr. Bradshaw, 848, 849
Shannon, Protection of, 485, 867

Judges, Council of, 864

Jurors at Criminal Trials
Q. Mr. Cobb, A. Sir R. Webster, 1130

Jury Law Amendment Bill [c. No. 289]
Intro. Mr. Pitt-Lewis; Read 1^o, 1296

Jury Service and Volunteers, 1646

Justice North's Court
Q. Mr. Lewis Fry, A. Sir R. Webster, 41

Justice Romer's Illness, 1131

Juvenile Offender, Sentence on
Q. Mr. S. Smith, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 830

KEAY, Mr. J. Seymour, Elgin and Nairn

Accumulations Bill, 1740
Bulwunt Rao, Death of, 7
Fair Rent Appeals, 89
Indian Councils Act, 104, 1251, 1818, 1845, 1848, 1868, 1877
Indian Crops, 349
Labour Commission and Scotland, 1248
Night Poaching Sentence, 830, 1249
Puzzle Competitions, 25
Royal Palaces Vote, 503
Royal Parks Vote, 522
Spey Salmon Fishings, 830
Superannuation Acts Amendment Bill, 1857, 1859

KELLY, Mr. J. R., Camberwell, N.

Access to Mountains Bill, 1221
Accumulations Bill, 1738
Civil Service Copyists, 1644
Civil Service Examinations, 836
Customs Department Holidays, 877
Divorce Bill, 1446
Places of Worship (Sites) Bill, 1422, 1434
Rating of Machinery Bill, 775, 785
Trees (Ireland) Bill, 1744, 1745

Kenmare Fishery District
Q. Mr. Kilbride, A. Mr. Madden, 587

KENNAWAY, Sir John H., Devon, Honiton
Traffic Regulations, 162

KENNY, Mr. M. J., Tyrone, Mid
Evictions on Clare Island, 978
M'Hugh, Case of the Girl, 982

KER, Lord (see LOTHIAN, Marquess of)

KILBRIDE, Mr. D., Kerry, S.
Compulsory Sale of Land (Ireland), 213, 248
Fishery Piers and Boat Slips, Dingle Bay, &c. 865, 866
Kenmare Fishery, 587
Sweeney, John, 577

Kilmore Telegraphic Facilities
Q. Mr. Roche, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 680

Kilkenny Postal Deliveries
Q. Mr. M. Healy, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1112

Killinkere Murder Suspect
Q. Mr. Knox, A. Mr. Madden, 1775

Kilworth Water Supply
Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 1652

KIMBER, Mr. H., Wandsworth
Geodetic Bureau of Vienna, 37
London County Council (General Powers) Bill, 1546, 1550
Mining Royalties, 590
Submarine Sentry, 36

KIMBERLEY, Earl of
Sittings of the House, 457
Smoke Nuisance (Metropolis) Bill, 311
Technical and Industrial Institutions Bill, 316, 317

KING, Mr. H. S., Hull, Central
Army (Officers Service) Return, 139
Butcher, Captain, and Manipur, 1107
East India Uncovenanted Service, 752
Income Tax Assessments, 826
Medical Attendance, Indian Officers, 826
Regimental Mess and Band Funds, 1087, 1088

Kinsale Pier and Town
Q. Mr. Flynn, A. Sir J. Gorst, 47; Q. Mr. Morrough, A. Sir J. Gorst, Sir M. Hicks Beach, 1247

KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, Mr. H. T., Kent, Faversham

Cattle, Restrictions on Moving, 681
Cattle Importation, 149
Foot-and-Mouth Disease, 158
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 707, 731

KNOX, Mr. E. F. V., Cavan, W.
Business of the House, 1782
Cavan Justices, 344
Cavan Union, Costs, 880
Carriage of Irish Mails, 45
Compulsory Sale of Land (Ireland), 218
Land Cases in Cavan, 1769
Land Commission Statistics, 874
Land Purchase Amendment Act, 270

Knox, Mr. E. F. V.—cont.

Lough Erne Drainage, 1770, 1771
 Portadown Disturbances, 350
 Short Titles Bill, 1720
 Stock and Produce in Ireland, 849
 Trees (Ireland) Bill, 1744, 1745
 Weights and Measures (Purchase) Bill, 1715, 1716, 1717

Kurdish Cavalry Horses, 28LABOUCHERE, Mr. H., Northampton

Arbitration Treaties, 688
 Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 548
 Business of the House, 1259
 Dissolution, 503, 506, 511
 District Messenger Service, 1122
 Jamaica, Telegraphs to, 1099, 1240
 Morning Sittings, 601
 Mrs. Montagu's Children, 1758
 New Forest Rifle Range, 1772
 Parliamentary Registration, 1389
 Parliamentary Reporting, 1389
 Parliaments, Election and Dissolution of, 698
 "Regina v. Hurlbert," 1088
 Royal Palaces Vote, 491, 502
 School Teachers, Magistrates and Directors, 843
 Telephones, 177
 Tobacco Concession, Persia, 1390, 1391, 1776

Labour Commission (Scotland)

Q. Mr. G. W. Balfour, Mr. T. M. Healy, A. Sir J. Gorst, 985; Q. Mr. Seymour Keay, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1248; Hop-growing Counties, Q. Mr. Brookfield, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1777

Labourers' Cottages, Ireland

Bandon, Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 40;
Complaints of Guardians, Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 864; Mallow, Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 479; Mountmellick, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor, A. Mr. Jackson, 483, Mr. Madden, 569; Roscrea, Q. Mr. A. O'Connor, A. Mr. Jackson, 17; Sligo, Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 1577

Labourers (Ireland) Allotments Bill [c. No. 94]

1. Rep. with Amendt. 144
 Amendt. Rep. 319
 Read 3^a with Amendts. and passed, 530
 c. Lords Amendts. agreed to, 1449
 1. Returned from c., agreed to, 1749

Lagos Treaties

Q. Mr. Dalziel, A. Baron H. de Worms, 24;
 Q. Mr. Summers, A. Baron H. de Worms, 358, 833

LAMBERT, Mr. G., Devon, South Molton

Ground Game Bill, Intro. 671
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 1032

Lambeth Street Obstruction, 1644LAMINGTON, Lord

Collection of Letters, 141
 Post Cards, 141

Land Commission (Ireland)

Appointments, Q. Mr. MacNeill, Mr. T. M. Healy, A. Mr. Jackson, 1094; Clerks in Office, 560; Registrars, 1095; Salaries, Q. Mr. Sexton, Mr. T. M. Healy, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 157

Land Courts, Sub-Commissions

Cork, Q. Mr. M. Healy, A. Mr. Madden, 573, 1098; Delays, 567; Kerry, 1098; Cavan, 1769; Number of Commissions, 1099

Landed Proprietors, Ireland

Q. Mr. J. Morley, A. Mr. Jackson, 878

Land Purchase Act, 1891

Applications under, Q. Mr. Sexton, Mr. T. W. Russell, A. Mr. Jackson, 249; Succession Duty, Q. Sir T. Eamonde, A. Mr. Madden, 871; Returns, Q. Mr. J. E. Ellis, A. Mr. Madden, 1297

LAWRENCE, Sir Trevor, Surrey, Reigate
County Council Election Ties, 1645LAWRENCE, Mr. W. J., Liverpool, Abercromby

Bombay Opium Sellers, 849
 English and French Protectorates, West Africa, 1108, 1109

LAWSON, Mr. Harry L. W., St. Pancras, W.

Benefit Societies Circulars by Post, 1754
 Gallery of British Art, 829
 London County Council (General Powers) Bill, 1539, 1552
 Places of Worship (Sites) Bill, 1433
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 1218

LAWSON, Sir Wilfrid, Cumberland, Cockermouth

County Council Election Ties, 1645
 Local Boards and Petitions, 1751

LEA, Mr. Thomas, Londonderry, S.

Land Purchase Amendment Act, 260
 Private Bill Fees, 368

Lee-Metford Rifle, 1102LEFEVRE, Right Hon. J. G. Shaw, Bradford, Central

Army and Navy Expenditure Returns, 1082
 Budget, 1175, 1176
 Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 134
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 732, 1181, 1188, 1203
 Westminster Abbey Commission Report, 690

LEGH, Mr. T. W., Lancashire, S.W., Newton
 Nonconformist Marriages, 881

LEIGHTON, Mr. Stanley, Shropshire, Oswestry
 Local Taxation, 588
 Yellow Fever on the "Atlas," 482

LENG, Mr. J., Dundee
 American Mails Contract, 335
 Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1728, 1732
 Control of Domestic Affairs (England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales), 1691 Crimean Veterans, 151
 Line-Throwing Guns, 336
 Royal Palaces Vote, 519
 Truant Schools for Scotland, 150

Legal Costs, Income Tax Claims, 695

LEON, Mr. H. S., Bucks, N.
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 638

Letter Cards
Q. Mr. Morton, 212, Mr. H. Heaton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 465

Letterilly Estate Tenants
Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 472

Letterkenny District Asylum
Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 1116

Letters for Members, 1110

LEWIS, Mr. George Pitt-(see PITT-LEWIS)

LEWIS, Mr. Thomas, Anglesey
 Holyhead Harbour, 563

Lewis
 Harbour of Refuge, 1800, 1581
 Militiamen and Naval Reserve, 1574, 1575
 Postal and Telegraph Service, 1579

Liability of Post Office, 480

Libraries for Villages
Q. Mr. H. Gardner, A. Sir W. H. Dyke, 1772

Licences
 Gun Licence, Ireland, 467
 Public Houses at Shoreditch, 27
 Postage Stamps, 466
 Sheep Dogs, 363

Life-Savin Appliances
 On Board Ships, 396
 In Case of Fire, 582

Light on Clock Tower, 692

LIMERICK, Earl of (Lord FOXFORD)
 Chairman of Committees (Lords), 305

Limerick
Fishery Board, Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Mr. Jackson, 692.
Postmastership, Q. Mr. Sheehan, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1090; Sub-Post Office, Q. Mr. O'Keefe, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 861

Line-Throwing Guns
Q. Mr. Leng, A. Sir M. Hicks Beach, 336

Lisburn, Sub-Commission for
Q. Mr. T. W. Russell, A. Mr. Jackson, 875

Lismore Union Medical Officer
Q. Mr. Webb, Mr. Sexton, Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 678

LLEWELLYN, Mr. E. H., Somerset, N.
 Royalties on Gold Mines, 49
 Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 637, 646, 739

LLOYD-GEORGE, Mr. D., Carnarvon, &c.
 Business of the House, 984
 Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill, 369, 1593, 1606
 Grants to Fishery Harbours, 208
 Military Lands Consolidation, 133

Loanda Trade Report
Q. Mr. Neville, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 18

Loans Repayment, Annuity System,
 592

Local Authorities (Acquisition of Land) Bill

1. Debated, 460; Read 2^a, 463
Com. rep. and re-com. 673

Local Authorities and Tramways
 Standing Order Amendt. 325, 525

Local Authorities, Borrowing Powers
Q. Mr. Cobb, A. Mr. Ritchie, 343

Local Boards and Sunday Closing
Q. Mr. Gray, Sir W. Lawson, A. Mr. Stuart Wortley, 1751

Local Government Act, 1888 (Compensation Appeals) Return, 139

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD

President—Right Hon. C. T. Ritchie

Secretary—Mr. W. H. Long

Alkali Works Bill, 965

Allotment Land Sold, 148; Bill, 1746; Act of 1887, 35, 368

Borrowing Powers, Local Authorities, 343

[cont.]

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—cont.

Control of Domestic Affairs (England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales), Motion, 1684-1714

County Councils—Candidate's Death, 482; Election Ties, 1645; Legislation, 142; Loans, 592; Polling Places, 1388; Reigate, Casting Vote, 147; Sub-Postmasters Ineligible, 467

Imbeciles, Support of, 348

Insanitary Area, Westminster, 834

Local Government Provisional Orders Bills, 1068, 1745

London County Council Bill, 1533-1566

London Water Bill, 817; Water Supply, 473

Medical Inspectors, Wales, 48, 1771

Medical Officer, Islington, 342

Ordnance Survey, Rothwell, 863

Public Health Amendment Act, 343

Rating of Machinery Bill, 803

Schoolmasters' Extra Duties, Payment for, 1091

Smallpox—London, 972; Dewsbury, &c., 1654

Vaccination Commission, 1385

Vaccine Lymph, 832

Vestrymen's Qualification, 847

Local Government (Ireland) Bill

Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 51

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Order (No. 1) Bill

l. Read 2^a, 813

Com. rep. without Amendt. 1749

Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders

Bill (No. 2) [c. No. 298]

„ (No. 3) [c. No. 299]

„ (No. 4) [c. No. 300]

„ (No. 5) [c. No. 301]

Intro. Mr. Madden; Read 1^o, 1531

Local Government Provisional Orders

Bill (No. 1) [c. No. 266]

„ (No. 2) [c. No. 267]

„ (No. 3) [c. No. 268]

Intro. Mr. Long; Read 1^o, 1083

Read 2^a, and com. 1745

Bill (No. 4) [c. No. 305]

„ (No. 5) [c. No. 306]

„ (No. 6) [c. No. 307]

Intro. Mr. Long; Read 1^o, 1745-6

Local Government (Scotland) Order (Glasgow), &c. Bill [l. No. 56]

Pres. Lord Ker; Read 1^a, 144.

Read 2^a, 813

Local Taxation

Q. Mr. Stanley Leighton, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 588

LOCKWOOD, Mr. Frank, York

Breach of Privilege—Railway Servants Hours Com. 942

London County Council Finance

Q. Mr. J. Stuart, A. Mr. Goschen, 44, 592

London County Council (General Powers) Bill

Debated 1533, Amendt. 1542

Read 2^a, and com. to Select Com. 1556

London Water (No. 1) Bill

Debated, 814

c. Read 2^a, 823

London Small Arms Company

Q. Mr. Cuningham Graham, A. Mr. Brod- rick, 1102

London University, Senate of

Q. Mr. Summers, A. Mr. Matthews, 1122

London Water Supply

Q. Sir R. Temple, A. Mr. Ritchie, 473

LONG, MR. W. H. (Secretary to the Local Government Board), Wilts, Devizes

Allotments Provisional Order Bill, Intro- 1746

Butter, Adulteration of, 1773

Local Government Provisional Orders Bill

Intro. (Nos. 1, 2, 3) 1083, 1084; (Nos. 4, 5, 6), 1745

Salaries to Schoolmasters employed in other Duties, 1091

Welsh Medical Inspectors, 1771

Longford Post Office

Q. Mr. Maurice Healy, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 690

LORD ADVOCATE (see PEARSON, Sir C. J.)LORD CHANCELLOR (see HALSBURY, Lord)*Loss of Life by Fires

Q. Mr. Dixon-Hartland, A. Mr. Matthews, 582

LOTHIAN, MARQUESS OF (LORD KER) (Secretary for Scotland)

Bills affecting County Councils, 143

Local Government (Scotland) Order (Glas- gow, &c.) Bill, pres. 144

Louisburg Pier

Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Sir J. Gorst, 34

Telegraphic Communication, Q. Mr. W. O'Brien, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1767

LOWTHER, Right Hon. James, Thanet, Kent

Business of the House, 1252, 1390
Coast Communications, 1417
Government Contracts, 473
London County Council (General Powers) Bill, 1554
Morning Sittings, 1670
Russian Jewish Emigrants, 146, 475

LOWTHER, Mr. J. W. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Cumberland, Penrith

Arbitration Treaties, 684
Armenians and Kurdish Cavalry, 28
Behring Sea Fishery, 155, 1301
Johnston, Consul, and Slave Trade, 585
Loanda Trade Report, 18
Mombasa Railway, 1768
Niger, French Protectorate, 1110
Oil Rivers Territory, 1750
Persian Tobacco Concession, 1390, 1391
Red Sea Littoral, Tokar Taxes, 858
Russian Jews, Exodus of, 146
San Quintin Harbour, 1130
Uganda, Fighting in, 1571, 1572, 1769
Venezuela Insurrection, 1755

LOWTHER, Hon. William, Westmoreland, Appleby

Fever in St. John's Wood Barracks, 339

LUBBOCK, Right Hon. Sir John, London University

Bank Holiday at Post Offices, 827
Budget, 1176
London County Council (General Powers) Bill, 1542, 1547, 1548
London Water (No. 1) Bill, 2R. 814, 823
Shops (Weekly Half-Holiday) Bill, 1082

Lunatic Asylums, Ireland

Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 1568

LYELL, Mr. L., Orkney and Shetland

Fishery Disturbances, Shetland, 1756
Harbour Lights, 584

MACARTNEY, Mr. W. G. E., Antrim, S.

Criminal Law Procedure Act, 559
Home Rule Motion, 1658, 1660
Land Purchase Amendment Act, 277, 282

MACINNES, Mr. M., Northumberland, Hexham

Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill, 1633

MACKINTOSH, Mr. C. Fraser-, Inverness-shire

Civil Courts and Crofters Commission, 675
Crofters Act, 147
Procurator Fiscal, Tobermory, 674

MACLEAN, Mr. J. M., Oldham

Indian Councils Act, 64, 84, 1349, 1350, 1355, 1359

MACLURE, Mr. J. W., Lancashire, S.E., Stretford

Breach of Privilege (Railway Servants Hours), 883, 884

MACNAGHTEN, Lord

Inland Revenue Solicitor, 330
Technical and Industrial Institutions Bill, Pres. 6; 313, 316, 318, 527, 530

MACNEILL, Mr. J. G. Swift, Donegal, S.

Armagh Asylum Architect, 574
Business of the House, 1253
Butter, Adulteration of, 1772
Civil Servants, Retirement of, 573
Certificates of Character, 471
Cleary, Mr. 561
Coll, William, Sentence on, 1236
Criminal Law Procedure Act, 559
Evictions at Gweedore, 51
Famine in India, Precautions, 1104 Fisheries Reports, 470
Glenbeigh Artillery Range, 1119
Handley, James, 469
Indian Councils Act; 87, 92; Amendment Bill, 1328, 1334, 1335, 1342, 1346, 1352, 1376, 1382
Indian Official Emoluments, 470
Jurors unnecessarily summoned, 1761
Land Commission, 560
Land Commission Officials, 1094, 1096
Letterilly Estate Tenants, 472
Letterkenny Lunatic Asylum, 1116
Madras Famine, 365
Martin, Inspector, Murder, 1236
Members' Letters, Re-direction, 1110
Military Candidates, 19
Mountjoy Prison, Visit to, 1764
Officials on Indian Census, 9
Olphert Estate, 574
Railway Servants Hours—Breach of Privilege, 957
Ramelton Petty Sessions, 19
Roman Catholic Magistrates, Donegal, 1114
Searching people in the Street, 871
Septennial Act, 1064
Shamrock, Wearing the, 553, 832
State Papers, Access to, 554
Unclassed Teachers, Irish Schools, 9

MCCARTAN, Mr. M., Down, S.

Barnmeen Post, 477
Mrs. Montagu's Children, 1753
Moorgate Street Telegraph Office, 472
Pauper Removal, Scotland to Ireland, 1242

MCCARTHY, Mr. Justin, Londonderry

Compulsory Sale of Land, Ireland, 246
Morning Sittings, 1671

MCDERMOTT, Mr., Kilkenny, N.

Gun Licences, 467

MCDONALD, Dr. R., Ross and Cromarty

Lewis Roads and Telegraphs, 1579
Militiamen of Lewis, 1575
Naval Reserve in Stornoway, 1574
Portnaguran Harbour of Refuge, 1800, 1581
Western Highlands Act, 1300, 1580

McKENNA, Sir Joseph N., Monaghan, S.
Divorce Bill, Amendt. 1443
Inhabited House Duty, 874
Irish Education Bill, 1780

M'LAGAN, Mr. Peter, Linlithgow
Gibraltar Sanitary Board, 844

McLAREN, Mr. W. S. B., Cheshire, Crewe

Breach of Privilege Committee, 599
Counts Out, to avoid, 879
Divorce Bill, 1448
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 1528
Railway Servants Hours, Breach of Privilege, 892, 929
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 726

McCarthy, James, Moneymore
Q. Mr. Flynn, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1125

McCoy, Daniel, Purchase of Farm, 1758

McHugh, Case of
Q. Mr. M. J. Kenny, A. Mr. Madden, 982

MADDEN, RIGHT HON. D. H. (Attorney General for Ireland), Dublin University

Access to State Papers, 554, 569
Armagh Asylum Architect, 574
Civil Bill Courts (Ireland) Bill, 1865
Civil Servants Retirements, 573, 574
Clanricarde, Lord, Seizure of Turf, 581
Compulsory Sale of Land (Ireland), 241
Congested Districts Board, Sligo, 567; Gartan, 576
Criminal Law and Procedure Act, 560
Cronin, Michael, Case of, 47
Dundalk Burial Board Loan, 161
French and Scotch Trawlers, Irish Coast, 587
Grand Juries, Inconvenience to, 1761
Gun Seized by Police, Sale of, 581
Handley's, James, Death Sentence, 591
Innismurray Island Pier, 568
Irish County Court Acts, 485
Irish Drainage Bill, 150
Kenmare Fishery—Removing Gravel, 587
Killinkere, Suspected Murderer, 1775
Labourers' Cottages, Mountmellick, 569
Land Purchase Act Returns, 1297
Land Courts, Delay in, 568; Cork Sub-Commissioners, 578
Local Government (Ireland) Provisional Orders Bills, Intro. 1531
M'Hugh, Assault on Girl, 982
Mrs. Montagu's Children, 861, 862, 1753
Murphy, James, Release of, 571
Nally, P. W., Inquest on, 571
Olphert Estate, Bailiff's Proceedings, 575
Papers in Chief Secretary's Office, 569
Payne's, Mr., Estate, Purchases on, 557
Portal Veterinary Inspectors, 587
Road Contracts in Ireland, 1132
Saunderson, Colonel, and Home Rule, 1127
Succession and Land Purchase Acts, 871
Sweeney, John, Case of, 578

VOL. III. [FOURTH SERIES.]

MADEN, Mr. J. H., Lancashire, Rossendale

Death Certificate, 161
Small Holdings Bill, 359

Madras, Scarcity in
Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Curzon, 365

Magistrates in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill [c. No. 108]

c. Read 2^o, 671
Com. R.P. 751

Magistrates, Names and Occupations
Q. Mr. Storey, A. Mr. Matthews, 829

MAGUIRE, Mr. T. R., Donegal, N.
Veterinary Inspectors, 587

MAHONY, Mr. P., Meath, N.
Poor Law (Indoor and Outdoor Relief), Ireland, Return moved for, 140

Mail Service (Ireland) Acceleration

Q. Mr. Sexton, Mr. M. Healy, Dr. Tanner, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 850, 852, 854; also 876, 966, 1039; Q. Dr. Tanner, Mr. M. Healy, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1113, 1223; also 1288-1290

MAKINS, Colonel W. T., Essex, S.W.
London Water (No. 1) Bill, 820, 822

MALCOLM, Colonel J. W., Argyllshire
Piers and Harbours, Scotland, 832
Stirling and Oban Mails, 833

Mallow, Labourers' Cottages, 479

Malta Militia Regiment
Q. Earl de la Warr, A. Earl Brownlow, 3

Maltby Telegraph Office
Q. Mr. A. Acland, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 982

Manipur and Captain Butcher, 1107

Manorhamilton Guardians Election
Q. Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Jackson, 1240

Margarine sold as Butter
Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 1569

Marine Boilers
Q. Mr. Mather, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 46

Marines, Quartermasters of, 856

MARJORIBANKS, Right Hon. E., Berwickshire

Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1261, 1729
Coast Communications, 1406
Education and Local Taxation Relief Bill,
615, 1796, 1823, 1833, 1834
Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill, 1221,
1257
Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Bill,
810, 1133

Marriages, Births, and Deaths (England)

General Abstract (1891) pres. 1228

Marriages of Nonconformists, 881

Married Women Bill [c. No. 81]
Com. R.P. 1226

Married Women, Poor Law Guardians
Q. Mr. Webb, A. Mr. Ritchie, 980

Martin, Inspector, Murder of Q. Mr. Blane, Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 1235

MASKELYNE, Mr. M. H. N. STORY-, Wilts, Cricklade
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 715

MATHER, Mr. W., *Lancashire, S.E., Gorton

Marine Boilers, 46
Rating of Machinery Bill, 770, 784, 790, 791

MATTHEWS, RIGHT HON. H. (Secretary of State for the Home Department), *Birmingham, E.

Anarchists from Continent, 681
Black, Inspector, Official Career, 22, 24, 345, 593
Cabs and Drivers in London, 1088
Chimney Sweepers Registration, 559
Confirmations in Asylums, 1120
Convict Clarke's Insanity, 150
Convictions of Clergymen, 48
Council of Judges Report, 864
Daly, John, Medical Treatment of, 342
Death Certificate Signature, 162
Deaths of Nuns in Convents, 329
Debtors, Committal of, 837
Durham and Extra Police, 855
Egan, Mitigation of Sentence, 1238, 1294
Fanny Gane's Sentence, 1089
Female Prisoners, 469
Fires at Hotels, 359
Flinthshire Magistrates, 8
Gallagher, Dr., Sanity of, 37, 39, 150, 970
Hughes, James, Reduction of Fine, 1573
Imprisonment with Flogging, 155
Licences at Shoreditch, 27
London University Senate, 1122
Loss of Life by Fires, 582
Magistrates, Boroughs and Counties, 829
Mines, Inspection by Workmen, 165
Mrs. Osborne's Case, 348
Poisonous Explosives, 1653

MATTHEWS, Right Hon. H.—cont.

Police, Control of, 369, 469; Re-arrangement of London Courts, 592
Prerogative of Mercy in Ireland, 469
Prevention of Crimes Act, 156
Probation of First Offenders Act, 8
Puzzle Competitions, 25
"Regina v. Hurlbert," 1089
Richardson and Egddell, Convicts, 1643
Roburite in Mines, 1653
Sentences, Anarchists and Dynamiters, 1108
Theatre Stages, Fire Escapes, 1566
World's End Meetings, Bails, 857

Mawddwy Railway Company

Q. Mr. T. E. Ellis, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 877

MAXWELL, Sir H. E. (a Lord of the Treasury), *Wigton

Achill Viaduct, Extra Cost, 680
Census Office Clerks, 566
Civil Service Volunteers at Easter, 675
Clerkships, Customs Statistical Department, 684
Royal Irish Academy, 563
Taxes (Regulation of Remuneration) Bill, 751

Medical Attendance, Indian Officers
Q. Mr. King, A. Mr. Curzon, 826

Medical Inspectors in Wales

Q. Mr. S. T. Evans, A. Mr. Ritchie, 48; Q.
Mr. O. Morgan, A. Mr. Long, 1771

Medical Officers of Volunteers, 567

Medical Students and Cork Lunatic Asylum, 361

Members Letters Re-directed

Q. Mr. Flynn, Mr. Mac Neill, Mr. Summers,
A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1110

Mercantile Marine Officers Hours

Q. Mr. Blane, A. Sir M. Hicks Beach, 1230

Merchant Shipping, Food, &c.

Q. Colonel Hill, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 879;
Q. Sir E. Harland, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 1387

Mercy, Prerogative of, Ireland

Q. Mr. Webb, Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 469

Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment
Bill [c. No. 229]

c. 2R. deferred, 670
Again deferred, 1222, 1295
Read 2^d, and Com. 1863

Merchant Shipping (Fishing Boats) Acts
Amendment Bill [c. No. 279]

Intro. Mr. Fenwick; Read 1st, 1227

Mess and Band Funds, 1087

Metropolitan Cabs and Cab Drivers

Q. Mr. Causton, A. Mr. Matthews, 1088

Metropolitan Police Courts

Q. Mr. T. H. Bolton, A. Mr. Matthews, 591

Metropolitan Police, Control of, 468

Metropolitan Police Provisional Order Bill [c. No. 274]

Intro. Mr. Stuart Wortley; Read 1^o, 1227

Mice or Voles in Scotland

Q. Mr. Hozier, A. Mr. Chaplin, 850; Q. Mr. M. Stewart, A. Mr. Chaplin, 1106; Q. Mr. Channing, A. Mr. Chaplin, 1386

MIDDLETON, Viscount

Smoke Nuisance (Metropolis) Bill, 305

Midwives Registration

Select Com. nominated, 1295

Military Cadets Character Certificates

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Brodrick, 20, 471

Military Chaplain, Roorkee, Bengal

Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Baron H. de Worms, 971

Military Headquarters, Enniskillen, 579

Military Lands Consolidation Bill

Q. Sir. E. Birkbeck, Mr. Flynn, A. Mr. Brodrick, 163

Military Lands Consolidation Bill [c. No. 184]

2R. Debate, 131, Divisions, 137, Adj. 138

Militiamen of Lewis

Q. Dr. McDonald, A. Mr. Brodrick, 1575

Militia Subalterns Exams.

Q. Mr. D. Sullivan, A. Mr. Stanhope, 865

MILNER, Sir F., Nottingham, Bassetlaw

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 750

MI. VAIN, Mr. T., Durham

Breach of Privilege—Railway Servants Com. 900, 904, 944, 957

Mines, Workmen's Inspectors

Q. Mr. Burt, A. Mr. Matthews, 165

Mining Easements Bill [c. No. 260]

Intro. Mr. Atherley-Jones; Read 1^o, 752

Mining Royalties

Q. Mr. Llewellyn, Mr. A. O'Connor, A. Mr. Goschen, 50; Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. Kimber, Mr. A. O'Connor, Mr. Pritchard Morgan, A. Mr. Goschen, 588-591; Q. Mr. Pritchard Morgan, Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Mr. Goschen, 689; Q. Mr. Howell, A. Mr. Goschen, 828; Q. Mr. Pritchard Morgan, A. Baron H. de Worms, 858; Q. Mr. Paulton, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 881

Missing Post Parcel, 556

Mohill Poor Law Elections

Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Jackson, 1096

Mombasa Railway

Q. Sir W. Harcourt, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 1768

Money Orders, Hours of Issue

Q. Mr. J. H. Heaton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 152

Money Orders Stopped, 557

Montagu, Mrs.

Custody of Children, Q. Mr. Labouchere, McCartan, Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Madden, 1753

Further Charges—Q. Colonel Saunderson, Mr. A. O'Connor, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. Johnston, Mr. Conybeare, Mr. Norris, A. Mr. Madden, Sir R. Webster, 861, 863

Prison Dress, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Jackson, 1576, 1657; Q. Dr. Tanner, Colonel Nolan, A. Mr. Jackson, 1746, 1748

Moorgate Street Telegraph Office

Q. Mr. McCartan, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 472

MORGAN, Right Hon. G. Osborne, Denbighshire, E.

Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 540
Colonial Police and Attack on Tambi, 696
Gambia, Fighting at Toniataba, 1779
Pahang, Rising in, 1126
Places of Worship (Sites) Bill, 1431
Welsh Medical Inspectors, 1771

MORGAN, Mr. J. Lloyd, Carmarthen, W.

Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill, 1611

MORGAN, Mr. Octavius V., Battersea

Board of Trade Returns, 1105
Indian Councils Act, 118
Russian Jewish Emigrants, 146

MORGAN, Mr. W. Pritchard, Merthyr Tydvil

Dolgelly, Treasure Trove at, 1763
Mining Royalties, 591, 689; in Colonies, 859
Ore Extracted, Welsh Mines, 870

MORLEY, EARL OF (Chairman of Committees)

Bills for Incorporated Railway Companies, 526
Local Authorities and Tramways, 525

MORLEY, Right Hon. John, Newcastle upon-Tyne

Business of the House, 49, 486
Irish Landed Proprietors, 878
Ordnance Factory Bill, 51

Morning Sittings (see PARLIAMENT, COMMONS).

MORRISON, Mr. Walter, York, W.R., Skipton

Pleuro-Pneumonia, 21

MORROGH, Mr. J., Cork Co., S.E.

Bandon Postal Services, 1246
Kinsale Town and Pier, 1247

MORTON, Mr. A. C., Peterborough

Accumulations Bill, 1739
Business of the House, 488, 983; Morning Sittings, 600, 601
Cathedral Churches and Charities, 347
Coast Communications, 1577
Dissolution, 512
Hood, Mr. John, Compensation for, 1124
Indian Councils Act (1861) Amendment Bill, 1815, 1844, 1870, 1880
Letter Cards, 212
Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 131, 185
Morning Sittings, 1682
Privilege, Breach of, 598
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 728
Superannuation Acts Amendment (No. 2) Bill, 1854, 1856, 1859
Supply—Royal Palaces Vote, 489, 491, 492, 500, 516, 518, 520
Tithe Rent Charge, 346
Witnesses Protection Bill, 1861

Mountjoy Prison, Convicts' Treatment, 1763

Mountmellick, Labourers Cottages at, 483, 568

MOWBRAY, Right Hon. Sir J. R., Oxford University

Committee of Selection Nominations, 1641
Tithe Rent Charge, 346

Muldooney and Finnigan, Convicts

Q. Colonel Nolan, A. Mr. Jackson, 840

Mullaghduin Cross Postal Facilities

Q. Mr. Jordan, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 485

MUNDELLA, Right Hon. A. J., Sheffield, Brightside

Dolgelly Treasure Trove, 1762
Evening School, Grants to, 842
Handsworth, School Board for, 1121

Murphy, James, Release of
Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Madden, 571

MURRAY, Mr. A. GRAHAM (Solicitor General for Scotland), Buteshire Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 440

Nally, P. W., Inquest on

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Storey, A. Mr. Jackson, 338; Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Madden, 571; Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Jackson, 839, 840

National Debt Return, 811

National Education (Ireland)
Return asked for (Mr. Sexton), 1864

National Gallery Report
Q. Mr. James, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1237

Native Races and Spirituous Liquor, 41

Naval Artillery Volunteers
Q. Colonel Howard Vincent, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 330

Naval Officers and Christ's Hospital
Q. Commander Bethell, A. Sir S. Northcote, 580

Naval Reserve Men, Stornoway
Q. Mr. McDonald, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 1574

Navy (Victualling Yard Manufacturing Accounts, 1890-91)
Annual Accounts pres. 1383

Navy (Hydrographer's Report)
Copy pres. for 1891, 1449

NAVY (see ADMIRALTY)

"Aurora" Breakdown, 584
Coastguard Officers' Widows, 981
Character-Notes, Dockyards, 352
Cruisers Employed, Slave Trade, 586
Devonport Yard and Factory Act, 882
Discharge of Workman, Chatham, 856
Efficient Ships, &c., Numbers, 570
Engine Room Artificers, 1129; Complements, 1243
Haulbowline Dockyard, 688, 1118
Hydrographer's Report pres. 1449
Marine Boilers, 46
Naval Artillery Volunteers, 330
Naval Officers and Christ's Hospital, 580
Quartermasters, Royal Marines, 856
"Royalist" at Solomon Islands, 33
Shamrock Wearing by Seamen, 16, 691
Stornoway Naval Reserve Men, 1574
Submarine Sentry, 86

NAVY—cont.

Thornycroft, Messrs., and Ransome's Sub-Contract, 26

"Triumph," Guardship, Repairs to, 1567

Victualling Stores, 1129

Victualling Yard Accounts pres. 1883

NEVILLE, Mr. R., Liverpool, Exchange

Loanda Trade Report, 18

Ulverston Postmastership, 18

NEWARK, Viscount, Notts, Newark

Infantry Drill, New, 860

New Forest Rifle Range

Q. Mr. Labouchere, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 1772

Newspaper Attacks by Anarchists

Q. Mr. Darling, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1251

Newtownards Guardians Protest, 1242

Niger, Possessions on, 1109

Night Poaching Sentence, Nairn

Q. Mr. Seymour Keay, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 881

NOLAN, Colonel J. P., Galway, N.

Christian Brothers Schools, 1292

Control of Domestic Affairs (Ireland, Scotland, and Wales), 1706

Depôt Officers' Pay, 19

Highland Regiments' Uniforms, 13

Indian Councils Act, 1863, 1868

Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 138

Mrs. Montagu, 1747

Muldooney and Finnigan, 841

Trawling in Irish Waters, 586, 841, 1291

Wearing of the Shamrock, 367

Nonconformists, Marriages of

Q. Mr. Legh, A. Sir B. Webster, 981

Non-Registration of a Child, 848

NORRIS, Mr. E. S., Tower Hamlets, Limehouse

Clerkship, Customs Statistical Department, 684

Mrs. Montagu's Case, 863

NORTHCOTE, Hon. Sir Stafford H., Exeter

Cathedral Churches and Charities, 347

Charity Trustees, 360

Naval Officers and Christ's Hospital, 580

North's, Justice, Court, 41

NORTON, Lord

Technical and Industrial Institutions Bill, 527

Nuns, Deaths in Convents, 329

Oban Mail Service, 833

O'BRIEN, Mr. Patrick, Monaghan, N.

Athletics at Queen's College, 869

Black, Inspector, 346

Business of the House, 489

Charge-Taker, General Post Office, Dublin, 10

Clock Tower Signal Light, 1750

Coast Communications, 159

Coastguard Officers' Widows Pensions, 981

Convict Clarke, 149

Cork Guardian, Forged Proxy, 1757

Cyclists in Hyde Park, 846

Depôt Officers Pay, &c., 163

Destitute Irish Poor, 1242

Dundalk Burial Board, 160

Dundrum Asylum, 969

Evicted Tenants, Re-instatement, 1576

Egan, Sentence on, 1103, 1238, 1293

Foxford Postman's Pay, 970

Gallagher, Dr., 37, 150, 969

Great Seal for Ireland, 337

Guillamore's, Lord, Estate, 1758

Haulbowline Dockyards, 1119

Irish Constabulary Promotion, 969

Mrs. Montagu—Governess, 863; Railway Travelling, 1576; Charge of Children, 1753

Missing Post Parcel, 556

Murder of Inspector Martin, 1236

Nally, P. W., Death of, 338, 839

Police Constable's Violence, 1117

Prison Labour for Thomas O'Leary, 1563

Regimental Canteen Stores, 12, 337

Regina v. Hurlbert, 1089

Royal Palaces Vote, 503, 516

Rural Postmen's Pensions, 877

Saunderson, Colonel, and Home Rule, 1127

Seduction Bill, Intro. 454

Sorting Clerk, Dublin Office, 11

Stamps, Sale of, 466

State Papers, Access to, 554

Sunday Duty, Post Office, 1758

Theatre Stage Exits, 1566

Wearing the Shamrock—Soldiers, 15; Seamen, 553

O'BRIEN, Mr. William, Cork Co., N.E.

Chief Secretary's Office, 569

Criminal Law and Procedure Act, 560

Digby, William, Tynan, 159

Evictions on Clare Island, 840, 975, 986, 1000, 1002, 1004

Foreign Steam Trawlers, 841, 842

Irish Academy, 563

Louisburg, Telegraph to, 1767

Mountjoy Prison Treatment, 1763, 1764

Nally, Mr. P. W. 571

O'CONNOR, Mr. Arthur, Donegal, E.

Army Regulations, 872, 873

Cattle Diseases Fund, 866

Constabulary, Royal Irish, 354

Egypt and Tokar District, 858

Gartan Electoral Division, 575

Inland Revenue Supervisor, 484

Labourers Cottages, Roscrea, 17; Mountmellick, 483, 568

Mining Royalties, 49, 590, 591

Mrs. Montagu's Case, 862

Overtime Allowances, Messengers, &c. 1775

O'CONNOR, Mr. John, Tipperary, S.

Black, Inspector, 345, 593
 Business of the House, 1780, 1781
 Chicago Exhibition, 42, 696
 Control of Police, 370, 468
 Daly, John, 341
 Gallagher, Dr., 38
 Gold Coast Prisoners, 1764, 1765
 Hehir, Lunatic Convict, 975, 1562
 Light on Clock Tower, 692
 Limerick Fishery Board, 692
 Mining Royalties, 588, 591, 689
 O'Leary in Mountjoy Prison, 682, 1763, 1764
 Target-Firing at Sea, 555
 "Triumph," Repairs to Guardship, 1567
 Wearing of the Shamrock, 16, 691

O'CONNOR, Mr. T. P., Liverpool, Scotland

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1289
 Gallagher, Dr., 39
 Railway Servants Committee—Breach of Privilege, Amendt. 890, 903, 905, 911
 Wearing of the Shamrock, 16

Officers Service (Army) Return, 139Officials, Payment of, 199*Oil Rivers Territory

Q. Mr. W. H. Cross, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 1750

O'KEEFE, Mr. Francis A., Limerick

Limerick Post Office, 861
 Prison Warders in Ireland, 481

O'KELLY, Mr. J. J., Roscommon, N.

Ruskey as a Congested District, 1097

Old Ford Rifle Works

Q. Mr. C. Graham, A. Mr. Brodrick, 1101

OLDBROYD, Mr. M., Dewsbury

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, Amendt. 708

O'Leary, Thomas, in Prison

Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Mr. Jackson, 682;
 Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Mr. Jackson, 1563; see also 1763

Oliver and Richards' Charities

Q. Mr. J. Collings, A. Sir S. Northcote, 360

Olphert Estate

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Madden, 574

Open-Air Preaching at Arklow

Q. Mr. Johnston, Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Jackson, 362

Opium Sellers in Bombay

Q. Mr. Lawrence, Q. Mr. Curzon, 849

Ordnance Factories (Army) Accounts

Pres. 140

Ordnance Factories Bill

Q. Mr. J. Morley, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 51

Ordnance Factories, Gratuities on Discharge, 872Ordnance Survey

Rothwell, 863
 Scarborough, 578
 Scotch Counties, 1107

Orkney and Shetland, Leading Lights

Q. Mr. Lyell, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 584

Ornamental Gardening in Parks, 1123Osborne, Mrs.

Q. Mr. H. Campbell, A. Mr. Matthews, 343

Outrages on Women in Trains

Q. Mr. E. Spencer, A. Sir M. Hicks Beach, 1244

Overtime in Post Office

Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1115

Overtime Pay, Government Offices, 1775Pahang Rebellion

Q. Mr. Osborne Morgan, A. Baron H. de Worms, 1126

Parcel Posts, Belfast and Dublin

Q. Dr. Fitzgerald, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 847;
 Cork, Q. Mr. Flavin, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1111

PARKER, Mr. C. S., Perth

Eastbourne Improvement Act Amendment Bill, 323
 Education and Local Taxation Relief Bill, 611, 616, 1812, 1847
 Secondary Education Grant, Scotland, 1238

ParliamentLORDS—*Business of the House

Easter Recess, Q. Obs. Earl of Kimberley, Marquess of Salisbury, 1 April, 457
 Evening Sitting, Alteration of Time, 2 May, 1749

Chairman of Committees

Lord Foxford (E. Limerick), in the Absence of Earl of Morley, 31 Mar., 305

Private Bills

Tramways, Amendment of Standing Order No. 133, 4 April, 525
 Standing Orders 92 and 93 suspended over Easter Recess, 7 April, 813

PARLIAMENT—Lords—cont.Sat First

31 Mar.—Lord Methuen, after the death of his father, 305

4 April.—Earl of Minto, after the death of his father, 525

2 May.—Lord Kilmarnock (Earl of Erroll) after the death of his father, 1749

COMMONS—Business of the House and Public Business

Q. Mr. J. Morley, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 28 Mar., 49; Q. Mr. Winterbotham, Mr. Sexton, Mr. F. S. Powell, Mr. J. Morley, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 28 Mar., 51; Q. Dr. Clark, A. Mr. Speaker, 29 Mar., 165; Q. Mr. Sexton, Mr. Collings, Dr. Tanner, Mr. Esslemont, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, Sir C. J. Pearson, 30 Mar., 304; Q. Sir W. Harcourt, Mr. Collings, Mr. M. Healy, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 371; Q. Mr. J. Morley, Mr. H. Gardner, Mr. Morton, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Cobb, Mr. T. E. Ellis, Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1 April, 486-489; Q. Mr. Morton, Mr. D. Thomas, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Wallace, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 4 April, 601; Q. Mr. Heneage, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Thomas Ellis, Mr. Broadhurst, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Lloyd-George, Mr. A. Sutherland, Mr. D. Thomas, Mr. Cox, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, Mr. Goschen, Mr. Jackson, 8 April, 983-985; Q. Mr. Thomas Ellis, Dr. Tanner, A. Sir J. Gorst, Sir M. H. Beach, 11 April, 1228; Q. Mr. J. Lowther, Mr. T. M. Healy, Mr. MacNeill, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Esslemont, Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 12 April, 1252-1255; Morning Sitting, Q. Mr. Cremer, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 12 April, 1294; Statement after Recess, Mr. A. J. Balfour, 25 April, 1384; Q. Mr. J. Lowther, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 26 April, 1390; Q. Mr. H. H. Fowler, Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 27 April, 1532; Q. Mr. H. Gardner, Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Sir W. Harcourt, Mr. T. W. Russell, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Bryce, Mr. S. Evans, Mr. Bartley, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 28 April, 1582-1584; Q. Mr. John O'Connor, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Joseph Bolton, Mr. Knox, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 2 May, 1780

Committees

Chairman's Panel, Selection, 29 April, 1641
Standing Com. on Trade, &c., Nomination of Members, 29 April, 1641

Members

Correction of Entry in Votes and Proceedings, Mr. T. W. Russell, 31 Mar., 372; Mr. Conybeare, 2 May, 1865
Omission of Vote, Dr. Tanner, 25 April, 1348

Miscellaneous

Counts Out, Tuesdays and Fridays, Q. Mr. McLaren, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 879

PARLIAMENT—Commons—Miscellaneous—cont.

Dissolution, Q. Mr. Picton, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 594

Reporting, Q. Mr. Labouchere, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1389

New Members Sworn

31 Mar.—Joseph Austen Chamberlain, Esquire, for Worcester, Eastern Division

2 May.—Thomas Usborne, Esquire, for Essex, Chelmsford Division

New Writ

25 April.—For Essex, Mid. or Chelmsford Division, v. W. J. Beadal, deceased

Palace of Westminster

Signal Light on Clock Tower, Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Plunket, 5 April, 692; Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Plunket, 2 May, 1750

Private Bills

Tramways, Amendt. of Standing Order No. 171, 31 Mar., 325

Railways, Omission of Clause under Standing Order No. 166A, 31 Mar., 327

Standing Orders No. 39, 129, suspended over Easter Recess, 12 April, 1295

Privilege

Railway Servants Hours Com., Notice, Sir M. H. Beach, 4 April, 595, 672; Mr. J. W. Maclure, Mr. J. F. Buckley, Mr. W. B. Hawkins, and Mr. J. Conacher, Ordered to appear at the Bar; Mr. Speaker's Admonition given, 7 April, 883-963

Sittings and Adjournment of the House

Morning Sitting for Consolidated Fund Bill, 28 Mar., 49

Morning Sittings, Motion, 4 April, 599; 1658

Easter Recess, Q. Mr. T. E. Ellis, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 4 April, 594; Q. Sir J. Pease, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 8 April, 983, 1084

Motion for Adjournment, 12 April, 1277, 1295

Tuesdays and Fridays, Morning Sittings, Motion Debated, 29 April, 1658-1693

Parliamentary Agents

Q. Mr. Mark Stewart, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 369

Parliamentary Elections (No. 2) Bill

[c. No 91]

Withdrawn, 965

Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill [c. No. 36]

c. Debated, 1453; Division 2R. put off six months, 1530

Parliamentary Registration

Q. Mr. J. Rowlands, Mr. Maurice Healy, Mr. Blane, A. Mr. Jackson, 1232; Q. Mr. Labouchere, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1389

Parliaments, Duration of, 698, 1043, 1050Passenger Ships, Fires on, 525

PAULTON, Mr. J. M., Durham, Bishop Auckland
Mining Royalties Commission, 881

"Pavonia," Steerage Accommodation, 1655Pay and Allowances, Depot Officers, 20*Payment of Public Officials
Discussion, Dr. Clark, 199

Payne, Mr. J. H., Estate of
Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Madden, 556

PEARSON, RIGHT HON. SIR C. J.
(Lord Advocate), Edinburgh and St. Andrew's Universities

Access to Mountains Bill, 1222

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1730, 1731, 1732, 1733, 1734, 1735, 1736, 1737

Civil Courts and Crofter Commission, 675

Crofters Act in the Hebrides, 147

Custody of Children, 572

Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 2R. 373, 401, 1784, 1787, 1808, 1816, 1817, 1819, 1820, 1823

Farm Servants Wages, 1229

Fishery Disturbances, Whalsay, 1756

Fleaneagan Children, 1090

Harbour Lights, Orkney, &c. 585

High Court of Justiciary (Scotland) Bill, Intro. 1384

Higher Class Schools, Inspectors, 1643; Grants, 1774

Housing of the Working Classes (Scotland) Bill, Intro. 1384

Illegitimacy in Scotland, 31, 1119

Inspector Scotch Fisheries, 1573

Juvenile Offender, Sentence on, 829

Nairn Poaching Sentence, 831, 1249

Piers and Harbours, Highlands, 832

Port Glasgow School Board, 329

Procurator Fiscal at Tobermory, 674

Procurators Fiscal, Duties of, 1558

Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Milnathort Water) Bill, Intro. 1296

Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Acts Amendment Bill, 1258, 1259

Sasine Office in Edinburgh, 563

School Boards Declared Illegal, 328

Scotch Burgh Police Bill, 304

Sea Fisheries Regulation Bill, 811

Secondary Schools Grants, 846, 1238

Sheriff Clerks Depute Bill, 811

Spey Salmon Fishings, 830

Taxation Grant Distribution, 685

Truant Schools for Scotland, 150

Unconvicted Prisoners at Work, 1557

Pearson, W. G., Prosecution of, 856

PEASE, Mr. A. E., York
Committal of Debtors, 837
Slave Trade, 585, 586

PEASE, Mr. H. Fell, Yorks, N.R.
Midwives' Registration, Select Com. 1295

PEASE, Sir Joseph W., Durham, Barnard Castle
Breach of Privilege — Railway Servants Hours Com. 948
Business of the House, 983

Peers and Elections

Q. Mr. T. M. Healy, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1128; also 1278-1287

PENN, Mr. John, Lewisham
Engineers in the Navy, 1242

Pensions

Coastguard Officers' Widows, 981
Crimean, &c. Veterans, 151
Rural Postmen, 877

Perring, Mr., Pay of, 353Persian Tobacco Concession

Q. Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Bryce, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 1390; Q. Mr. Labouchere, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1776

Petitions to Postmaster General

Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 572

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders

Memo. pres. [No. 139] 1083

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 1) Bill [c. No. 256]

Intro. Sir M. H. Beach; Read 1^o, 671

Pier and Harbour Provisional Orders (No. 2) Bill [c. No. 304]

Intro. Sir M. H. Beach; Read 1^o, 1640

Piers and Harbours (Ireland) (Expenditure, &c.), 752Piers and Harbours, Scotland

Q. Colonel Malcolm, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 833

PHILIPPS, Mr. J. W., Lanark, Mid

Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill, 1608
Education and Local Taxation Relief Bill, 609
Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 136
Privilege Questions, 599
Railway Servants Hours Com.—Breach of Privilege, 956
Royal Parks Vote, 521
Sheriff Clerks Depute Bill, 811

PICKARD, Mr. B., York, W.R., Normanton
Ordnance Survey, Rothwell, 863

PICKERSGILL, Mr. E. H., Bethnal Green,
S. W.
Eltham Woods, 1114
Imprisonment with Flogging, 155
Prevention of Crimes Act, 156

PICTON, Mr. J. A., Leicester
Birkenhead School Accommodation, 859
Budget, 1173
Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill, 370, 1634
Dissolution, 513, 594
Effective Ships of the Navy, 570
Gresham University, 1578
Indian Councils Act, 125
Railway Servants Hours—Breach of Privilege, Amendt. 951
Tottenham School Accommodation, 1249
Usibepu and Zululand, 1560
Zulu Prisoners, 1559

Pilotage Provisional Order Bill

a. Read 3^d, and passed, 303
l. Read 2^d, 813
Com. Rep. without Amendment, 1749

PINKERTON, Mr. J., Galway
Irish Cattle Trade, 152

PITT-LEWIS, Mr. G., Devon, Barnstaple
District Courts Bill, Intro. 1296
Jury Law Amendment Bill, Intro. 1296

Places of Worship (Sites) Bill [c. No. 135]
a. Debated, 1419; Read 2^d, 1436; com. to Select Com. 1437

Plague of Mice in Scotland, 849, 1106

Plain Post Cards
Q. Mr. Holden, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1574

PLAYFAIR, Right Hon. Sir Lyon,
Leeds, S.
Education and Local Taxation Relief Bill, 404

Pleuro-Pneumonia

Skipton, Q. Mr. Morrison, A. Mr. Chaplin,
21; Dublin, Q. Mr. Fitzgerald, A. Mr.
Jackson, 1564; Swine Fever, Q. Sir E.
Grey, A. Mr. Chaplin, 683

PLOWDEN, Sir William C., Wolverhampton, West
Indian Councils Act (1861) Amendment
Bill, 1326, 1338, 1339, 1346, 1364

Plumbers Registration Bill [c. No. 95]
Select Com. Rep., Bill Re-com. 1083
Com. R.P. 1383

PLUNKET, Right Hon. D. R. (First Commissioner of Works), Dublin University
Clock Tower Light, 692, 1750
Cyclists in Hyde Park, 846
Green Park, Flowers in, 1123
Sub-Contracts, Government Buildings, 564
Supply—Civil Services, 490, 491, 497, 502,
515, 519, 520, 521, 523
Westminster Abbey, Houses Adjoining, 690

Poaching Sentence at Nairn, 1249

Poisonous Explosives in Mines
Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Matthews, 1653

Police Court for St. Pancras, 591

Police, Minister Responsible for, 370, 468

Police Protection at Gorey, 1244

Police Regulations as to Carts
Q. Sir J. Kennaway, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 162

Police Violence, Belfast
Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Jackson, 971, 1117

Political Meetings, Soldiers at, 974

Political Prisoners, Gold Coast
Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Baron H. de Worms
1764

Poor Law Elections and Clergy, 875

Poor Law Guardians, Married Women as, 980

Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) (Qualification of Women) Bill [c. No. 302]
Intro. Mr. T. W. Russell; Read 1^o, 1532

Poor Law (Indoor and Outdoor Relief)
(Ireland), Return, 139

Poor Law (Ireland) Amendment Bill
l. Rep. without Amendt. 144
Read 3^a, and passed, 318

Poor Law Schools (Ireland) Bill [c. No.
276]
Intro. Mr. Jackson; Read 1^o, 1227

Poor Law Settlement, Scotland, 1242

Portadown, Disturbances at
Q. Mr. Knox, Colonel Saunderson, A. Mr. Jackson, 350; Rural Posts, 1106

Portal Veterinary Inspectors, Ireland
Q. Mr. Maguire, A. Mr. Madden, 587

Portnaguran, Harbour of Refuge
Q. Dr. McDonald, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1300, 1581

Postage Stamps, Sale of
Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 466

Postal Orders as Currency, 1385

Postal Surveyors
Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 572

Postmen's Good Conduct Pay
Q. Mr. Hammond, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 364

Post Cards, Unofficial
Q. Lord Lamington, A. Viscount Cross, 141

POST OFFICE

Postmaster General—Right Hon. Sir James Fergusson

American Mail Contract, 335, 685, 853

Australian Mails, 835

Australian Telegrams, 1085

Bank Holidays, Post Offices, 827

Circulars (Societies') by Post, 1754

Coast Communications, 1410, 1577

Counter Duties, Allowances for, 1231

Downham Telegraph Office, 13

Dundee and Edinburgh Mails, 1230

Express Letter Services, 340

Jamaica Telegraphic Communication, 1240

Letter Cards, Cost of, 465

Lewis Postal Facilities, 1580

Licences for Sale of Stamps, 466

Mail Cart Unloading, Accident through, 162

Mail Services, Correspondence, 876, 966

Members' Letters re-addressed, 1110

Missing Post Parcel, 556

Money Orders, Hours of Issue, 152

Officials and County Councils, 467

Overtime, Sorting Clerks, &c. 1115

Postal Clerks Petitions, 572

Post Cards, Plain or Unofficial, 141, 1574; Size of, 465

Post Office and Telephones—Debate, 170

Perring, Mr., Retirement of, 353

Re-direction of Letters, Free, 1773

Rural Postmen's Pensions, 877; Wages, 1125

Stamping Time of Collection, 142

Stirling and Oban Mails, 833

Stolen and Stopped Money Orders, 557, 1385

Surveyor, South East District, 353

Transferring Mails, 854

POST OFFICE—cont.

Ulverston Postmastership, 20

Vienna Postal Conference, 1232

West African Postage Rate, 1561

Ireland

Ballycastle Driver, 836

Bandon Mail Services, 1246

Barnmeen, 477

Cavan and Roscommon Railway, 45

Charge-taker, Dublin Post Office, 10

Cleary's, Mr., Family, 562

Cork Mail, Acceleration of, 685, 688

Digby, Discharge of, 160

Drinagh Outgoing Post, 364

Dublin Office Changes, 1111

Enniskillen Postmaster, 484

Ennis Post Office, 333, 866

Fenit Telegraph Station, 1125

Foxford Rural Post, 971

Irish Mails, Belfast and Cork, 1118; Correspondence, 967, 1113, 1223

Kilimore Telegraphs, 680

Kilkenny Service, 1112

Limerick Sub-office, 861

Limerick Postmastership, 1090

Longford Post Office, 690

Louisburg Telegraphs, 1767

Mullaghdun Cross, 485

Parcel Post, Belfast and Dublin, 847; Cork, 1112

Portadown Rural Posts, 1106

Sorting Clerk Conlan's Candidature, 11

Wexford Mail Service, 580, 1243

Telegraphs

Annual Accounts, 1757

Australian Rates, 1085

Downham Office, 13

Factory Hours, 565

Holidays, 26

Liability for Non-transmission, 480

Maltby Office, 982

Moorgate Street Clerks, Sickness and Meals, 478

Telephones, Motion, 166-199

POWELL, Mr. F. S., Wigan

Clergy Discipline Bill, 51

Places of Worship (Sites) Bill, 1424, 1436

POWELL WILLIAMS, Mr. J. (see WILLIAMS)

Powis Commission, Cost of

Q. Sir T. Esmonde, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1123

Prerogative of Mercy in Ireland, 463

Prices, Irish Stock, &c. 349, 874

PRIME MINISTER (see SALISBURY, Marquess of)

Printing Labour Commission Evidence, 985

Prisoners Evidence at Inquests, 338, 571

Prisoners, Female, Confinements, 349, 469

Prisoners, Unconvicted, Working of, 1557

Prison Labour, Indoor and Outdoor
Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Mr. Jackson, 1563

Prison Surgeons Salaries
Q. Dr. Clark, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1647

Prison Warders, Ireland
Q. Mr. O'Keeffe, Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Jackson, 481

Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, 813

Private Bills, " House " Fees, 368

Private Bills, Standing Order, 525

Private Bill Legislation (Expenses)
Return refused, 1224

Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill
Q. Mr. J. C. Bolton, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 883

Private Members Bills
Q. Mr. Dalziel, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 697

Privilege—Hours of Railway Servants, 595, 672, 698-701; 883-964

Probation of First Offenders Act
Q. Mr. S. Smith, A. Mr. Matthews, 8

" Problems of Greater Britain," 76, 89

Procurator Fiscal, Tobermory, 674

Procurators Fiscal, Duties of
Q. Dr. Clark, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 1558

Produce Prices in Ireland, 349

Protection of River Shannon, 485

Provincial Police, Control of, 370

Provisions on Merchant Ships, 1387

PROVAND, Mr. A. D., Glasgow, Blackfriars
Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1267
Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 602
Telegraphs, 192

Public Analysts in Police Burghs (Scotland) Bill [c. No. 225]
First Bill withdrawn, 1745
New Bill Intro.; Read 1^o, 1745

Public Authorities Protection Bill
1. Read 2^a, and com. 535
Rep. and Re-com. 813

Public Expenditure and Revenue
Account ordered, 1083

Public Health Amendment Act
Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Ritchie, 343

Public Health (Scotland) Provisional Order (Milnathort Water) Bill [c. No. 280]
Intro. Sir C. J. Pearson; Read 1^o, 1296
Read 2^o, and com. 1745

Public House Licences, Shoreditch
Q. Mr. J. Stuart, A. Mr. Matthews, 28

Public Libraries Law Consolidation Bill [c. No. 143]
Order for Com. discharged, com. to Select Com. 453
Select Com. nominated, 1865

Public Meetings, Chelsea, 856

Public Officials, Payment of, 199

Public Petitions Committee
Fifth Report read, 304

Public Records, Ireland, 554, 569

PULESTON, Sir John H., Devonport
Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 546
Chicago Exhibition, 696
Engine Room Artificers, 1129

Pupil Teachers Dietary, Ireland, 1760

Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act (1881) Amendment Bill [c. No. 30]
2R. Debated, 250; Amendt. 264; Division, 303, Adj.

Puzzle Competitions
Q. Mr. Seymour Keay, A. Mr. Matthews, 25

Quartermasters, Royal Marines

Q. Admiral Field, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 856

Queen's College, Belfast

Q. Mr. Sexton, Dr. Tanner, Mr. P. O'Brien,
A. Mr. Jackson, Mr. Speaker, 869

QUILTER, Mr. W. C., Suffolk, Sudbury

Telegraphs, 180, 186

Railway Accidents and Brakes

Q. Mr. John Ellis, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 870

Railway and Canal Traffic Acts, 1873 and 1888

Third Report pres. 1228

Railway and Canal Traffic Act (1888)

Amendment Bill [c. No. 288]

Intro. Mr. Sinclair; Read 1^o, 1296

Railway Bills, Standing Orders, 327Railway Commissioners (Sittings)

Return, 140

Railway Compartments for Women, 1244Railway Passengers Assurance Company

Bill

1. Returned from c., 1749

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour)

Committee—Breach of Privilege

Debate, 888; Mr. Speaker's Admonition, 968

Return ordered of Hours worked, 1891

Railway Station Approaches

Q. Mr. John Ellis, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 1578

Railway Tunnel Refuges

Q. Mr. Duncan, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 876

Rainhill Murders, 873Ramelton Petty Sessions

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 19

RANDELL, Mr. D., Glamorganshire,

Gower

Dolgelly, Treasure Trove at, 1761

Eight Hours (No. 2) Bill, 1632

Ransome's, Messrs., Sub-Contract

Q. Mr. Whitmore, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 26

RASCH, Major F. C., Essex, S.E.

Budget Statement, 1174

Rates, Exemption of Schools, 1291Rating of Machinery Bill [c. No. 81]

Debate, 758; Division, Read 2^o, 810

Com. deferred, 964

Com. R.P. 1039

Redemption of Tithe Rent-Charge, 476Re-direction of Letters, Free

Q. Mr. Webb, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1773

REDMOND, Mr. John E., Waterford

Black, Superintendent, and Daly and Egan, 22

Compulsory Sale of Land (Ireland), 247

Convicts Daly and Egan, 22

Gallagher, Dr., 87

Land Purchase Amendment Act, 266, 294

Red Sea Littoral, 857Regimental Canteen Stores

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Brodrick, 12; Mr.
E. Stanhope, 887

Regimental Mess and Band Funds

Q. Mr. King, A. Mr. Curzon, Mr. Brodrick, 1087

Regina v. Hurlbert

Q. Mr. Labouchere, Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr.
Matthews, 1088

Registered Parcel Lost

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 566

Registration, England and Ireland, 1233Registration of Chimney-Sweeps, 556*REID, Mr. Robert T., Dumfries, &c.

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill,
1263, 1266, 1268

Control of Domestic Affairs (England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales), 1698, 1704, 1705, 1711

Education and Taxation Relief Bill, 1846

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 706, 723

RENDEL, Mr. Stuart, Montgomeryshire

Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 541, 551

Rent Deduction and Truck Acts

Q. Mr. Cramer, A. Sir R. Webster, 697, 873

Reporting Parliamentary Debates

Q. Mr. Labouchere, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour,
Bill

Restrictions, Cattle Trade, 152

[Ret]

{ SESSION 1892 }

[Row

Vol. 3.

Retirement of Civil Servants, 573, 1647

Richardson and Edgell, Convicts
Q. Mr. C. Graham, A. Mr. Matthews, 1648

Rifle Brigade Drafts, Mortality
Q. Mr. Bartley, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 1770

Rifle Ranges
New Forest, 1772
Salisbury Plain, 1287

Rifle Works, Old Ford, 1101

Rights of Way Procedure (Scotland) Bill
[c. No. 263]
Intro. Mr. Bryce; Read 1^o, 812

RITCHIE, Right Hon. C. T. (President of the Local Government Board),
Tower Hamlets, St. George's
Alkali, &c. Works Bill, Intro. 965
Allotments Act, 1887, 35, 368
Allotments Land Sold, 148
Borrowing Powers, Local Authorities, 343
Control of Domestic Affairs (England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales), 1710
County Council Polling Places, 1389
County Councils, Death of Candidate, 482; Ties in Election Contests, 1645
Imbecile, Support of, 348
Insanitary Area, Westminster, 894
London County Council (General Powers)
Bill, 1549, 1557
London Water (No. 1) Bill, 817
London Water Supply, 478
Medical Inspectors in Wales, 48
Medical Officer's Appointment, Islington, 342
Ordnance Survey, Rothwell, 863
Public Health Amendment Act, 343
Rating of Machinery Bill, 808
Reigate County Council Election, Casting Vote, 148
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 643, 644, 706
Small-pox, London, 972; Dewsbury, Batley,
&c. 1854
Supply, 524
Vaccination Commission, 1385
Vaccine Lymph, 832
Vestrymen's Qualification, 847

Road Contractors in Ireland
Q. Mr. T. J. Healy, A. Mr. Madden, 1131

Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Acts
Amendment Bill [c. No. 232]
Read 2^o, 1221
Com. 1257; Rep. with Amendt. 1260
Considered as amended, 1368

ROBERTS, Mr. J. From Commemorative

ROBERTSON, Mr. E., Dundee
Board School Masters Duties, 1091, 1092
Breach of Privilege, 961
Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1269
Council of Judges, 864
Education and Local Taxation Relief Bill,
1787, 1818, 1819, 1822, 1828
Higher-Class School Inspectors, 1643
Proceedings before Committees, 597

Roburite in Mines, 1653

ROBY, Mr. H. J., Lancashire, S.E.,
Eccles
Septennial Act, 1052
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 736, 1217
Telegraphs, 198

ROCHE, Mr. J., Galway, E.
Firearms and Police, 581
Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act (1891),
Amendment Bill, 250, 264, 278, 290

ROLLIT, Sir Albert K., Islington, S.
Gresham University, 870, 598, 1298
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 2R. 1453, 1472
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 712
Telegraphs and Telephones, 175

Roman Catholic Magistrates and Deputy Lieutenants
Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 1114

Romer, Mr. Justice
Q. Mr. Duncan, A. Sir R. Webster, 1131

Roorkee Military Chaplain, 971

ROSCOE, Sir Henry E., Manchester, S.
Army Science Examinations, 824
Colour Vision Committee, 878

Roscrea Union, Labourers Cottages,
17

Rothwell, Ordnance Survey for
Q. Mr. Pickard, A. Mr. Ritchie, 864

ROUND, Mr. J., Essex, N.E., Harwich
Cattle Disease, North Essex, 680

ROWLANDS, Mr. James, Finsbury, E.
Eltham Park, 1114, 1115
Morning Sitings, 1670, 1671
Parliamentary Registration, 1232
Post Office Sorters, 1108
Privilege, Railway Servants Hours, 922
Qualification of Vestrymen, 847
Sub-Contracts, London Small Arms Company, 1102
Vestrymen's Qualification Bill, Intro. 248

ROWNTREE, Mr. J., Scarborough

Royal Commission on Labour

Q. Mr. G. W. Balfour, Mr. T. M. Healy, A. Sir J. Gorst, Mr. Goschen, 985; Q. Mr. Brookfield, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1778

Royal Irish Academy

Q. Mr. W. O'Brien, A. Sir H. Maxwell, 563

Royal Irish Constabulary, 353, 875, 969"Royalist," H.M.S., and Solomon Islands, 33*Royalties on Mines, 49, 589, 689, 828, 858*Rural Districts, Scotland, Telegraphs, 689*Rural Postmen in Ireland

Pensions, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 877; Pay, Foxford, Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1106; Moneymore, Q. Mr. Flynn, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1125

Rural Posts, Portadown District

Q. Mr. Barton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1106

Ruskey, Distress in

Q. Mr. O'Kelly, A. Mr. Jackson, 1097

RUSSELL, Sir Charles, Hackney, S.

Short Titles Bill, 1276
Witnesses before Committees, 1778, 1779
Witnesses Protection Bill, 1449

RUSSELL, Mr. T. W., Tyrone, S.

Ballysally School Teacher, 13
Catholic Clergy and Poor Law Elections, 875
Compulsory Sale of Land, Ireland, 227, 238, 239
Civil Servants, Retirement of, 574
Dietary, Irish Model Schools, 1760
Irish Education Bill, 1293, 1583
Irish Grand Juries, 1760
Land Purchase Act (1891), 250
Land Sub-Commission, Lisburn, 875
Manorhamilton Guardians Election, 1240
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 1481
Places of Worship (Sites) Bill, 1434
Poor Law Guardians (Ireland) (Qualification of Women) Bill, 1532 Purchase of Land Amendment Bill, 257, 286, 29, 372

Russian Jewish Emigrants

Q. Colonel H. Vincent, Mr. O. V. Morgan, Mr. Bartley, Mr. J. Lowther, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 145; Q. Mr. J. Lowther, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 475

Sahmadoo, Protectorate of

Q. Mr. Lawrence, A. Baron H. de Worms, 1108; Q. Mr. Baumann, Commander Bethell, A. Baron H. de Worms, 1234

St. John's Wood Barracks, Fever in

Q. Mr. J. Lowther, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 339

St. Michael's, Coventry (Vicar's Rate)

Bill [c. No. 264]

Intro. Mr. Ballantine; Read 1^o, 965

St. Pancras, Police Court for, 592Salaries of Land Commissioners, 158*Salaries of Prison Surgeons, 1647*Sale of Enclosed Lands, 148*Sale of Goods Bill [l. No. 58]

l. Rep. with Amendts. 674

SALISBURY, MARQUESS OF (Prime Minister and Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs)

Behring Sea Fishery, 2
Duration of Speeches Bill, 459
Easter Holidays, 457
Local Authorities (Acquisition of Land) Bill, 462
Smoke Nuisance Metropolis Bill, 308, 310, 312

Salisbury Plain as Rifle Range

Q. Mr. Jeffreys, A. Mr. Brodrick, 1237

Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Bill

[c. No. 258]

Intro. Sir E. Birkbeck; Read 1^o, 671
Read 2^o, and com. 1863

Salmon Fisheries Inspectors

Q. Mr. A. Sutherland, Sir C. J. Pearson, 1573

San Quintin Harbour

Q. Colonel Hamilton, Mr. Bartley, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 1130

Sasine Office, Edinburgh

Q. Mr. Buchanan, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 563

Saunderson, Colonel, and Home Rule

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Madden, 1127

SAUNDERSON, Colonel E. J., Armagh, N.

Mrs. Montagu's Cruelty, 861
Portadown Disturbances, 350

Savings Bank Inspectors

Q. Mr. Howell, A. Mr. Goschen, 362

Savings Banks Act (1891) Amendment Bill [c. No. 210]

Withdrawn, 189

Savings Banks (P.O.) and Trade Societies, 31, 354

Scarborough Ordnance Survey

Q. Mr. Rowntree, A. Mr. Chaplin, 578

Scarcity in Madras, 365

Scariff Docks and Pier

Q. Mr. Cox, Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Sir J. Gorst, Lord G. Hamilton, 981, 1118; Q. Mr. Cox, A. Sir J. Gorst, 1752

Scattery Island Forts, 867

School Accommodation, Birkenhead, 859

School Attendances, Abolition of Fees

Q. Mr. Bartley, A. Sir W. H. Dyke, 825

School Grants, Ireland, Allocation of

Q. Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Jackson, 868

School Libraries, 25

Schoolmasters as Organists, &c. 1092

Schools for Public Meetings, 1777

Schools for Truants, 150

School Teachers as Magistrates, &c.

Q. Mr. Labouchere, A. Sir W. H. Dyke, 843

School Teachers Certificates

Q. Mr. H. R. Farquharson, A. Sir W. Hart Dyke, 868

SCHWANN, Mr. C. E., Manchester, N.

Bengal Municipal Act, 694

Indian Councils Act Amendment Bill, 2R. 62, 68, 89, 128, 131; Q. 477; Com. 1301, 1325, 1328, 1331, 1338, 1347, 1350, 1354, 1355, 1372, 1382, 1383

Science Examinations, Army

Q. Sir H. Roscoe, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 824

Science Teaching, 1245, 1650

Scotch Trawlers on Irish Coast, 586

SCOTLAND

Secretary for—Marquess of Lothian

Lord Advocate—Sir C. J. Pearson

Access to Mountains Bill, 1221

Bills affecting County Councils, 143

SCOTLAND—cont.

Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1720-1737

Civil Courts and Crofter Commission, 675

Crofters Act in Hebrides, 147

Custody of Children, 572, 1090

Education and Local Taxation Relief Bill, 2R. 373-451, 1782-1853

Edinburgh and Dundee Mails, 1230

Farm Servants Wages, 1229

Fishery Disturbances, Whalsay, 1756

Harbour Lights, Orkney, &c. 585

High Court of Justiciary Bill, 1384

Higher Class Schools, 1643, 1774

Highlands Emigration Scheme, 32

Housing of the Working Classes Bill, 1384

Hughes, James, Customs Boatman, 1112

Illegitimacy in Scotland, 31, 1119

Inland Revenue Solicitor, Edinburgh, 331

Inspector, Scotch Fisheries, 1573

Juvenile Offender's Sentence, 829

Lewis Roads and Telegraphs, 1580

Local Government (Scotland) Glasgow, &c. Bill, 144

Nairn Poaching Sentence, 831, 1249

Piers and Harbours, Highlands, 832

Poor Law Settlement, 1242

Port Glasgow School Board, 329

Portnaguran Harbour of Refuge, 1300, 1581

Procurators Fiscal, Duties of, 1558

Public Health (Milnathort Water) Bill, 1296

Roads and Bridges Acts Amendment Bill, 1258

Sasine Office, Edinburgh, 563

School Boards, Illegal, 328

Scotch Burgh Police Bill, 304

Sea Fisheries, 1133, Regulation Bill, 810

Secondary Schools Grants, 846, 1238

Sheriff Clerks Depute Bill, 811

Spey Salmon Fishings, 830

Stirling and Oban Mails, 833

Taxation Grant Distribution, 635

Telegraphs in Rural Districts, 689

Tobermory Procurator Fiscal, 674

Truant Schools, 150

Unconvicted Prisoners at Work, 1557

Western Highlands Works Act, 1300, 1580

Scottish School Boards

Q. Dr. Cameron, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 328, 329

Sea Fisheries Regulation (Scotland) Bill

[c. No. 239]

2R. Deferred, 811

Sea Fisheries, Scottish

Q. Mr. Marjoribanks, Mr. T. M. Healy, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1133

SEALE-HAYNE, Mr. C. (see HAYNE)

Seamen and Shamrock-wearing, 15

Searching People in Streets

Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 871

Secondary Education (England) Bill

[c. No. 269]

Intro. Mr. A. Acland ; Read 1^o, 1084Secondary Education Grant, Scotland

Q. Mr. Bryce, Mr. C. S. Parker, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 846, 1238

Secret Service Fund, 554Seduction Bill [c. No. 254]Intro. Mr. Patrick O'Brien ; Read 1^o, 454Seed Rate in Ireland

Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr. Jackson, 479

SELBORNE, Earl of

Smoke Nuisance (Metropolis) Bill, 311

Senate of London University, 1122Seniority in the Customs

Q. Mr. Craig, A. Mr. Goschen, 1248

Sentences on Anarchists, &c.

Q. Mr. Harrison, Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Matthews, 1103

Sentence on a Poacher

Q. Mr. Seymour Keay, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 1249

Septennial Act

Reso. Sir B. W. Foster, 1040, Division, 1082

SEXTON, Mr. T., Belfast, W.

Achill Viaduct, 679

Belfast Constabulary Barracks, 350

Business of the House, 304, 488, 489, 601, 984, 1253, 1780, 1781

Cattle Trade, 582

Compulsory Sale of Land (Ireland), 230

Cork Mail Service, 686, 687, 850, 852

Criminal Law Procedure Act, 560

Custody of Children, 572

Deaths in Convents, 329

Dispensary Doctors, Belfast, 1096

Evictions on Clare Island, 977

Financial Relations (England, Ireland, and Scotland) Committee, 455

Flannegan Orphans, 1090, 1091

Hares Bill, 524

Irish Education Bill, 1292

Irish Land Commissioners, 157

Irish Local Government Bill, 51

Irish Schools, Allocation of Grant, 979

Land Purchase Act, 1891, 249

Land Purchase Amendment Act, 260, 281, 289, 301

Mall Services in Ireland, 853, 854

Manorhamilton Guardians Election, 1248

Medical Students, Queen's College, 868

Military Chaplain, Bengal, 971

Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 138

[cont.]

SEXTON, Mr. T.—cont.

Mohill Poor Law Elections, 1096

Murphy, James, 571

National Education (Ireland), 1864

Nally, P. W., Death of, 338

Open-air Preaching, 362

Payne, Mr. J. H., Estate of, 556

Police Violence, Belfast, 971, 1117

Postal Surveyors, 572

Public Health Amendment Act, 343

School Grants, Dissection of, 868

Sweeney, John, 578

Tallow District Medical Officer, 679

Target Firing Seawards, 554

Teachers Pension Fund, 1866

Valuation of Belfast, 478

Wearing of the Shamrock, 14, 16

Shamrock, Wearing of the

Q. Sir T. Esmonde, Mr. Sexton, Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Mr. Brodrick, Lord G. Hamilton, 14-17 ; Q. Sir T. Esmonde, A. Mr. Brodrick, 153 ; Q. Colonel Nolan, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 367 ; Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 553 ; Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 691 ; Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Stanhope, 832

Shannon Protection, Scatterry Fort

Q. Mr. Jordan, A. Mr. Brodrick, Mr. Stanhope, 485, 867

SHAW-STEWART, Mr. M. H., Renfrew, E.

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1650

Control of Domestic Affairs (England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales), 1695, 1698, 1699

SHEEHAN, Mr. J. D., Kerry, E.

Land Sub-Commission, Kerry, 1098

Limerick Postmastership, 1090

SHEEHY, Mr. D., Galway, S.

Evictions in Clare Island, 978

Sheep Dog Licences

Q. Mr. A. Sutherland, A. Mr. Goschen, 363

Sheriff Clerks Depute (Scotland) Bill

[c. No. 197]

2R. deferred, 670

Sheriff Courts (Scotland) Extracts Bill

[c. No. 119]

c. Read 2^o, 670

Com. rep. 1226

Read 3^o, and passed, 1295l. Read 1^o, 1749Ships Fit for Sea, &c., 570*Shops (Weekly Half-Holiday) Bill [c. No.

142]

2R. deferred, 1082

Shoreditch Public House Licences, 27

Short Titles Bill [c. No. 227]

Read 2^o, and com. 138
Com. Rep. with Amendts. 1719
Considered, 1865

Sick Leave in Civil Service, 1756

Sickness among Telegraph Staff, 472

Sierra Leone and French Possessions,
1109, 1234

SINCLAIR, Mr. W. P., Falkirk, &c.

Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1265
Compulsory Sale of Land (Ireland), 236
Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 1792, 1815, 1841
Railway and Canal Traffic Act (1888)
Amendment Bill, Intro. 1296

Slaughter House, &c., Westminster

Q. Sir J. Swinburne, Mr. Burdett-Coutts, A.
Mr. Ritchie, 834

Slave Trade, Consul Johnston

Q. Mr. A. E. Pease, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 585

Slave Trade, East Africa

Q. Mr. A. E. Pease, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 586

Sligo, Labourers Cottages in, 1577

Slob Lands, Clare, 332, 1297

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill [c. No. 183]

Instruction, 637; Division, 660; Instruction, 660; Division, 669; in Com. 669
In Com. 701; Amendts. R.P. 750
Com. 1005; Amendts. R.P. 1039
Com. 1178; Amendts. R.P. 1220

Small Arms Factories

Enfield, 1100, 1238
Old Ford, 1101

Small Holdings Bill

Q. Mr. Winterbotham, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour,
51; Q. Mr. J. Maden, A. Mr. Chaplin, 359

Small Pox

Dunsbury, &c. Q. Dr. Tanner, A. Mr.
Ritchie, 1654
London, Q. Mr. Talbot, A. Mr. Ritchie, 972

SMITH, Mr. J. Parker, Lanark, Partick

Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland)
Bill, 411, 1812, 1846, 1849
French Boundaries, West Africa, 1109

VOL. III. [FOURTH SERIES.]

SMITH, Mr. Samuel, Flintshire

Agricultural Banks in India, 1766
Education Code, 27
Flintshire Coroner, 1759
Flintshire Magistrates, 7
Indian Councils Act, 118, 1822, 1848, 1860
Juvenile Offender, Sentence on, 829
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, Amendt. 1471
Probation of First Offenders Act, 8
Revenue from Intoxicants, India, 1086

Smokeless Powder, 1388

Smoke Nuisance (Metropolis) Bill

L. Com. 305, Rep. and Re-Com. 313

Soldiers at Political Meetings

Q. Mr. T. Fry, A. Mr. Brodrick, 974

Solicitor's Appointment, Inland Revenue, 330

Solicitors as Parliamentary Agents, 369

Solomon Islands

Q. Dr. Cameron, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 33

SOMERVELL, Mr. J., Ayr, &c.

Breach of Privilege — Railway Servants
Hours Com. 939

Sorters in Post Office

Q. Mr. J. Rowlands, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1108

South Kensington Museum

Q. Dr. Farquharson, A. Mr. Goschen, Sir
W. Hart Dyke, 1245, 1650

Speaker, The (RIGHT HON. ARTHUR WELLESLEY PEEL), Warwick and Leamington

MISCELLANEOUS

Closure, 29 March, 213; 2 May, 1860

Correction of Division List (Mr. Conybeare)
2 May, 1866

Irregular Question, 8 April, 983

Order of Debate, "The question cannot be debated now, though a question may be asked," 31 March, 456; 5 April, 751; 7
April, 852, 966; 8 April, 983, 1039

Question repeated, 7 April, 874

Relevancy or Irrelevancy, 28 March, 108,
136; 4 April, 601; 26 April, 1419

Trivial Question struck out, 7 April, 869

PRIVILEGE

Protection of Witnesses before Committees

Sir M. Hicks Beach: "On Saturday last (2 April) a Special Report of the Select Committee on the Hours of Railway Servants

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

together with the evidence, was circulated to hon. Members, from which they will have seen that the Committee have reported that a certain railway servant, John Hood, was dismissed by the Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company mainly in consequence of charges arising out of the evidence which he gave before the Committee last year, and for which he was subsequently called to account and censured by some of the Directors and by the Manager of the Company. As Chairman of the Committee, I wish to give notice that it is my intention to call the attention of the House to that Report as a question of Privilege. Since that Report was presented the Committee have had before them two other cases in which it is alleged that certain railway servants belonging to the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants have been dismissed from their offices in that Society, or otherwise injured, on account of the evidence given before the Committee. The Committee are now examining these cases, and will, I hope, shortly decide whether or not they shall make a Special Report upon them. Therefore, I do not now name a day upon which I shall call attention to this first Special Report, because I think it would be for the convenience of the House and fairer to all parties that the whole subject should be considered together; but I hope there will be no unnecessary delay in the matter. . . . The Special Report already presented deals with all the cases of alleged intimidation that have been brought forward by one side. The Committee are now engaged in considering and taking evidence upon other cases of the same kind which have been brought forward by the other side; and, as Chairman of the Committee, I think that both these cases should be considered together, instead of the House being asked to entertain the question of Privilege on two different occasions."—4 April, 597

Mr. Robertson: "I should like to ask you, Sir, as a point of order, is it not a Rule of this House that no reference should be made here to proceedings before Committees upstairs until the Committee have reported to the House? The right hon. Gentleman has mentioned a fact known to him and to the Committee, but not known to the House, as to certain proceedings now taking place."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Committee have reported upon a case which they think touched upon Privilege, and that they are now discussing another case, which might also be one of Privilege, and that it might be for the convenience of the House to discuss them together. I know nothing of the special case before the Committee; but as to the question of Privilege there must, of course, be no undue delay in the discussion of such a question. The Privilege, however, will, of course, adhere to the question when it comes before this House."

[cont.]SPEAKER THE—cont.

Mr. Morton: "May I ask you, Sir, whether it would be in order for any Member of this House to bring a question of breach of Privilege before the House?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Any Member can bring such a question before the House, but it would be for the House to decide whether it should be dealt with."—4 April, 598

[Later] Mr. Philipps: "I should like to ask why, as in the case of the forged letters to the Times, the question of Privilege should not have been brought forward, to be dealt with as soon as possible after the offence had been committed?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"There is no sort of parallel between the cases."—4 April, 599

On 5 April, Special Report from the Select Committee on Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) read, as followeth:—

"Your Committee, having considered a letter dated 21 February, 1892, from Mr. Harford, General Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, and printed in Appendix A., alleging that certain witnesses who had given evidence before them during the last Session of Parliament had been dismissed from their employment in consequence of the evidence they gave, and that other witnesses would be thereby deterred from giving evidence to your Committee, thought it their duty to inquire into the said allegations. Your Committee thereupon examined the following witnesses, who have been reduced or dismissed—namely, John Hood, Edward Kingstone, Alfred Thomas, and Henry Spink, and further took evidence upon the same subject from James Humphreys, John Conacher, Samuel Williamson, John Stokes, James Frederick Buckley, James Thompson, William Birt, John Henry Nettleship, Charles Alfred Randall, Mark Negus, and George Charles Taverner, whose evidence is appended to this Report."

Your Committee report:—

"(1) That the aforesaid allegations in reference to the witnesses Edward Kingstone, Alfred Thomas, and Henry Spink, were unfounded.

(2) That the witness John Hood was, by a resolution of the Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company, at a meeting held on the 6th day of August last, dismissed from the service of the Company, mainly in consequence of charges arising out of the evidence given by him before your Committee, and laid before the Directors by John Conacher, then manager of the said Railway; and further, that James Frederick Buckley, John William Maclure (a Member of this House), and William Bailey Hawkins, Directors of the said Company, and the said John Conacher, did, at a meeting at Crewe on the 30th September, 1891, held in consequence of an application by the said John Hood for the rehearing of his case, at which the said John Hood was present, call him to account, and censure him for the evidence he gave before your Committee, in a manner calculated to deter other railway servants from giving evidence before your Committee.

[cont.]

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Your Committee have not deemed it to be part of their duty to express any opinion as to how far the conduct of the said John Hood, and the irregularities disclosed by his evidence, as well as the character of his evidence, were calculated properly to forfeit the confidence of the Directors of the Cambrian Company.

24th March, 1892."

Special Report considered.

Sir M. Hicks Beach: "It is now my duty, in accordance with precedent, to move—That Mr. John William Maclure do attend this House in his place on Thursday next. That Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher do attend this House on Thursday next, at Three of the clock."

Mr. Radcliffe Cooke: "As a question of Order, Mr. Speaker, I beg to suggest that we ought to take this Report into consideration and come to some decision upon it before we summon people to the Bar of this House, because they may well ask what they are summoned here for. It is an arbitrary and absolute power that we have, and I think we ought not to exercise it except against those who have committed a breach of the Privileges of this House; and although we have taken this Report, and it has been laid on the Table of the House, we have not affirmed the principle that these persons named in this Report have committed any breach of the Privileges of this House. I ask you, therefore, whether there is not a link in the chain wanting, and whether we ought not to take this Report into consideration, and go further, and say that So-and-So—the persons named—have committed a breach of the Privileges of this House; and after this we shall be in a proper position to summon them to the Bar of the House. . . ."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The House is asked to act, I imagine, on the Special Report of the Committee who have specially inquired into the allegations, which were made before them of intimidation of witnesses. These gentlemen are asked to appear at the Bar of this House in order to state anything they may have to say in their defence, or in mitigation or excuse. After hearing these gentlemen the House will decide whether what they have said is any mitigation or excuse of the offences charged against them, and will decide what action they think it right to take, and will instruct me accordingly."

[cont.]

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Mr. Radcliffe Cooke: "I venture to call your attention to the fact that the Committee have not come to any decision on the point. The Committee have said that So-and-So have done certain things calculated to deter witnesses from giving evidence before the Committee. I say that this is not a breach of the Privileges of this House, because the Committee left it expressly to this House to affirm that principle; and I venture again respectfully to ask you whether we are in Order in summoning to the Bar of this House persons of whom we have not said yet that they have committed a breach of the Privileges of this House?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The hon. Member will observe that the Committee have not decided that any breach of Privilege has been committed, but only that action has been taken by certain gentlemen which is calculated, in their opinion, to intimidate witnesses. It is upon that allegation that the House would like to hear the gentlemen who are referred to in the Report in order to know whether they can say anything in excuse or mitigation of the allegation which is charged against them. I do not think that any injustice can be done to any gentlemen by asking them to attend at the Bar of this House."

Motion agreed to, 5 April, 701

7 April, Order read, for the attendance of Mr. John William Maclure, a Member of this House, and of Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher.

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Is it your pleasure that these gentlemen be called in? I have to ask first, whether the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stretford Division of South East Lancashire is in his place?"

Mr. John William Maclure rose in his place, bowed to the Chair, and remained standing.

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Order, order! Will the Serjeant-at-Arms see that Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher do appear at the Bar."

The Bar being then drawn, the Serjeant-at-Arms escorted thereto the three gentlemen named, who made their obeisance to the Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Order, Order! Mr. John William Maclure, you have been ordered to attend in your place, and you, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher, have been summoned to appear at the Bar of this House in consequence of a Special Report made by a Committee of this House. That Committee was appointed to inquire into the hours of labour of railway servants, and in the course of their inquiry it came to their knowledge that allegations were made that certain persons had been reduced or dismissed from the service of the Company in consequence of the evidence they had given before the Committee. The other cases were dismissed by the Committee, after inquiry, as being unfounded; but in the case of one person, John Hood, the Committee found that he was dismissed by the Company mainly in consequence of charges arising out of the evidence given by him before the Committee. You, Mr. John Conacher, laid the evidence (so the Committee have found) before the Directors of the Company, and you, the Directors of the Company who are now present (so the Committee have found), when John Hood asked for a re-hearing of the case, called him to account, and you censured him for the evidence which he gave before the Committee, in a manner calculated to deter other railway servants from giving evidence before a Committee of this House. I believe it is the wish of the House to hear anything that any of you may now say in answer to these findings of the Committee."

[cont.]

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Mr. John William Maclure having expressed regret if by the course adopted any Rules or Privileges of the House had been unintentionally infringed, and asked the House to accept his apology—in which Mr. James Frederick Buckley, on Mr. Speaker's invitation, expressed concurrence—Mr. Speaker directed the gentlemen summoned to the Bar to then withdraw—

Whereupon, Reso. (Sir Michael Hicks Beach) To which, after Debate, Amendment (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) [890]

After further Debate, on reference by Sir George Trevelyan to evidence given before the Select Committee [893]

Mr. A. E. Gathorne-Hardy, rising to Order, said: "I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in anticipating the Report of the Committee as to the hours of labour, which they were not able to present?"

MR. SPEAKER—

"The right hon. Gentleman is in Order, so far as it bears on the case, in calling attention to anything that was placed before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly in Order in referring to it up to the day on which this gentleman was dismissed from his service."

Mr. A. E. Gathorne-Hardy: "With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I rise again, to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in anticipating the decision of the Committee with regard to the question of the hours of labour in the case of the Cambrian or any other railway?"

MR. SPEAKER—

"The right hon. Gentleman would not be in Order in anticipating the ultimate decision of the Committee as to the question of the hours of labour. That is not the Question before the House."

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Mr. Milvain following with other references to the evidence: [908]

Mr. Heneage said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask whether the hon. Gentleman is entitled to go into all these facts? If so, we shall have a week's debate."

MR. SPEAKER—

"That is entirely a matter for the discretion of this House. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it may be inconvenient to travel into all the details, but it is not for me to indicate the direction in which the discretion of any hon. Member may be limited in discussing the Special Report and the evidence contained in it." [904]

After further debate,

Mr. Picton (Leicester): If I am in Order, of which I am not certain, I should like to move an Amendment to the Amendment."

MR. SPEAKER—

"It would be in Order." [951]

At 11.25, Mr. A. J. Balfour rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put,"

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

Dr. Clark (speaking seated): "May I ask you, Sir, if, before you put the Main Question, it will be in Order to move an Amendment which I had intended to move in reference to imprisonment?"

MR. SPEAKER—

"No, that would not be in Order; the House will proceed to a decision on the Main Question."

Mr. Robertson (speaking seated): "May I ask you, Sir, whether the Main Question can now be put without a previous Motion being carried?"

MR. SPEAKER—

"The Motion for putting the Question being carried applies to the Questions put from the Chair. This Question with the others has been put from the Chair."

Mr. T. M. Healy: "Does it follow that the Question is put on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman?"

MR. SPEAKER—

"It is claimed and put if allowed. I allow it." Main Question put accordingly. (Loud cries of "No.")

Dr. Tanner: "No humbug!"

MR. SPEAKER—

"Order, order! With regard to the expression just used, I refrain from naming the hon. Gentleman who used it, because on an occasion such as this I do not wish to take any strong measures. I hope the House will behave to the end in a judicial spirit."

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Resolved, "That this House, while recognising that Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher have disclaimed any intention to deter any railway servants from giving evidence before its Committee, and have expressed their unqualified regret for having unintentionally infringed any of its Rules and Privileges, is of opinion that the said Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher have committed a breach of the Privileges of this House in their action towards John Hood, and that they be called in and admonished by Mr. Speaker for the breach of Privilege that they have committed."

Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher were accordingly called in, and Mr. Maclure standing in his place, and Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher, standing at the Bar, were admonished as followeth. [962]

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company: the House has had under its consideration the case which has been presented to it, and I am now directed to inform you of the Resolution at which it has arrived. I will read to you the words of that Resolution:—'This House, while recognising that Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher have disclaimed any intention to deter any railway servant from giving evidence before its Committee, and have expressed their unqualified regret for having unintentionally infringed any of its Rules and Privileges, is of opinion that the said Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher, have committed a breach of the Privileges of this House in their action towards John Hood, and that they be called in and admonished by Mr. Speaker for the breach of Privilege that they have committed.'

"It now becomes my duty, as the mouth-piece of the House, and as the interpreter of its wishes, to state to you what is the opinion of the House upon your conduct. It is quite true that you have made an apology to the House for the undoubted breach of its Privileges. I need hardly tell you that a mere apology does not always cover the extent and surface of an offence; but the House has taken a lenient view in that respect of your conduct, and has expressed in its Resolution its willingness to accept your apology. But that is not all. The House has directed me to admonish you for a grave breach of the Privileges of this House. I would have you know,--each and all of you gentlemen,—that though the Privileges of this House are not to be put into operation upon any light or trivial occasion, and though the intervals are long between the periods when appeals are made to those Privileges, yet a Privilege of this House is no unreal, shadowy, or unsubstantial thing; it is what the House clings to, and what it is determined to maintain. The breach of Privilege which you have committed is, that you have by your conduct intimidated a witness before this House; that your conduct towards him is calculated to deter witnesses in giving evidence before this House or its Committees. So dear is that especial Privilege to this House, that I must remind you that at the commencement of every Session, and therefore at the commencement of this Session, on the very first day of its meeting, two Resolutions were passed by this House, in one of which it declared, 'That if it shall appear that any person hath given false evidence in any case before this House, or any Committee thereof, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.' The second of those Resolutions expresses the determination of the House, 'That if it shall appear that any person hath been tampering with any witness in respect of his evidence to be given to this House or any Committee thereof, or' (and this is the point to which I would especially direct your attention) 'directly or indirectly hath endeavoured to deter or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence, the same is declared to be a high crime and misdemeanour, and this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.' Those are Resolutions which are fresh in the memory of this House, and which I am surprised that those gentlemen whom I now see before me at the Bar should have so lightly infringed. It is a very grave and serious offence that you have committed. The House in its judgment and, I should add, in its mercy has decided that I should admonish you. I do most seriously admonish you, and I warn you that any repetition of this offence, for it is an offence, will be visited by this House with its very severe rebuke, reproof, and punishment. A great principle has been infringed, the principle that evidence given before this House shall be free and unrestrained. I warn you against repeating an offence of this character. The offence is a very serious one, for it is no less an offence than trying, however unadvisedly it may be in certain cases, to deter witnesses from giving evidence before a Committee of this House, and thus to disturb and taint the very sources of truth. I believe I act, as I wish to act, as the interpreter of the feelings of this House when I seriously admonish you, and express the hope that your example will serve as a deterrent to others, and that it will also act as a warning to yourselves never again to presume to commit the like offence against the character, the dignity, and the purity of this House."

[*cont.*SPEAKER, THE—cont.

[cont.

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Then Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. James Conacher were ordered to withdraw, and they withdrew accordingly.

Sir M. Hicks Beach: "I now beg to move, 'That the admonition delivered by Mr. Speaker be entered upon the Journals of this House.'"

Mr. T. M. Healy: "May I ask, as a point of Order, is that consequential business?"

MR. SPEAKER—

"Yes; and I hope the House will allow the remarks which it was my duty to deliver to be entered on the Journals of the House."

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the admonition delivered by Mr. Speaker be entered upon the Journals of this House.—7 April, 1964

RULINGS

Referring to Mr. S. Keay speaking on Indian Councils Act Amendment Bill:

MR. SPEAKER—

"The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to review the whole condition of India on a Bill of this kind. . . . I am sorry to inform the hon. Gentleman that he is not touching the Bill before the House."

[Later] "The hon. Gentleman must obey my ruling."—28 March, 108, 109

Mr. A. J. Balfour claimed, "That the original Question be now put."

Mr. Sexton: I wish to ask you, Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in taking that course?"

MR. SPEAKER—

"There is no necessity for a further Motion; the Divisions already taken lead up to a decision on the Main Question."

Mr. Sexton: "What I wish to ask, Sir, is whether the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman is superfluous—whether the putting of the Main Question follows on the Original Motion for the Closure?"

MR. SPEAKER—

"There can be no further debate on the Main Question. The right hon. Gentleman having moved that the Question be now put, and that being carried applies to the Original Motion. The proceeding is in order. I am acting under the Standing Order of the House."

On Motion to refer same Bill to a Select Committee:

Colonel Nolan: "I should like to speak upon that Motion."

MR. SPEAKER:

"Further proceedings stand over if objection is taken."—28 March, 138

[cont.]

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Dr. Clark: "Mr. Speaker, may I call attention to the second Order of the Day, 'Military Lands Consolidation Bill. Adjourned Debate on Motion for committing the Bill to a Select Committee?' That was proposed, I believe, after twelve o'clock. Am I to understand that this is an adjourned Debate, it being contentious Business after twelve o'clock?"

MR. SPEAKER—

"After the Second Reading of the Bill, the Member in charge stated what further action was proposed to be taken in regard to it. There might not have been any objection, but, he having proposed that the Bill be referred to a Committee, and objection being taken, I at once said that in the circumstances the Bill must stand over, and so it becomes from the necessity of the case an adjourned Debate."—29 Mar. 165

On Instruction moved by Admiral Field:

MR. SPEAKER—

"With unqualified respect for the opinion expressed by an authority in the House, I think, after hearing the doubts expressed on both sides of the House, it will be far better to send the Instruction to the Committee. The Bill repeals a clause in the Eastbourne Act in reference to processions on Sundays; and if the Committee or Chairman have any doubt as to whether their power extends to making any regulation on the subject for the peace of the borough, I think it would be far better that there should be an expression of the opinion of the House that they have that power to inquire into the question. It is not a mandatory Instruction; it is only a declaration that the Committee have the power, and, under the circumstances, I think it is expedient that the Instruction should be given."—31 Mar. 324

On an alteration in the nomination of Members of a Select Committee, objected to by Mr. J. Chamberlain:

MR. SPEAKER—

"The alteration has not been made in consultation with me; and certainly, as it stands, it is a new proposition, and if opposed must stand over for Monday."

Mr. J. Chamberlain: "I oppose it."

Mr. S. T. Evans: "It appears on the Paper 'by Order,' Mr. Speaker."

MR. SPEAKER—

"It does not appear by Order in the altered form, and that it is so printed on the Paper is an error."

Mr. S. T. Evans: "By the indulgence of the House I may be allowed to say that I made the alteration to meet the view, as I thought, of the right hon. Gentleman himself, and if I may appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the matter might as well be discussed to-day."

[cont.]

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Order, order! The matter is not one to be settled between the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Gentleman, but is a matter for the House at large."—1 April, 464

Mr. J. Chamberlain: "Before the hon. Member proceeds with his protest, I beg to ask you, Sir, whether it is in Order, seeing that it now appears for the first time on the Paper in the hon. Member's name, it having stood before in the name of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"It would be hyper-criticism on my part if I were to take any objection, seeing that it is precisely the same Motion as on a previous occasion was deferred."

Mr. D. Thomas: "I beg to give notice that I shall to-morrow move that the hon. Member for Gateshead be discharged from serving on the Committee, and that the hon. Member for South Glamorgan be nominated in his stead."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"I look with extreme jealousy on the House interfering with the Committee of Selection by discharging a Member who has been appointed by that Committee. That Committee is specially deputed by the House to make choice of Members to serve; but perhaps an amicable arrangement can be come to between the House and the Committee of Selection."—4 April, 552

On Order for going into Committee,

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The only other Instruction standing on the Paper is unnecessary. What it proposes can be done in Committee without Instruction, so I now proceed to leave the Chair to complete the proceedings begun before midnight, and in pursuance of Standing Order No. 51."—4 April, 669

Referring to Colonel Saunderson's remarks on Mrs. Montagu, and Mr. Conybeare on Fanny Gane's sentence,

Mr. SPEAKER—

"Order, order! The rule to be observed in putting a question which is on the Paper must also be observed when putting a question which is not on the Paper."—861

"That is an improper question to put. It is not permissible to question the decision of a Judge in that manner."—7 April, 863

Order for Committee read.

Mr. Winterbotham rose to move, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"A point of procedure arises here which is, I think, a new one. I feel it would be rather hard to insist upon the application of the technical Rule that there being no instruction to the Committee before the House I should immediately leave the Chair. Two Notices of Instructions were placed on the Paper late last night. The hon. Member has rather complained that he was not informed of the objection to his Motion, but it is no part of the duty of the Clerk to call attention to the terms of a Notice of Motion. The Instructions are out of Order, inasmuch as they are mandatory instead of being permissive; but, under the circumstances, I think I should be straining the Rule if I did not allow an opportunity for an Instruction to be moved. I am conscious that in so doing there may be a little unfairness to the advocates of the Bill, but the circumstances are peculiar, and I think it will be convenient if I do not now leave the Chair."

[cont.

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Mr. Storey: "I thank you, Sir. Shall I be in Order if I move now?"

Mr. SPEAKER—

"No; the hon. Gentleman will give notice."—7 April, 965

On the following day, Order for Committee read.

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The two Motions for Instruction to the Committee are both out of Order. I therefore leave the Chair."

[Later] Mr. T. M. Healy said: "I object. The hon. Member takes the first Wednesday after Whitsuntide Vacation. I object, and I understand that by the Standing Order if objection be taken at this stage the question stands over. I ask your ruling on the point."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"It is for the hon. Member in charge of the Bill to appoint the date when the Bill will be taken unless the House should decide otherwise."—8 April, 1039

Sir J. GORST claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Mr. SPEAKER—

"The Motion for the Second Reading of the Bill has only been discussed for half an hour; but having regard to the manner in which the opposition has been conducted, I feel justified in putting the Question."—2 May, 1860

Deputy Speaker and CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (RIGHT HON. L. H. COURTNEY), Cornwall, Bodmin

Mr. Speaker being indisposed, Mr. Courtney took the Chair as Deputy Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order, 28 April, 1533; 29 April, 1641

[As DEPUTY SPEAKER]

Argumentative Question, 29 April, 1649
Order of Debate, 28 April, 1557; 29 April, 1670

Mr. A. J. Balfour: "That the Question be now put."

[cont.

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER—

"No doubt the time allowed for the discussion of this Motion has been very short; but in considering the rights of a minority it is essential to take into account the use which the minority have made of the time at their disposal. I shall put the Question."
—28 April, 1640.

On Colonel Hughes moving an Instruction:

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER—

"I have considered the terms of the Motion for an Instruction of which the hon. Member has given notice. The Bill to which it refers is an omnibus Bill, but I do not find that any one of the clauses deals with any matter cognate to the subject of the Instruction, which, therefore, cannot be entertained, not being in order."
—29 April, 1643

Mr. Macartney: "I wish to ask your ruling, Sir, on a point of Order connected with a Motion standing in the name of the hon. Member for South Armagh with respect to the establishment of an Irish Parliament. I wish to ask whether the discussion on that Motion will be in any way interfered with by the terms of the Motion standing in the name of the hon. Member for Caithness for to-night?"

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER—

"I must say, in reference to this question, on behalf of Mr. Speaker, that the matter was never brought before him at all till last Wednesday, and therefore the statements that have been made in the Press are quite unauthorised. The question on the Paper for to-day is so different in scope from that standing in the name of the hon. Member for South Armagh for next Friday, that the discussion of the latter Motion will not be prejudiced by any decision the House may come to on the former."—29 April, 1658.

[As CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES]

"Abuse of the Forms of the House," 29 April, 1715

Order of Discussion, 1 April, 494, 512, 517; 5 April, 707; 11 April, 1180, 1198; 12 April, 1270; 25 April, 1360, 1372, 1382; 29 April, 1715, 1716, 1718; 2 May, 1797

Relevancy of Observations, 1 April, 513; 25 April, 1350

Suspension of Standing Orders, 12 April, 1295

Wording of Amendment incomplete, 25 April, 1318

On Mr. T. Ellis's Withdrawal of an Amendment:

The CHAIRMAN—

"I would point out to the hon. Member that the most appropriate occasion on which to bring the question up again would not be on Clause 3, but in the form of a new clause. Is it your pleasure that the Amendment be withdrawn?"—11 April, 1195

[cont.

SPEAKER, THE—cont.

Mr. Knox: "I think the Act will lose very materially by leaving out the 2nd clause, and I apprehend that it will be possible to amend this on the Report stage."

The CHAIRMAN—

"On the Report stage it would be competent for the hon. Member to propose any Amendment he likes of the kind he indicates; but we cannot now do something which would undo what the Committee has already done. The Committee must be consistent."—29 April, 1720

Mr. Robertson: "I rise on a point of Order. If all the words proposed in the Amendment now before the House are left out, I am afraid my Amendment would be excluded."

The CHAIRMAN—

"It seems to me that the issues are precisely the same, that the object of the hon. Member is the object of the other hon. Member."

Mr. Robertson: "My object is, I submit, entirely different."

The CHAIRMAN—

"So far as the object of the hon. Member is to preserve the freedom of the House of Commons in future years, it is the same as that of the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan): if the object is to give the House of Commons power to set aside the arrangement this year, it is otherwise irregular."

Mr. Robertson: "My Amendment goes a long way beyond that of my hon. Friend. What I really want to do is to declare by this Act that it shall be in the power of the House of Commons at any time to pass a Resolution which should have the force of law, and should repeal the scheme in force under this Bill."

The CHAIRMAN—

"I never heard of such a novel suggestion. If the House of Commons wishes to do that, it already possesses the power without embracing it in an Act of Parliament. It should refuse to concur in a proposal it could immediately set aside. . . . It is so novel that it appears to be irregular. As far as I know Parliament has never passed an Act making a law which may be immediately repealed by one House."
—2 May, 1818

SPENCER, Mr. Ernest, West Bromwich
Railway Compartments for Women, 1144

Spey Salmon Fishing

Q. Mr. Seymour Keay, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 830

Spirits, Sale to Native Races

Q. Mr. Summers, A. Baron H. de Worms, 41

Spirits Revenue in Bombay, 1086STACK, Mr. John, *Kerry, N.

County Cess, 480

Stamps for West African Letters, 1561Stamps, Licences for Sale of, 466*STANHOPE, RIGHT HON. E. (Secretary of State for War), *Lincolnshire, Horncastle

Army Pay Department, 842

Army Science Examinations, 824

Black, Thomas, Services of, 870

Commands, Extension of, 873

Dornoch Volunteer Company, 360

Enniskillen Military Headquarters, 579, 867

Essex Regiment (Pompadoours), 1251

Fever in St. John's Wood Barracks, 339

Glenbeigh Artillery Range, 1119

Gratuities to Workmen, 872

Infantry Drill Book, 352

Medical Officers of Volunteers, 567

Militia Subalterns Exams., 865

Naval Artillery Volunteers, 330

New Forest Rifle Range, 1772

Rifle Brigade Drafts, 1770

Scattery Island Forts, 867

Shamrock Wearing, 367, 553, 832

Target Practice Seawards, 555, 556

Tidal Waters, Bye Laws, 857

Wearing Emblems in Army, 553

STANHOPE, Hon. P., Wednesbury

Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 544

Handsworth, School Board for, 1120

Wilson, Sir Jacob, Illness of, 1652

STANSFELD, Right Hon. J., Halifax

Barkisland Endowed School, 823

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 643, 648, 649

State Papers, Access to

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Mr. Jackson, Mr. Madden, 554; Q. Mr. W. O'Brien, A. Mr. Madden, 570

Statistical Department, Customs, 684Statute Law Revision

Select Com. nominated, 672, 813, 1133, 1749

Steam Trawlers, Irish Coast, 841, 1291STEPHENS, Mr. H. C., *Middlesex, Hornsey

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 660, 668, 734

STEVENSON, Mr. F. S., Suffolk, Eye

Septennial Act, 1066

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 701, 702, 707, 1192, 1207

Turkey and Armenia, 28

STEWART, Mr. Halley, Lincolnshire, Spalding

Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 733

STEWART, Mr. M. H. Shaw- (see SHAW-STEWART)STEWART, Mr. Mark J., *Kirkcudbright

Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1729

Control of Domestic Affairs (England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales), 1708

Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 425, 1832

Hughes, James, Customs Boatman, 1112

Mice Plague in Scotland, 1106

Ordnance Survey, Scotland, 1107

Parliamentary Agents, 369

Stirling and Oban Mails

Q. Colonel Malcolm, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 833

Stock and Produce in Ireland

Q. Mr. Knox, A. Mr. Jackson, 349, 874

Stolen Postal Orders

Q. Mr. R. Chamberlain, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1385

Stopped Money Orders

Q. Mr. Cox, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 557

STOREY, Mr. S., Sunderland

Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 551

Magistrates, Borough and County, 828

Nally, P. W., Death of, 339

Rating of Machinery Bill, 764, 790, 797, 965

Supply—Royal Palaces Vote, 495, 499, 500;

Royal Parks Vote, 523, 524

Stornoway Naval Reserve, 1574STORY-MASKELYNE, Mr. H. N. (see MASKELYNE)*Stranraer and Larne Mails, 851, 853*STRATHEDEN and CAMPBELL, Lord

Smoke Nuisance (Metropolis) Bill, 307, 309, 312

Street Obstruction in Lambeth

Q. Mr. C. Graham, A. Mr. Matthews, 1644

STUART, Mr. J., Shoreditch, Hoxton

London County Council, 44, 592

London County Council (General Powers) Bill, 1555

London Water (No. 1) Bill, 822

Shoreditch Licences, 27

Sub-Contracts, 26, 564, 1102

Submarine Sentry

Q. Mr. Kimber, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 86

Sub-Postmasters and County Councils

Q. Mr. S. T. Evans, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 467

Succession under Land Purchase Acts

Q. Sir T. Esmonde, A. Mr. Madden, 871

Sugar Bounties, United States, 11

SULLIVAN, Mr. Donal, Westmeath, S.

Flynn, Thomas, V.C. 466

Militia Subalterns, 865

Westmeath Constabulary, 389

Sullivan's Discharge, Chatham, 856

SUMMERS, Mr. W., Huddersfield

Board School Accommodation, 1093

Gibraltar, 356, 576, 585, 848

Lagos Treaties, 24, 358, 838

London University Senate, 1122

Sale of Spirituous Liquors to Native Races, 41

Vaccine Lymph, 881

West Indian Sugar, 11

Sunday Closing and Local Boards, 1751

Sunday Duty, Post Offices

Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1758

Sunderland's Charity Bill [c. No. 296]

Intro. Mr. Barran; Read 1^o, 1449

Superannuation Acts Amendment (No. 2)

Bill [c. No. 275]

Intro. Sir J. Gorst; Read 1^o, 1227

Debated 1853, Division, Read 2^o, 1860

Supervisor of Inland Revenue, 484

SUPPLY

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1892-3

CLASS I.

£29,850—Royal Palaces and Marlborough House, Com. 1 April, 489; Division, 508, 518, 517; Report, 5 April, 751

£75,643—Royal Parks, Com. 1 April, 521

Surrey County Council Election

Q. Sir W. Foster, A. Mr. Ritchie, 147

SUTHERLAND, Mr. A., Sutherland

Business of the House, 984

Emigration, Highlands, 32

Sheep-Dog Licences, 363

Sweating, 474, 475

Sweeney, Junior, Charges Against

Q. Mr. Kilbride, Mr. Sexton, A. Mr. Madden, 577

SWINBURNE, Sir John, Staffordshire, Lichfield

Australian Mails, 835

Insanitary Area, Westminster, 884

Swine Fever, 683

Sword Contracts, 1646

TALBOT, Mr. J. G., Oxford University

Eastbourne Improvement Act Amendment Bill, 323

Rating of Schools, 1291

Small-Pox in London, 972

Tallow District Medical Officer, 678

Tambi, Attack on

Q. Mr. Osborne Morgan, A. Baron H. de Worms, 696

TANNER, Dr. C. K., Cork County, Mid

American Mail Service, 685, 687

Bandon Insanitary Houses, 1653

Ballincollig Powder Mills, 34, 1655

Breach of Privilege, 961

Burgh Police and Health Bill, 1271, 1273, 1274, 1729

Business of the House, 304, 1532

Clothing Factory, 162

Congested Districts Board, 365

Cork Lunatic Asylum, 361, 1567, 1568

Cork Mails, Accelerating, 686

Dispensary Committees, 1656

Dissolution, 512

Drinagh Post, 364

Dublin Post Office Pay, &c., 1111, 1569

Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 1853

Emigrants and "Pavonia," 1655

Evicted Tenants, Re-instatement, 1575

Fires in Hotels, 359

Fishing Boats for Ireland, 880

Haulbowline Employees, 688, 1118

Indian Councils Act, 128, 1848, 1963, 1871, 1981, 1882

Infectious Diseases, 344

Irish Fisheries, 1294

Kilworth Water Supply, 1652

Louisburg Pier, 34

Labourers Cottages Act, Complaints, 864

Labourers Cottages, Bandon Union, 40; Mallow, 479; Sligo, 1577

Light on Clock Tower, 692

Mail Services, Ireland, 851, 852, 876; for Return, 966, 1099, 1113, 1868

Margarine, Sale as Butter, 1569

Medical Officer Lismore Union, 679

Mrs. Montagu, Prison Dress, 1576, 1657, 1746, 1748

Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 132, 137

Overtime in Post Office, 1115

Queen's College, Belfast, 868

Roburite in Mines, 1653

Royal Palaces Vote, 493, 501, 502, 503, 517, 520

TANNER, Dr. C. K.—cont.

- Seed Rate in Ireland, 479
- Short Titles Bill, 1276, 1277, 1718, 1719
- Small-Pox in Dewsbury, &c. 1654
- Superannuation Acts Amendment Bill, 1859
- Taxes (Regulation of Remuneration) Bill, 751
- Weights and Measures Bill, 1714, 1715, 1716, 1718
- Witnesses Protection Bill, 1861

Target Practice Seawards

- Q. Mr. Sexton, Sir E. Birkbeck, Mr. J. O'Connor, Major Banes, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 554-6; see also 163

Taxation, Incidence of, 1132Taxation, Local and Imperial, 588*Taxes (Regulation of Remuneration) Bill

[c. No. 219]

- 2R. Debated, 452, Adj.
- Debate Adj. 751

Teachers in Irish Schools

- Q. Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. Jackson, 9

Technical and Industrial Institutions Bill [L. No. 18]

- Pres. Lord Macnaghten; Read 1^a, 6
- Debated, 313; Read 2^a, and Com. 318
- Com. 527, Rep. and Re-com. 530

Technical Instruction (Scotland) Bill [c. No. 262]

- Intro. Mr. Bryce; Read 1^a, 812

Telegram, Non-delivery of, 480Telegraphs (see also under POST OFFICE)

- Extension—Rural Districts*, Q. Mr. Thorburn, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 689; to Jamaica, 1099, 1240; Factory Hours, Q. Mr. S. Buxton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 565; Finance, Mr. J. Ellis, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1757; Holidays, Q. Mr. Esslemont, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 26; Indian and Australian Rates, Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1085; Telephonic Communication, Reso. Dr. Cameron, 166, 175, Division, 199

TEMPLE, Sir Richard, Worcester, Evesham

- Indian Councils Act, 97, Amendment Bill, 1322, 1327, 1335, 1340, 1369
- London Water Supply, 473
- Royal Parks Vote, 521

Theatres, Exits from Stage, 1566THEOBALD, Mr. J., Essex, Romford
Essex Regiment (Pompadors), 1250THOMAS, Mr. David A., Merthyr Tydvil
Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 536, 539, 543, 552
Business of the House, 601, 985
Clergy Discipline Bill, 601THORBURN, Mr. W., Peebles and Selkirk
Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 420, 422, 1815
Telegraph Extension in Rural Districts, 689Thornycroft's, Messrs. Sub-Contracting, 26*THING, Lord

- Bills of Sale Bill, 533, 534
- Technical and Industrial Institutions Bill, 315

Tidal Waters, Bye-Laws

- Q. Mr. M. Healy, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 857

Ties in County Council Elections, 1645Tithe Rent-Charge

- Q. Mr. Morton, A. Sir J. R. Mowbray, 346; Redemption, Q. Mr. H. Gardner, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 476

Tobacco Concession, Persia, 1390, 1776Tobermory, Procurator Fiscal

- Q. Mr. Fraser-Mackintosh, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 674

Tokar District Taxation

- Q. Mr. Bryce, Mr. A. O'Connor, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 857

TOMLINSON, Mr. W. E. M., Preston

- Accumulations Bill, 1739
- Divorce Bill, 1448
- Industrial and Provident Societies (Leasehold Enfranchisement) Bill, 1744
- Infantry Drill Book, 352

Toniataba, Fighting at

- Q. Mr. Osborne Morgan, A. Baron H. de Worms, 1779

Tottenham, School Accommodation

- Q. Mr. Picton, A. Sir W. Hart Dyke, 1249

Trade Returns, Annual

- Q. Mr. Holden, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 864
- Improvements in Monthly Statement*, Q. Mr. Octavius V. Morgan, A. Sir M. H. Beach, 1105

Trade Societies and Savings Banks
Q. Mr. Howell, A. Mr. Goschen, 31, 354

Traffic Regulations, 162

Trawlers, French and Scotch on Irish Coast, 586, 841

Treasure Trove at Dolgelly
Q. Mr. Randall, A. Sir R. Webster, 1761

TREASURY

First Lord—Right Hon. A. J. Balfour
Chancellor of the Exchequer—Right Hon. G. J. Goschen

Joint Secretaries—Right Hon. Sir J. E. Gorst; Right Hon. A. Akers Douglas

American Mails Expenditure, 687

Budget Proposals, 1134-1170

Financial Relations Com. 985, 1223

Income Tax Claims, Costs, 695

Jamaica Telegraph Subsidy, 1240

Kinsale Pier Loan, 47, 1247

Mining Royalties, 50, 590, 828

Powis Commission Cost, 1126

Savings Bank Inspectors, 363

Tax on £400 Incomes, 827

Way and Means—Annual Statement, 1134

Treaties with Belgium and Germany
Q. Colonel Howard Vincent, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 476

Trees (Ireland) Bill [c. No. 80]
2R. deferred, 1745

TREVELYAN, Right Hon. Sir G. O.,
Glasgow, Bridgeton
Education and Local Taxation Relief Bill,
605, 1809

Privilege Questions, 597

Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) Select Com., Motion, 700; Breach of Privilege, 892, 898

"Triumph" Guardship, Repairs to
Q. Mr. J. O'Connor, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 1567

Troops on Foreign Service, 1250

Truant Schools for Scotland
Q. Mr. Leng, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 150

Truck Acts and Rent Deductions
Q. Mr. Cremer, A. Sir R. Webster, 697, 873

Trustees of Oliver and Richards Charities, 360

TUTE, Mr. J., Westmeath, N.
Influenza in Irish Schools, 1287

Tunnelling through Gibraltar, 1580

Turkey and Armenia
Q. Mr. F. S. Stevenson, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 28

Tynan Sunday Postman, 160

Uganda, Fighting in
Q. Sir W. Harcourt, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther,
1570; see also 1768

Ulverston Postmastership
Q. Mr. Neville, A. Sir James Fergusson, 18

Unconvicted Prisoners, Working of
Q. Dr. Clark, A. Sir C. J. Pearson, 1557

Uniforms of Highland Regiments, 13

Usibepu, 1560

Vaccination at King's Norton
Q. Mr. Cobb, A. Mr. S. Wortley, 1751

Vaccination Commission
Q. Mr. Channing, A. Mr. Ritchie, 1386

Vaccine Lymph
Q. Mr. Summers, A. Mr. Ritchie, 831

Venezuela, Insurrection in
Q. Mr. Watt, A. Mr. J. W. Lowther, 1755

Vestrymen's Qualification
Q. Mr. J. Rowlands, A. Mr. Ritchie, 847

Vestrymen's Qualification Bill [c. No. 249]
Intro. Mr. J. Rowlands; Read 1^o, 248

Veterinary Inspectors, Portal, 587

Victualling Stores
Q. Mr. Gourley, A. Mr. Forwood, 1128

Vienna Postal Conference
Q. Mr. Henniker Heaton, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1281

Village Libraries, 1772

VINCENT, Colonel C.E. Howard, Sheffield, Central

Bechuanaland Border Police, 1651
Civil Service Volunteers at Easter, 675
Colonial Commercial Leagues, 156
Continental Anarchists, 681
Canadian Trade, 978
Naval Artillery Volunteers, 390
Russian Jewish Emigrants, 145
Treaties with Belgium and Germany, 476
Volunteers and Jury Service, 1646

VIVIAN, Sir H. Hussey, Swansea, District
Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 544

Volunteer Medical Officers
Q. Colonel Eyre, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 567

Volunteer Regiments Debts
Q. Mr. Isaacs, A. Mr. Brodrick, 12

Volunteers, Civil Service, Easter, 675

Volunteers and Jury Service
Q. Colonel H. Vincent, A. Mr. Brodrick, 1646

WADDY, Mr. S. D., Lincolnshire, Brigg
Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill, 1622

WALLACE, Mr. R., Edinburgh, E.
Business of the House, 601
Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 406
Military Lands Consolidation Bill, 187
Payment of Public Officials, 204
Scotch Equivalent Grant Bill, 164

Wantage's, Lord, Committee
Q. Mr. Jeffreys, A. Mr. Brodrick, 1573

WARING, Colonel T., Down, N.
Compulsory Sale of Land (Ireland), 240
Foot-and-Mouth Disease, Glasgow, 1774
Land Purchase Amendment Act, 278

WAR OFFICE (see ARMY)
Secretary of State—see Right Hon. E. Stanhope
Under Secretary of State—see Earl Brownlow
Financial Secretary—see Hon. W. St. John Brodrick

Waste Work Stoppages, 1101

Waterford County Police
Q. Mr. M. Healy, A. Mr. Jackson, 690

Water Supply of London, 473

WATKIN, Sir Edward, Hythe
Gibraltar Tunnelling, 355

WATT, Mr. Hugh, Glasgow, Camlachie
Insurrection in Venezuela, 1765
West Indian Sugar, 11

WAYS AND MEANS

FINANCIAL STATEMENT

Speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) in Opening the Budget, 11 April, 1134; Debate, Reso. in Com. 1170-1178
Reso. in Com. 12 April, 1255

Wearing the Shamrock, 14, 153, 367, 691, 832

Wearing of Emblems in the Army
Q. Mr. P. O'Brien, Mr. Mac Neill, A. Mr. E. Stanhope, 558

WEBB, Mr. A., Waterford, W.
Handley, James, 469, 591
Letters, Free Re-direction of, 1773
Married Women as Poor Law Guardians, 980
Medical Officer, Tallow District, 678
Zululand Boundary Commission, 890

WEBSTER, Mr. R. G., St. Pancras, E.
Point of Order, 688

WEBSTER, SIR RICHARD E. (Attorney General), Isle of Wight
Accumulations Bill, Intro. 1227, 1737, 1741, 1743
Clergy Discipline Bill, 1624
County Council Polling Places, 1389
Chicago Exhibition, 48, 696, 697, 880
Debtors, Committal of, 838
Deeming, Trial of, 873
Divorce Bill, 1438
Election Expenses, 44
Evidence in Criminal Cases Bill, 2R. 131
Industrial and Provident Societies (Leasehold Enfranchisement), 1743
Inhabited House Duty, 874
Jurors, Hardships of, 1131
Justice North's Court, 41
Justice Romer's Health, 1181
Mrs. Montagu; Similar Cases, 863
Nonconformists, Marriages of, 881
Short Titles Bill, 1276, 1718, 1719, 1720
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 738, 1193, 1207, 1208, 1216
Treasure Trove, Dolgelly, 1762
Truck Acts, Rent deducted, 696, 874

Weights and Measures (Purchase) Bill
[c. No. 257]

Intro. Sir M. H. Beach; Read 1^o, 671
2R. deferred, 1221
Read 2^o, and Com. 1295
Com. 1714; Rep. 1718

Welsh-Speaking Medical Inspectors
Q. Mr. Osborne Morgan, A. Mr. Long, 1771

- West Africa
Sahmadoo and Sierra Leone, 1109
Tambi Repulse, 696
- West African Postage
Q. Mr. Rowntree, A. Sir J. Fergusson, 1561
- Western Highlands and Islands Works
Q. Dr. McDonald, A. Mr. A. J. Balfour, 1800, 1580
- West Indian Sugar
Q. Mr. Watt, A. Baron H. de Worms, 11
- Westmeath Constabulary
Q. Mr. D. Sullivan, A. Mr. Jackson, 389
- WESTMINSTER, Duke of
Smoke Nuisance (Metropolis) Bill, 310
- Westminster Abbey, Royal Commission
Q. Mr. Shaw Lefevre, A. Mr. Plunket, 690
- Westminster, Insanitary Area, 834
- Weymouth Trustee Savings Bank
Q. Mr. Howell, A. Mr. Goschen, 383
- Wexford Mails
Q. Mr. T. J. Healy, A. Sir J. Ferguson, 579, 1248
- WHITBREAD, Mr. S., Bedford
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 733, 1005, 1010, 1030, 1186, 1198
- WHITMORE, Mr. C. A., Chelsea
Admiralty Contracts, 26
Gallery of British Art, 829
- WILL, Mr. J. Shiress, Montrose, &c.
Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, 1724
Edinburgh and Dundee Mails, 1230
Education and Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, 419
Farm Servants Wages, 1229
- WILLIAMS, Mr. A. J., Glamorgan, S.
Birmingham Corporation Water Bill, 547
- WILLIAMS, Mr. Powell J., Birmingham, S.
Small Agricultural Holdings Bill, 1203
- WILSON, Mr. Henry J., York, W.R., Holmfirth
School Inspectors, 1649
- WILSON, Mr. John
Breach of Privil.
Hours Com. 905
Extra Police at Durh
- WILSON, Mr. John, L
Burgh Police and Health
- Wilson, Sir Jacob, Ill
Q. Mr. P. Stanhope, A. J.
- WINTERBOTHAM, Mr. A
Cirencester
Rating of Machinery Bill,
Small Agricultural Holdings
707, 736, 738, 748, 1184,
1214
- Witnesses, Parliamentary
Q. Sir C. Russell, A. Mr. A. J.
- Witnesses Protection Bill [c. No.
Intro. Sir C. Russell; Read 1^o, 1445
- Witnesses (Royal Commissions and Parliament) Protection Bill [c. No. 287]
Intro. Mr. Yerburch; Read 1^o, 1296
Read 2^o, and com. to Select Com. 1862
- Women, Railway Compartments for, 244
- Women's Disabilities Removal Bill
Withdrawn, 1581
- WOODALL, Mr. W., Hanley
Parliamentary Franchise (Extension to Women) Bill, 1488
- Workmen's Discharge, Chatham Dockyard
Q. Mr. Broadhurst, A. Lord G. Hamilton, 856
- World's End Meetings, Prosecution
Q. Mr. C. Graham, A. Mr. Matthews, 857
- WORTLEY, Mr. C. B. STUART (Under Secretary of State for the Home Department), Sheffield, Hallam
Flintshire Coroner, 1759
Local Boards and Sunday Closing, 1751
Metropolitan Police Provisional Order Bill, Intro. 1227
Vaccination, 1752
- Wreck of the Holmrook
Q. Sir E. Grey, A. Sir M. Hicks Beach, 676

nd

ndary Commission, Q. Mr. Webb, A.
Baron H. de Worms, 880

Prisoners in, Q. Mr. Picton, A. Baron H.
de Worms, 1559

Usibepu, Q. Mr. Picton, A. Baron H. de
Worms, 1560

BYA

D OF VOLUME III., AND THIRD VOLUME
OF SESSION 1892.

REUTER'S TELEGRAM COMPANY, LIMITED,
24 & 25, OLD JEWRY, E.C.

PRINTERS, PUBLISHERS, AND PROPRIETORS OF

THE PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES AUTHORISED EDITION."

UNDER CONTRACT WITH H.M. GOVERNMENT.

